William Steyn, a letter-carrier, of Sea Point, said that he knew defendant, who lived at the Belwood Estate, Sea Point. He remembered taking a registered letter to defendant in December, 1904, the letter being delivered to defendant's son-in-law. Witness produced the receipt for the letter, signed by the son-in-law of defendant.

Defendant: I know nothing about it. He was living in Observatory.

William Aspinall Paisley, a clerk in plaintiffs' employ, gave evidence as to posting a letter to defendant on the 22nd April, 1904.

Defendant denied having received the earlier letters spoken to by witness in which it was proposed that he should become guarantor either for the current account for the debt due to B. Lawrence and Co. Defendant warmly protested that he had not undertaken to be surety, and said that he would not become security for his own mother. He said that his daughter had come from Johannesburg, and she wanted to open a shop. He took his daughter and recommended her to Mr. Steytler. Mr. Steytler said that they would give credit up to £30, and he told Mrs. Shur to go to the book-keeper. Witness afterwards took her to Mr. Lawrence, and the latter said he would give credit to the extent of £30, but he asked witness to sign a guarantee for one-half if credit was given up to £60. Witness agreed to this. Mr. Steytler's traveller subsequently proposed to Mrs. Shur that she should open a shop at Observatory. She did so, but she went back in her business. Later on, Mrs. Shur removed to Bloemfontein.

Cross-examined: Witness had not received the registered letter from plaintiffs. He never led Mr. Steytler to believe that he would become guarantor for Mrs. Shur's account.

Buchanan, J.: The plaintiffs in this case, merchants in Cape Town, supplied one Mrs. Shur with goods. These goods, the plaintiffs allege, were supplied on a guarantee by the defendant in this case, Mrs. Shur's father. An interview took place, admittedly, between the plaintiff and defendant and Mrs. Shur, when defendant introduced Mrs. Shur to Steytler and Co. At this interview Mr. Steytler says that defendant distinctly undertook that if plaintiff would support Mrs. Shur, and supply her with goods from time to time, defendant would guarantee Mrs. Shur's account to the extent of £20 or £30. The defendant positively denies that he gave any such guarantee. We have not in this country a statute of frauds as they have in England; under that statute such a verbal guarantee could not be sued upon in England to found liability. In this colony, however, if an agreement is clearly proved, the agreement can be sued upon. It would always be safer in cases of this kind if guarantees were reduced to writing. Here the correspondence which passed between plaintiff and defendant supports the plaintiff's case. On the day after this guarantee was alleged to have been given, Steytler and Co. wrote to the defendant setting forth the conversation that had taken place between them. That letter said that defendant had introduced Mrs. Shur, and had guaranteed her account. Defendant said he never received this letter. Evidence has been given to show that the letter was duly posted to the defendant's address. Later on, in December of that year, Steytler and Co. wrote to the defendant that Mrs. Shur had been in difficulties with her account with Messrs. B. Lawrence and Co., and had consulted Steytlers as to what could be done, and the plaintiffs asked defendant if he were willing to guarantee the amount due to Lawrences, and saying that if he would so guarantee it they would pay it on Mrs. Shur's account, and as the matter was urgent, they asked him to give a prompt reply. The defendant, in answer to this, Mr. Steytler says, called and guaranteed the account. Here again it is unfortunate that no writing was taken from the defendant, but from defendant's evidence it appears that he had given Lawrence and Co. a written guarantee for Mrs. Shur's account. On the 28th December, Steytler and Co. wrote referring to the conversation, and setting forth that they would pay the account to Lawrences on the strength of this guarantee. Defendant says that neither of these letters were received by him, but it was a registered letter, and it has been proved by the Post Office officials to have been delivered at the address of the defendant at Sea Point. None of these letters, which the defendant says he has never received, have been returned to Steytler and Co., through the dead letter office. This one at any rate has been proved to have been delivered at the defendant's house. It is true that the receipt is not signed by the defendant himself, but by his son-in-law, and that son-in-law is used by the defendant to write some of the letters which had passed between the parties. On the 30th December, 1904, Steytlers again wrote to the defendant, stating that in accordance with the guarantee they had paid Lawrence's account, and Mrs. Shur's account had been increased accordingly, and they asked whether he would make a note of this. Again the defendant says he never received the letter. This letter has been proved to have been posted in the usual way, and it has not been returned. After this the plaintiffs, Lawrence and Co., when Mrs. Shur's account got into an unsatisfactory state, Steytlers again wrote to the defendant, explaining Mrs. Shur's position and enclosing the account then due by Mrs. Shur, showing a debit balance of £62, "for which, under your guarantee to us, be good enough to pay cheque." This letter is sent to the same address as all the others, and this letter comes out of the possession of the defendant, so that he had received it. The defendant did not write repudiating the guarantee. He did not pay the account, and a month later the plaintiffs wrote asking for a settlement of account, and then for the first time defendant repudiates the guarantee. With all this correspondence before me, although there is no written agreement to the effect that the defendant did guarantee the account, but as all the correspondence thoroughly corroborates Mr. Steytler's evidence, I feel that the plaintiff's case has been proved, that the defendant did guarantee the account, and the plaintiffs are accordingly entitled to judgment. Judgment for plaintiffs as prayed, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

SHEKEMA V. TYEKANA. (19 6.
(May 21st.

Magistrate's jurisdiction—Goods sold and delivered—Act 43
of 1885.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the R.M. of Komgha, in an action brought by respondent against the present appellant to recover £51, value of certain grain. Mr. Benjamin was for appellant (defendant in the Court below); Mr. M. Bisset was for respondent.

The original action in the Magistrate's Court was brought to recover a sum of 51, value of certain 36 bags of grain, which plaintiff said he gave to defendant at Umtata to sell for him. At the hearing in the Court below, exception was taken that the case was beyond the Magistrate's jurisdiction, inasmuch as it was for over £20, and not for goods sold and delivered. The Magistrate, however, overruled the exception. Defendant made a tender of £20, with costs, to date of tender, but he subsequently withdrew this. The Magistrate allowed plaintiff £32 8s. for the grain, but deducted £3 5s. for commission and £5 8s. for carriage, and gave judgment for plaintiff for £23 15s., with costs.

Mr. Benjamin (for appellant): I submit that the tender of £20 did not give the magistrate jurisdiction. The tender was subsequently withdrawn. The magistrate's extended jurisdiction is governed by Act 43 of 1885, Section 5. Act 20 of 1856, Section 8, limits the jurisdiction to £20. Here the action was not for goods, but for debt, and therefore falls under Section 8 of Act 20 of 1856. The magistrate says that "price" means "value," but that is not a legal definition. This is not a claim for damages, but for a debt. Act 43 of 1885 extends the jurisdiction in respect of the price of merchandise, but not in respect of debt. Here the appellant is a commission agent, and is entitled to deduct expenses. Wright, on Principal and Agent (p. 189), shows that an agent is not liable to his principal for the price of goods, but only for debt. Act 43 of 1885 only contemplates actions between vendor and purchaser. The cases cited by the magistrate do not apply.

Mr. Bisset was proceeding to argue that counsel for appellant had read certain words into Act 43 of 1885, when he was stopped by the Court.

Buchanan, J.: The Magistrate's Court Act, No. 20, 1856, limited the Magistrate's jurisdiction in civil cases to the following sums: On promissory notes or other written acknowledgments of debt, £40; in cases of debt, which were not in writing, £20; in cases of damages, £20. The Act 43 of 1885 increased the Magistrate's jurisdiction in cases of written documents to £250; and in "all cases commonly called illiquid, for the recovery of the purchase price of any merchandise, goods or other movable property," to £100. It left the question of damages £20 as before. In this case the plaintiff gave to the defendant certain thirty bags of grain to be sold for him. He alleged that the defendant was to pay him a fixed price for the same, which fixed price, it is alleged, was agreed upon at the time of delay. The defendant sold the grain, and never accounted for the purchase price, and he is sued for the purchase price. This is not an action for damages. It is certainly an illiquid claim, and I think comes within the definition of one "for the recovery of the purchase price of merchandise, goods, or other movable property." Exception was taken that the claim was beyond the magistrate's jurisdiction, which exception he overruled, and gave judgment for £23 15s. I think the magistrate was quite justified in considering the claim. I think he had jurisdiction in this case, under the extended powers given to him by Act 43, 1885. There is no cross appeal, or it might have been argued that more was due to the plaintiff than judgment has been given for. The only question before this Court is whether the case comes within the jurisdiction of the Magistrate, under the Act 43, 1885, and I hold that it was within the jurisdiction. The appeal will be dismissed, with costs.

HANSON V. HALFELE.

Sale and purchase—Hawker.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the A.R.M. of Umtata in an action brought by the appellant against the respondent to recover a sum of £31, alleged to be the purchase price of certain jewellery. Mr. McGregor was for appellant, a travelling jeweller belonging to Durban, Natal; Mr. Watermeyer was for respondent, Wm. Halfele, a contractor, of Umtata.

Plaintiff alleged that he sold to defendant, at Umtata, in June last, a diamond ring for £24, and a necklace for £7. The arrangement was that defendant should pay him a portion of the purchase price before he left for Idutywa, and the balance as found convenient. Defendant had not paid the purchase price or any part.

Defendant alleged that he did not purchase the goods. He was called by plaintiff into the Grosvenor Hotel, and asked to have a drink. Hanson gave him a pipe and a nail-clipper, and afterwards pressed him to take the jewellery to show his wife. Witness did not buy the goods. Afterwards he was told by Hanson that he had bought the goods, and in consequence of an insinuation Hanson made, witness said that he would take the goods at a proper valuation. A local jeweller, called by defendant, valued the ring at £10, and the locket at £3 10s. The witness said that the profit made by jewellers was sometimes as high as 200 per cent.

The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, said that one side at least was guilty of flagrant perjury. It was for the plaintiff to prove his contract. He was called upon to produce his books. He produced a small book of a very primitive character. Under the circumstances, the Court considered that the most just way to settle the dispute was to order the return of the goods to plaintiff. Plaintiff might sue for his price under the offer made to him by the defendant, but in view of what had happened, it was not likely that he would. Both parties had been known to the Court for the last ten years, and this judgment, the Magistrate observed, was largely based upon such knowledge. Defendant would be ordered to return the goods, and judgment would be entered for defendant, with costs.

Mr. McGregor submitted that on the facts the Magistrate was mistaken, and that, even assuming he was correct on the facts, he was mistaken in the course that he had adopted. The Magistrate said that he could not decide on the value as between the assessors, and he thereupon ordered the return of the goods, so that his judgment was really a non sequitur. Counsel contended that a person who had bought goods could not, as defendant in this case had done, keep them for a considerable period and then return them. The Magistrate had misread the consequences that should flow from the facts as he had found them.

Without calling upon Mr. Watermeyer.

Buchanan, J.: This is an action brought in the Magistrate's Court for the purchase price of certain jewellery alleged to have been sold by plaintiff to defendant. The only question in dispute between the parties is whether there was a sale of this jewellery as alleged. The plaintiff said there was a sale; defendant denied this. The Magistrate had the parties before him, and he thoroughly believed the defendant, who detailed the circumstances under which the alleged transaction took place. The plaintiff was a travelling hawker, who, defendant says, induced the defendant to go to the hotel, where he gave defendant drinks and a few small things as a present, and he then induced defendant to look at certain jewellery. The defendant all through said he had no money, and did not wish to buy. The plaintiff pressed him to take these things, and at last persuaded him to take them to show to his wife. He did take them home, but his wife at once refused to have them. Thereupon the day after he went to the hotel, but the plaintiff had left on his trading expedition. When next plaintiff came to Umtata, defendant saw him, and told him he would not keep the jewellery. Plaintiff again persuaded him to take back the jewellery, and told him to keep it for the present, and that he might like it, but, all through, there is no distinct contract of purchase and a sale come to. Afterwards the parties again met, and plaintiff demanded from defendant the price of the jewellery, and the latter then said, "Oh, I see your little game." Defendant, however, said that he would keep the things if they were appraised at the value stated. He had the jewellery valued, the ring at £10 and the locket at £3 10s., and the defendant offered to pay plaintiff £13 10s. for the jewellery. This offer plaintiff refused, so that here again there was no sale. The Magistrate had the witnesses before him, and he says, from his knowledge of the parties, as well as from the way in which they gave their evidence, he thoroughly believes the defendant's story. That being the case. There is no sufficient ground upon which this Court, as a Court of Appeal, can reverse the Magistrate's finding. The appeal will be dismissed, with costs.

SERONGWANE V. TEMPLE. { 1906.
{ May 21st.

Retainer—Consideration—Attorney's fee.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Matabele, in an action brought by H. M. Temple, attorney, against Serongwane, a native, to recover £5 on a promissory note, payable on demand.

From the record, it appeared that appellant had been threatened with an action by another native, and that he had consulted the respondent. The other case had not come on for hearing. Mr. Temple, however, said that he informed the defendant that he should want a retainer of £5 for his services, and that defendant signed a promissory note for £5 by making his mark. Defendant denied that he had agreed to give the promissory note, or that he had signed it by making his mark. The Magistrate found that defendant gave the promissory note to plaintiff as a retainer, and gave judgment for plaintiff, as prayed, with costs.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones was for appellant (defendant in the court below); Mr. Benjamin was for respondent.

Mr. Jones said that the Magistrate's judgment turned upon the question of whether the promissory note was given by way of retainer or by way of a deposit. It was a question whether the native understood what a retainer was. He submitted that this was not a retainer, because there could be no retainer, the native not understanding it. This was a deposit, and the plaintiff should have submitted to defendant a bill of costs, and claimed the amount from him on the note, giving him credit on the note for the balance. The native had received no consideration for this note. The practice of retainers should not, be submitted, be encouraged as between natives and attorneys. According to the plaintiff's own evidence, the utmost the amount could be for was a fee.

Mr. Benjamin said his learned friend, on the point of consideration, had failed to distinguish a case of failure of consideration, where the fault was due to the party himself, and due to some cause beyond his control. The case here was whether failure was beyond the control of the party. The plaintiff was perfectly prepared to render his services then or at any future time should the action come on, and that was ample and good consideration for the undertaking on the part of the defendant to pay this £5. The case was closely analogous to one where a brief was delivered to counsel, and the case did not come off.

Buchanan, J The plaintiff in this case is an attorney practising at Matatiele. As such attorney he employs a native interpreter, and this interpreter brought the defendant to him one day, stating that the defendant was threatened with legal proceedings. According to the defendant, this interpreter of the plaintiff acted as a sort of tout. Defendant says this interpreter met him on the market square, and said he heard the defendant was about to be sued. The tout took the native to the attorney, and the attorney said: "My charges for defending you will be £5." Thereupon he obtained from the native a promissory note for £5, which is signed by the native with a cross, and demand £5 for value received." The is as follows: "I promise to pay on value received the plaintiff himself says, is this: It is for a retainer for defence and for all my charges in the Court. If the summons had been issued, I should not have made a further charge. No legal proceedings were ever taken against the defendant, and the plaintiff now sues me upon the note, the defence set up is no consideration. Now, the consideration seems to be to do certain work, which the plaintiff has not yet performed, and the promise on the part of the defendant was to pay for such work. No action has been instituted against the defendant, and no work done by the plaintiff to earn this £5. As the case stands, there is a total failure of consideration. This happened two years ago, and no summons has yet been issued, and the threatened action has not been instituted against the defendant. If it had been a case in which the defendant, through his own act, had prevented the plaintiff from earning the £5, there might have been something said, but as the matter now stands there has been no consideration given for the note. This is simply a promise to pay for certain services and until these services are rendered the plaintiff is not entitled to pay. The magistrate was wrong in giving judgment for the plaintiff for the £5. The appeal will be allowed, with costs, the judgment entered in the Court below of absolution from the instance, with costs.

COUSINS AND PRESTON V. { 1906.
ASSIGNEE ESTATE PHILLIPS. { May 21st.

Magistrate's Court—Summons—
of 1856.

M., who resides in E. London, was summoned as assignee of the estate of P., who resides at Mount Fletcher, to appear before the Magistrate of that district. This summons was served upon P. Exception was taken in the Court below to this service, inasmuch as personal service was not effected on the defendant. The Magistrate upheld the exception.

Held on appeal, that the exception was good.

Semble, such service of a summons issued out of any one of the superior Courts would have been good.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Mount Fletcher in reference to the question of whether the service of a summons was a good service or not.

The claim was for £50 on a contract, and the attorney, on behalf of the defendant, excepted on the ground that the service was bad, inasmuch as it was effected, not upon the assignee personally, but effected at the place of business on Phillips himself, who happened to be the possessor in the estate. The Magistrate upheld the exception, and gave judgment accordingly.

Mr. Gutsche was for applicant; Mr. Benjamin was for respondent.

Mr. Gutsche contended that where service could not be effected on the defendant the service might be effected at his usual or last known dwelling-house, or place of business. As Myers, the assignee in the estate, was absent in East London, the summons could not be served personally. It was served at the place of business on a responsible servant, who had also another capacity as assignor.

Mr. Benjamin submitted that the defendant in the action was Myers, as assignee, and that there should be personal service, because in the Magistrate's Court the summons took the place of the declaration, and the defendant must know what he was coming into court to answer. The service, he contended, could only have been effected on Myers at East London.

Buchanan, J.: A summons was taken out in the Magistrate's Court by the plaintiff against one Myers in his capacity as assignee in the estate of one Phillips at Mount Fletcher. This summons was served on Phillips at Mount Fletcher. When the case came before the Magistrate objection was taken that the service was bad. The attorney who took the exception said in his evidence before the Magistrate, that as he held Myers' power of attorney he would have accepted the service had it been served upon him as agent for Myers at his office at his place of business, but as not being so served he took objection. The objection raises a much wider question than that raised in the Magistrate's Court. The Magistrate's Court Act gives the Magistrate jurisdiction over persons residing in his district, and the Proclamation in the Transkei adopts the same words as the Act. Now, it is proved that Meyers does not reside in the district of the Magistrate's Court in which the summons was taken out. He resides in East London. It is true he is sued in his capacity as assignee of Phillips estate which is situated in the district of Mount Fletcher but he is defendant in the action, and, therefore, it is a question whether the summons ought not to have been taken out in the Court of the Resident Magistrate, having jurisdiction by virtue of his residence within that district. Had the summons been taken out in the Supreme Court or the Eastern Districts Court, the fact that Myers resides in a different district from Phillips, of whose estate he was assignee, could not have been raised, but as it was taken out in the Magistrate's Court, the question arises whether Myers ought not to have been sued in the district in which he resides, and not in the district in which the estate in which he is assignee carries on business. It is a matter of importance and one which, I think, deserves the consideration of the Legislature: whether the jurisdiction of the Magistrate should not be altered so that when persons carry on business within the district of the Resident Magistrate that Resident Magistrate should have jurisdiction over any action arising in connection with that district. As the Act showed, the defendant must be sued in the district of the Magistrate, which has jurisdiction over him by reason of his residence. The fact that he is assignee of an estate carrying on business in Mount Fletcher does not give the Magistrate jurisdiction over him. On this ground the exception of a bad service is well founded. The only question is whether, on the question of costs, as this is not the ground of the exception, costs ought to be given on the appeal. I must say, when an exception of bad service is taken, it is much more advantageous to the parties, instead of incurring costs by appeal, to simply take out a new summons. But instead there has been an appeal, and it has failed. The appeal will be dismissed with costs.

HASSEN V. LOUW.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the A.R.M. of Cape Town, in a interpleader arising out of an action in which the respondent had sued one Abraham Abdurahman for £39 15s., for goods sold and delivered, for which the Magistrate had given judgment, with costs.

From the record it appeared that certain goods were attached in execution of the judgment, and the appellant alleged that the goods belonged to him. He took out an interpleader summons against Louw, and the Magistrate found that the goods were executable, and gave as his reasons for judgment that the claimant's evidence was so suspicious and contradictory that he could not believe an atom of it. The Magistrate also stated that the agent for Hassen apparently recognised the futility of calling further evidence, and judgment was practically given with the agent's consent.

Dr. Greer was for the appellant; Mr. P. S. T. Jones was for respondent.

Dr. Greer submitted the Magistrate had no evidence whatever on which to found his decision. The only evidence was that of Hassen himself, and there were some extraordinary contradictions in the record before the Court. Hassen had contradicted himself by saying that the sheep belonged to Louw, but counsel submitted that that must have been a mistaken interpretation, and that the sheep really belonged to the appellant.

Without calling upon Mr. Jones.

Buchanan, J.: The respondent Louw obtained judgment against one Abdurahman. In execution of this judgment, he attached certain property at 27, Wale-street. The claimant, Mohammed Hassen, who produced a licence showing that he carried on business at 118, Church-street, claims the goods attached as his property. The only evidence given in support of this claim is that of the appellant himself, and the Magistrate says that his evidence was so contradictory and so at variance with the facts that he could not credit his evidence in any way. The goods are attached, and the onus is upon the person claiming them to prove that they were his property, and this is the only evidence given in support of the claim. The Magistrate said it was not evidence which was credible, and he held that the property attached was executable in satisfaction of the judgment of Louw. There have been several judgments before the Court in which these parties have figured, but, without going beyond the record before me now, I must say that the Magistrate's decision that the claimant has not substantiated his right to these goods must be sustained with costs. The appeal will be dismissed, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

ADMISSIONS. } 1906.
 } May 22nd.

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan moved, as a matter of urgency, for the admission of Max Edward Thornton, as an attorney and notary.

Application granted, oaths to be taken before the A.R.M. of De Aar.

Mr. Burton moved, as a matter of urgency, for the admission of Daniel Jacobus Hugo de Wet as an attorney and notary.

Application granted, and oaths administered.

FEDERAL SUPPLY AND COLD STORAGE COMPANY, LTD. V. COLD STORAGE ASSOCIATION, LTD.

FEDERAL SUPPLY AND COLD STORAGE COMPANY V. SECRETARY, COLD STORAGE ASSOCIATION.

These motions came before the Court as matters of urgency.

The first application was upon notice to the Cold Storage Association, calling upon them to show cause why the Federal Company should not appeal to arbitration against a decision of the committee of the respondent association at a meeting on April 20 last, and against a decision of the committee at a meeting on the 10th May last, and why they should not be ordered to do all such things and sign all such documents as may be necessary for the submission of such appeals.

The Court decided to hear the motions separately.

Buchanan, J., asked how the matters came within the jurisdiction of this Court.

Mr. Schreiner said that the head office of the association was in Cape Town.

The affidavit of Adolf Angehrn, managing director in South Africa, of the Federal Supply and Cold Storage Company, stated that on the 28th February, 1906, certain companies, to wit, the Imperial Cold Storage Company, Ltd., McArthur, Atkins, and Co., Ltd., Sparks and Young, Ltd., Pietermaritzburg Cold Storage Company, Ltd., Port Elizabeth Cold Storage Co., Ltd., and the Federal Supply and Cold Storage Co., Ltd., entered into an agreement to form an association called the Cold Storage Association, Ltd., inter alia, as expressed in the deed, to protect the interests of cold storage concerns in South Africa from undue competition, so as to ensure the earning of reasonable profits on behalf of the shareholders and proprietors thereby, and two documents were drawn up and signed, one entitled "heads of agreement" and the other "memorandum setting forth the constitution of the Cold Storage Association." The administration and control of the association was entrusted to a committee as set out in the said memorandum. It was provided by clause 4 "that any party fined a sum exceeding £10 may appeal to arbitration as hereinafter provided," and it was also provided by clause 8 that "if any question other than that provided for in clause 4 be determined by the majority of votes it shall be competent for the dissensionist or dissensionists to claim to have the matter at issue referred to arbitration as, hereinafter provided, provided that notice claiming such arbitration be served upon the secretary of the association in writing within 48 hours after the meeting, such notice to indicate the matter referred." In or about November complaint was made by the Standard Cold Storage Company, under which name McArthur, Atkins, and Co. trade, that the Federal Company were, in contravention of the terms of the memorandum, trading at certain mines at Johannesburg, and on the 15th March certain resolutions were passed by the committee. On the 20th April the committee passed the following reqlution: "Standard Company's contract with Farrar Group, and six boarding-houses. The representative of the Standard Company having reported that the Federal Company had declined, and failed to carry out the agreement entered into between themselves, the Federal Company and the Standard Company, as per minute, dated 15th March, it was proposed by Mr. Martin and seconded by Mr. Morgan, that the Federal Company be fined £100. On being put to the vote the proposition was declared carried, all members present voting in favour of it, with the exception of Mr. Johnston." On the 21st April the Federal Company duly gave notice of intention to appeal to arbitration against the decision of the committee imposing the said fine. On the 20th April the Federal Company addressed a letter to the secretary of the Cold Storage Association, asking that the Benoni boarding-house question might be re-opened on the ground that material facts had since the resolution of the 15th March come to the knowledge of the Federal Company, but this letter was not considered by the committee of the Cold Storage Association until their meeting of the 2nd May, when they declined to re-open the question, and the committee further resolved that the Federal Company had no right of appeal against the fine of £100 imposed by the resolution of the 20th April. At a meeting of the committee on the 10th May, the following minute was passed: "Standard Company's contract with Farrar group and six boarding-houses. Mr. Atkins, having asked the committee (as recorded in minutes of last meeting) for redress in respect to the loss his company is sustaining by reason of the non-compliance by the Federal Company with resolution arrived at on the 15th March, was requested to submit a statement of his claim against the Federal Company. It was meanwhile resolved that the Federal Company be fined the sum of £100 for further non-compliance with the agreement above referred to, and that they be also fined the sum of £5 for not having made good the fine of £100 imposed on them on the 20th April, within eight days from that date." Thereafter an appeal for arbitration was duly notified in respect of this resolution. "Were my company," deponent went on to say, "to comply with the resolution of the 15th March, and break off all dealings with the boarding-houses and customers on the Farrar Group pending result of the appeal to arbitration, it would sustain injury which would be irreparable, as, even if the decision of the arbitrators were in its favour after taking such action, the customers would be entirely lost to the Federal Company. I am apprehensive that further fines will be inflicted upon my company for non-compliance with the resolutions passed by the committee of the association."

The answering affidavit of Walter McLachlan Martin, nominee of the Imperial Cold Storage Company, stated that he was acting chairman of the committee of the association at the meetings in question. Several members of the committee proceeded to Johannesburg, where the complaints by the Standard Company, amongst other things, were investigated. The parties concerned were invited to meet and come to some settlement. On the 14th March, the applicant company addressed a letter to the secretary of the association, setting forth the result of the negotiations which had passed with a view of a settlement. The committee accepted the proposition which the Federal Company had put forward. In regard to the subsequent action of the committee in imposing fines, he pointed out that the committee were merely giving effect to the agreement that had been made by the parties concerned after protracted negotiations, and that the committee were not at liberty, even if they had been disposed to do so, to re-open the matter. The claim of the Standard Company, or McArthur, Atkins, and Co., against the Federal Company, now amounted to about £5,000, the interest on which was a substantial item, and the fines imposed were, in the opinion of the committee, therefore, not excessive. If the Court were of opinion that the applicant was entitled to appeal against the imposition of the fines, he would point out that no serious opposition was raised by the committee to an appeal being proceeded with upon such terms and such conditions as the Court should prescribe. The letter addressed to the secretary of the association by the secretary of the Federal was as follows: "Provided McArthur, Atkins and Co. submit a copy of their contract (without stating the prices for supplies to the compounds) between themselves and the Farrar Group, to the committee, or the chairman of the committee, and it is thereafter decided by a majority vote of the committee that McArthur, Atkins and Co. are entitled to compensation under the articles of association, we hereby agree to abide by that decision, and to make no appeal therefrom. We further agree, in the event of its being decided that compensation is due to McArthur, Atkins and Co.: (1) to pay them 5 per cent. of our company's turnover, with the bona-fide white employees, on the Farrar Group, as and from the 15th February last, and to continue so long as the present association remains in existence; (2) also to pay McArthur, Atkins and Co. 10 per cent. of our company's turnover with the six boarding-houses now in dispute as and from the 1st June, and to continue so long as these are supplied directly, or indirectly, or during the existence of the present association; and (3) to take from McArthur, Atkins and Co. the equivalent value for value of supplies to these six boarding-houses from the date or dates on which we commenced supplying them, according to the judgments given, and against which the Federal have appealed, unto and including the 28th February. This offer is made without prejudice to our rights and with the idea of arriving at an amicable settlement of the matter, and will remain open for acceptance or rejection until after the meeting called for to-morrow rises."

Sir H. Juta, K.C., for applicants; Mr. Schreiner, K.C., for respondents.

Sir H. Juta said that his learned friend had said that if the notice of appeal was upon certain things, then he had no objection. The matter was perfectly simple. There was an agreement which said that when a fine was imposed, they could appeal. It was provided that they must give notice within 48 hours. Applicants gave notice within 48 hours to the following effect: "We hereby give you notice of our intention to appeal to arbitration against the decision of your committee in imposing a fine of £100 in the matter of the Farrer Group and six boarding-houses." To this the respondents replied, "You can't appeal."

Mr. Schreiner said that the agreement contained in the letter addressed by the Federal Company to the Cold Storage Association was accepted by the committee. Then fines were imposed on the 20th April and the 10th May. Those fines were appealed against. His position was that, by these very appeals, the applicants were trying to bring into question the validity of an agreement which they had arrived at, and which was endorsed by the committee of the association. The respondents said that the applicants had no right to raise for arbitration any question coming into the original agreement. Counsel admitted that the construction which the respondents put on clause 9 was not correct. There being no appeal pending against the decision of the 15th March, then the clause did not apply so as to debar the applicants from appealing.

In answer to the Court, Mr. Schreiner said that the fines went to the funds of the association.

Buchanan, J.: The main application before the Court, viz., the right to go to arbitration is not now seriously contested by the respondent, and an order will be granted in terms of the notice of motion, which, in short, is that the respondents be ordered to go to arbitration on an appeal against resolutions passed on the 20th April and the 10th May. The only other question is the question of costs. It is clear that the applicants have the right to this appeal, and it is also clear that this right was denied by the respondents before the matter came into Court, and, therefore, the applicants were forced to make this application. I quite admit the force of what Mr. Schreiner says, that as a rule when a person sets the law in motion the Court should wait to see the result of the proceedings before awarding the costs; but these are wasted costs. The costs of the applicants will be paid by respondents, all other costs of reference and award to be in the discretion of the arbitrator.

The second application was upon notice to the secretary of the Cold Storage Association, calling upon him to show cause why he should not be ordered to permit the representative of the Federal Company, or their solicitors, to make copies of all minutes of the meetings of the committee of the association from time to time, or to furnish the said company with copies of such minutes, and give the company, or their solicitors, an opportunity of inspecting the originals, in order to compare such copies therewith.

Affidavits having been read on both sides,

Sir H. Juta said that, under the agreement, they were permitted to inspect the minutes. The respondent now said that they might inspect the minutes, but they could not take a copy. That seemed to him (counsel) to be such an extraordinary attitude that he would leave it to his learned friend to show why they might inspect a thing, but they might not make a copy of it.

Without calling upon Mr. Schreiner,

Buchanan, J.: It seems to me that this application was altogether unnecessary. The matters in dispute, which have now arrived at the stage of legal proceedings, have reference only to certain resolutions passed on April 20 and May 10. The applicant applies to have inspection, and to take copies of minutes of the Committee of Management from the time of inception of the association. Copies of minutes since February 6 have been sent to the applicants, and respondent does not deny inspection of all previous minutes of the association. The right of inspection would certainly imply the right of taking copies of minutes, if necessary, for the purpose of the proceedings, but in this case all the minutes necessary for the action which is pending had been submitted to the parties. If there are any other minutes which applicant thinks are necessary, there is nothing whatever to prevent him from calling for them at the hearing before the arbitrator. Meanwhile he is not debarred from access to the minute book. This is in a way a sort of fishing application, because it has reference to matters not now before the Court, and matters not now sub judice. No order will be made.

The application will be refused, with costs.

WESTBROOKE V. MARTYN. { 1906.
May 22nd.

This was an action brought by Charles Westbrooke, commission agent, Johannesburg, against John Hubert Martyn, accountant, Cape Town, to recover a sum of £37 10s., alleged to be due for services rendered in the leasing of Goodwood Park, Maitland, primarily used as a racecourse.

From the declaration it appeared that plaintiff claimed to be entitled to £50 from defendant for his services in procuring a lease of a certain piece of land known as Goodwood Park, near Maitland, having been requested by defendant to assist him as agent for the owners. Plaintiff did materially assist defendant in effecting the lease of the property by his services in Johannesburg, and he said that he was entitled to claim £50 in accordance with agreement in writing dated November 12th, 1904. Defendant had only paid £12 10s. on account, and he wrongfully and unlawfully refused to pay the balance.

Respondent had excepted to the declaration on the ground that it was vague and embarrassing, and disclosed no action in law. He, however, did not persist with this exception, and pleaded that he agreed with plaintiff to pay him £50 if he assisted him in connection with the Kensington Estate, but he otherwise denied the allegations, and specially denied that Goodwood Park was situated within the Kensington Estate. He admitted having paid £12 10s. to plaintiff, but said that payment was made under a misapprehension, and that plaintiff was not legally entitled to the same. He prayed that the claim might be dismissed, with costs, and for a claim in reconvention he sought return of the sum of £12 10s., paid under a misapprehension that the property leased was on the Kensington Estate.

The replication was general.

Mr. Close was for plaintiff; defendant appeared in person.

Mr. Close said that he did not know what the defendant's position was exactly. When application was made to take the plaintiff's evidence on commission in Johannesburg, counsel appeared for defendant to oppose. A commission was granted, and when the evidence of plaintiff was taken defendant did not appear.

Defendant intimated that he desired to withdraw the claim in reconvention.

Mr. Close proceeded to read the evidence of the plaintiff, taken on commission, from which it appeared that he was the promoter of a syndicate in Johannesburg to run pony and gallop races in Cape Town. He advertised in the "Cape Times." Plaintiff said that he had done his share of the work in effecting the lease of the property by getting one Plunkett to sign the agreement.

Defendant said that he had evidence to show that the Goodwood Park racecourse was not on the Kensington Estate.

Mr. Close said that plaintiff in his replication admitted that the Goodwood racecourse was not on the Kensington Estate.

Defendant went into the box, and said that he entered into an agreement with plaintiff to pay him £50 if he assisted in effecting a lease of the Kensington Estate. No lease was effected on the Kensington Estate, as it was not considered suitable for a racecourse. Afterwards witness went over the Goodwood Park Estate, and a lease of that property was effected for ten years. He, however, decided to recognise plaintiff's services, and to pay him £50, provided that he (witness) first received his commission. Only one quarter's rent of the Goodwood Estate was paid by the syndicate, and at the end of three months the lease was cancelled.

By the Court: Witness received £50 as commission. He did not receive any further sum, but if the lease had continued he should have got a further £100. The lease, however, was cancelled.

Witness: But that was for the Kensington Estate, which is a different estate altogether. On the 15th January I put in my letter a paragraph stating that the commission would be dependent on payment of the rent.

[Buchanan, J.: According to this agreement with plaintiff, you made an absolute promise. You promised him absolutely £50, and paid him £12 10s. I will stay execution for a month to enable you to make arrangements with the plaintiff if you can.]

Judgment was given for plaintiff as prayed, with costs, including costs of commission, execution to be stayed for one month.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

Ex parte NASH AND J 1906.
ANOTHER. (May 23rd.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., moved for an amendment of an order granted by the Court, on the application of petitioners, interdicting the Union-Castle Company and other steamship lines from handling over certain goods mentioned in the petition. The matter originally arose out of the action of certain factors in stopping goods in transit consigned to Messrs. Reiners, Von Laer and Co., of Port Elizabeth, or their Cape Town business, which is carried on under the style of Govey and Co. Counsel explained that there were other goods coming down coast, and from elsewhere, to Reiners, Von Laer and Co., and Govey and Co., to which no stoppage in transit had been barred, and the respondents were taking up the attitude that the order operated upon these goods, and that they could not give delivery of these goods. He asked the Court to amend the order so as to make it clear that that was not the effect of the interdict. He supposed it was through an abundant desire on the part of the respondents to obey the order of the Court that they simply said that they would not part with goods that came to Govey and Co. and Reiners, Von Laer and Co. pending a further order of Court.

De Villiers, C.J., said that the order granted on the 15th May would be amended by adding after the word "notition" the following: "And in respect of which any other person or other company has given or may give notice to make claim to stop the said goods in transit," the amended order to be served on the respondents, with leave to them or any of them to object to such amendment.

Mr. Schreiner: That would mean that they would have to move the Court?

[De Villiers, C.J.: Yes, to apply to the Court for the purpose of opposing.]

LOCHNER V. WOODHEAD.

This was an application upon notice to Lawrence Woodhead, of the firm of Woodhead, Plant and Co., of Cape Town, calling upon him to show cause why a certain interdict granted upon an ex parte application restraining the sale of certain property at Moorreesburg should not be set aside.

From applicant's affidavit it appeared that Mr. Woodhead claims that Johannes Albertus Lochner is indebted to him in the sum of £1,132 for money lent and advanced, and that he commenced an action against Lochner for recovery of this sum. The defendant was barred from pleading, and the case was set down for judgment under Rule 319 on the 26th April last. Application was, however, made by Lochner's attorneys for removal of bar, and this was granted, and time in which to plead was extended until the 31st May. Subsequently an advertisement appeared of a sale of certain property at Moorreesburg by Mr. I. P. Marais, secretary of the African Mutual Trust and Assurance Company, Malmesbury, who is assignee in Lochner's estate, and Mr. Woodhead then moved the Court for an interdict restraining this sale pending the action. A temporary interdict was granted by Mr. Justice Maasdorp against the respondent and Mr. Marais. This interdict it was now sought to have set aside.

The answering affidavit of Jacobus Cillie, of Somerset West, defendant's local attorney, stated that defendant was at present away at Upington, district of Gordonia. The cause of action arose about two and a half years ago. Plaintiff's claim was denied and disputed by defendant. Defendant had been in partnership in England with one Brodie, and the partnership estate had been declared insolvent early in 1904, and plaintiff had proved his claim in the insolvency proceedings in England. Thereafter, when defendant returned to this country, he called his South African creditors together, and the African Mutual Trust Company, of Malmesbury, were appointed assignees under a deed of assignment executed on the 25th May, 1904. The firm of Woodhead, Plant and Co., of which plaintiff was a partner, were a party to the said assignment. Several sales had been held, and the proceeds had been distributed, and the only assets remaining to be realised were certain erven at Somerset Strand and certain property at Moorreesburg. The remaining assets when realised would not cover the existing bonds thereon, and there would be nothing for concurrent creditors. Counsel also read an affidavit by I. P. Marais, secretary of the African Mutual Trust and Assurance Company, and the sole trustee in the assigned estate of the defendant, who confirmed the statement that the assets remaining to be realised would not cover the existing bonds.

The replying affidavit of Lawrence Woodhead stated that the claim filed in England was against Lochner and Brodie, and had nothing to do with the present claim. He denied any knowledge of the alleged assignment by defendant, until his return from England in 1905. He subsequently saw the defendant in Strand-street, Cape Town, when the latter told him that he had made about £5,000 in connection with certain cattle transactions with the German Government, for German South-west Africa, and that he would repay his indebtedness to deponent. He (defendant) was anxious to regain his life policy, which he had deposited with deponent as partial security for the debt.

Mr. MacGregor for applicant. Mr. Burton for respondent.

Mr. McGregor submitted that the interdict should be set aside. The matter of an interdict was an extraordinary remedy in the discretion of the Court. Plaintiff must show that he had no other remedy. The defendant had been prejudiced by these proceedings on the part of the plaintiff.

[De Villiers, C.J. (to Mr. Burton): Is the plaintiff a preferent creditor?]

Mr. Burton: No. It is impossible at present to say what the estate will realise; it may realise more than the other side say. Counsel went on to say that the debt in question was incurred in London, and was really a private debt, of which the firm of Woodhead, Plant, and Co. knew nothing.

De Villiers, C.J., said that it might be of some advantage to counsel if he stated that his feeling was that it would be fair, under all the circumstances, to set aside the interdict, and in lieu thereof to make another order that the assignee of Lochner's estate be interdicted, pending a further order of Court, from parting with the proceeds of any sales effected, or to be effected, by such assignee after all preferent costs of the said Lochner have been paid, the question of costs to stand over.

Mr. Burton acquiesced in the suggested order.

Mr. McGregor said that he raised no objection, except that he submitted costs should be paid by the plaintiff.

De Villiers, C.J., made an order in the foregoing terms, and directed the question of costs to stand over.

Ex parte SIMPSON.

Dr. Greer moved, as a matter of urgency, on the petition of Isaac Simpson, tobacconist, of Cape Town, for a discovery order upon certain banks, and upon the Union-Castle Company, and an interdict restraining them from parting with any moneys belonging to petitioner which may be in their hands. Petitioner said that he was married in England to one Betsy Goldberg. Previous to September, 1905, he resided with his wife and family at a farm in the district of Heilbron, Orange River Colony. He afterwards went to Johannesburg to start business as a tobacconist, and left his wife and family and one Barney Levenson, who acted as his manager, at the farm. The farm and stock were afterwards sold, and the proceeds placed in a bank at Heilbron. After the manager had been paid, a sum of £563 approximately would remain from the sale of the farm and about £400 from the sale of the stock. This money was deposited by his wife in the bank. Petitioner afterwards disposed of his business in Johannesburg, and he was proposing to enter into other arrangements. He proceeded to Heilbron to obtain money from his wife, arriving there about the 17th May, but he was told by the station-master and other persons that his wife had gone to Cape Town. He followed her to Cape Town, and then ascertained that his wife had left for England in the Carisbrook Castle on the 16th May. He was now completely ruined and without funds. He had applied to the banks for information as to whether his wife had taken a draft, and to the Union-Castle Company as to whether she had obtained a letter of credit, but they declined to give him any information. He desired to obtain an interdict restraining the said banks and the steamship company from paying over any money in their hands to his wife, pending an action to be instituted for recovery of the said amount, or an order of disclosure as to whether his wife had taken a draft or letter of credit.

[De Villiers, C.J. (to counsel): Have you any precedent for such an application?]

Dr. Greer: I may say that more facts came to my knowledge than are stated in this petition, and I had not seen the petition until I actually read it in Court now.

[De Villiers, C.J.: In the first place, the parties do not live here. All these proceedings took place elsewhere, in the O.R.C. and the Transvaal. This lady passes through here, and now you make a fishing application to compel the banks to disclose certain facts to you.]

Dr. Greer: Having become acquainted with the contents of the petition, I feel that I cannot ask your lordship for an order.

No order was made.

Ex parte WARREN.

Mr. Roux moved on the petition of Henry Warren, of Maclear, as sole trustee in the insolvent estate of William Henry Watson, late of Belgrave, Mount Fletcher, for leave to examine certain persons on commission. Petitioner stated that Watson's estate was sequestrated in October 1905. On the 31st of that month a sum of £335 14s. 10d. was paid by John Brown Shearer, of Queen's Town, as chief agent for the North-Eastern District of the Colony of the Sun Insurance Office, to Messrs. Daines and Seymour, of Mount Fletcher, the agents for that district of the insurance company, for the purpose of paying over that sum to the said insolvent, whose attorneys Daines and Seymour were at that time. Daines and Seymour's office at Mount Fletcher was managed by one Wilfred Massingham Seymour. The insolvent had on October 31 last left the Colony, and had not returned. Petitioner believed that the money from his wife, arriving there Daines and Seymour partly in payment of monies due to the office by the insolvent, partly in payment of monies due to their clients, and partly in making a payment to Mrs. Watson, wife of the insolvent. The insolvent estate did not receive any portion of the said sum of £335 14s. 10d. Petitioner applied for the appointment of the Acting R.M. of Mount Fletcher and the R.M. of Queen's Town as commissioners to take the evidence of Mr. Seymour, Mr. Brown, and other witnesses whom petitioner might wish to have examined and for the production of books and other documents connected with the said payment.

Order granted as prayed.

N'DABA V. DEPUTY SHERIFF,) 1906.
MATATIELE.) May 23rd.

Magistrate's jurisdiction—Deputy Sheriff—Wrongful seizure.

The summons in a Resident Magistrate's Court alleged that the defendant, who is deputy sheriff in the district, wrongfully and unlawfully seized the plaintiff's cattle in execution of a writ of execution issued at the suit of A. against B. in a Supreme Court action and refused to return the cattle thus seized. The Magistrate upheld an exception to his jurisdiction on the ground that as the writ of execution had issued from the Supreme Court, the High Sheriff ought to have been sued.

Held, reversing the Magistrate's decision, that he had jurisdiction to try an action for the defendant's wrongful act in seizing the plaintiff's cattle in the district and refusing to return them when thereto requested.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Matatiele in an action brought by the present appellant against the respondent, as deputy-Sheriff, and in his individual capacity, for restitution of a certain wagon, etc., wrongfully and unlawfully seized by defendant, which defendant refused to give up, although requested so to do, and for £10 damages, sustained by reason of the wrongful and unlawful seizure aforesaid.

In the Court below, exception was taken by defendant, firstly, of want of jurisdiction, inasmuch as the action should have been against the High Sheriff in the Supreme Court, and, secondly, that the judgment creditor had had no notice of this action.

The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, said: "The Court upheld the first exception on the ground that the writ was directed to the High Sheriff, and the Deputy was acting only as his agent, and, therefore, dismissed the case, with costs."

It appeared that the judgment debtors were one Breakfast and Willie N'Daba.

Mr. Benjamin was for appellant, Matthew N'Daba; Mr. Burton was for respondent, Henry Francis Temple.

Mr. Benjamin submitted that the Magistrate was wrong, because the property which, according to the summons, belonged to the plaintiff, was attached in an action against another person. That was a wrongful attachment, and if it were a wrongful attachment it did not matter whether it were carried out by the Sheriff or by his Deputy, any person who took part in the transaction would be liable in an action by the party, whose property was seized. This was clearly a case of tort, and plaintiff might have sued all the parties jointly or individually. As to the question of jurisdiction, counsel submitted that the Magistrate in this case had ample jurisdiction, seeing that the district was in the Territories, and that the Resident Magistrate's jurisdiction was co-extensive with that of the Superior Court.

Mr. Burton submitted that, under the circumstances, the exception was sound. The writ was a Supreme Court writ upon a Supreme Court judgment. He did not wish to lay stress upon that fact, but it certainly was an element in the Magistrate's decision. The important point was that any action brought by a person against the Sheriff or his Deputy for a tort committed in the course of the Deputy's duty, should be brought against the High Sheriff. This was an action instituted against the Deputy-Sheriff in his capacity as Deputy Sheriff and personally. According to the English authorities, there was no question whatever that the High Sheriff was the person who should be sued.

De Villiers, C.J., called the High Sheriff (Mr. Reynolds), and asked him whether in his practice there had been any cases in which a deputy-sheriff had been sued?

The High Sheriff: Yes, repeatedly, my lord. It is not the practice to sue the High Sheriff, De Villiers, C.J. also pointed out that the High Sheriff had called his attention to the fact that Act 17, 1886 (section 8), recognised that the Deputy-Sheriff might be sued.

Mr. Burton: I admit that the Deputy-Sheriff may be sued under certain circumstances, where he has acted maliciously, but in this case he has, by virtue of his writ sent to him by the High Sheriff, attached certain property in the execution of his writ. I submit that, strictly speaking, defendant was right in saying: "I am not the proper person for you to sue, because I simply act in the course of my duty under the writ; if you have recourse against anybody you have only recourse against the person who directed me."

De Villiers, C.J.: The parties to this suit live in the district of Matatiele. The plaintiff sued the defendant, who was the Deputy-Sheriff in that district, for restitution of certain articles which he alleges were wrongfully and unlawfully seized by the Sheriff, and which the Sheriff (defendant) refuses to restore, although requested so to do. It is important to observe that the plaintiff was no party to the action in which the writ of execution was granted. He had nothing to do with that action. It may well be that if one of the parties to that action had been before the Court different considerations would have arisen, but here it is a third party who says: "My goods were wrongfully and unlawfully seized, and they were seized by the defendant." In my opinion, he was quite justified in suing the defendant in the Court at Matatiele for a wrongful act done in that district. The wrongful act consisted in seizing his property, and in refusing to restore that property after it had been claimed from him. The judgment ought to proceed in this case upon the assumption that the declaration states the facts. It may well be that when it comes to trial a different complexion will be put upon the matter. Exception was taken by the Deputy Sheriff that the action ought to have been brought against the High Sheriff, inasmuch as it was a Supreme Court action in which the writ of execution was granted. But the Supreme Court action did not authorise the Deputy Sheriff to seize the wrong person's goods, and if the Deputy Sheriff did a wrong of that kind, then the Deputy Sheriff must be answerable. I do not say that the High Sheriff will not be answerable—that is not the question—it may well be that both are answerable, but in my opinion the man who did wrong and who refuses to return the cattle seized is certainly liable. For this simple reason, I am of opinion that the Magistrate erred in holding that the Deputy Sheriff was not the person to be sued. The appeal will be allowed, with costs of appeal, and the case remitted to the Magistrate to be tried on the merits.

ZEEDERBERG AND DUNCAN { 1906.
V. HENRY. { May 23rd.

Guarantee—Power of attorney—
Manager of business—Authority.

During the absence of the defendant from the Colony his brother H. and another person were appointed his general agents for the management of his business in Cape Town. The plaintiff alleged that H., as such general manager, gave a verbal guarantee to the plaintiff for the payment of a debt due by one O. to the plaintiffs. The evidence was not sufficient to prove that such guarantee had been given, but:

Held, that even if such guarantee had been given, H. had no authority from the defendant, on his behalf, to guarantee the debts of third persons.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Cape Town in an action brought by appellants against respondent to recover a sum of £18 9s. 7d. upon a guarantee.

From the summons, it appeared that plaintiffs had had dealings with a firm called Ostrowsky and Ser. In 1901 Ser withdrew from the partnership business, and the business was continued by Ostrowsky. The plaintiffs said that they only consented to Ostrowsky continuing to trade without paying their account on condition that he provided a satisfactory security for payment of the amount owing. Defendant's brother H. Henry, who was managing defendant's business at the time, in November, 1901, acting for and on behalf of the defendant, interposed and verbally bound defendant as surety for the due payment of the said amount on demand being made from him by plaintiffs. There was a balance due of £18 9s. 7d., for goods supplied. Ostrowsky became insolvent, and his present whereabouts were unknown to plaintiffs. Defendant pleaded the general issue, and that his brother had no authority to bind him.

The record showed that in the Court below defendant's brother, H. Henry, gave evidence, and emphatically denied that he guaranteed the account to plaintiffs and bound his brother. He had never been interested in Ostrowsky and Ser's business, except in regard to a debt due to Henry.

The judgment of the Court below was for defendant, with costs.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan for appellants. Mr. Benjamin for respondent.

De Villiers, C.J., asked whether the defendant's brother, who was alleged to have acted under a power of attorney granted to him by defendant, who was out of the Colony, had authority to bind Nathaniel Henry as surety.

Mr. Buchanan: We say he was manager of the business. The debtor owed plaintiffs £28, and he owed Henry £158. He did this for the benefit of defendant's business. There was ample consideration for the security given. It was directly for the benefit of Henry that the business of Ostrowsky should not be sequestrated. Counsel went on to argue that it was clear from the evidence that the guarantee was given by defendant's brother. There was strong corroboration of plaintiffs' evidence by the fact of the letters written to defendant not having been returned. There was also a probability that the guarantee would be given by reason of the fact that Ostrowsky owed £158 to defendant at the time. The power of attorney held by defendant's brother was very general. Ostensibly he had the authority to bind the defendant.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Was anyone called in the Court below to swear that these letters were posted?]

Mr. Buchanan: No, but there is evidence that the letters were sent to the defendant.

Mr. Benjamin said that although the statute of frauds did not apply in this country, where a dispute existed as to whether a contract had or had not been entered into, the onus was upon plaintiff to prove conclusively to the satisfaction of the Court, that such contract had been entered into. There was no guarantee in writing in this case, and there was a dispute between the parties as to whether the alleged guarantee had been given. On a question of fact the Magistrate had found in favour of the defendant, and he submitted that there was ample evidence to support the Magistrate's decision.

De Villiers, C.J.: It appears to me that this is not a case in which the Court should interfere with the decision of the Court below. The plaintiffs sued on an alleged guarantee by the defendant of the debt of Ostrowsky. The guarantee is not in writing, and the Magistrate was right in requiring clear proof of such guarantee. He had the witnesses before him, and he was not satisfied that such guarantee had been given. Certain letters were put in which, if it had been proved that those letters had reached the defendant, I think would have gone far to prove the guarantee. I certainly attach more weight to those letters than the Magistrate did, but at the same time it is perfectly clear that there is not that proof which is always insisted upon in regard to letters which are relied upon to establish a contract, I say there is not such a clear proof of these letters having reached the person with whom the contract is sought to be established as to justify this Court now in reversing the decision of the Magistrate upon this question of fact. But there is this further difficulty, that assuming the guarantee is proved, I am not satisfied that Henry Henry had authority from Nathaniel Henry to enter into this contract on behalf of his brother. It is true that he was the manager of his business, and if it were a legitimate portion of that business to enter into transactions of this kind, it might fairly be said that the authority given to the brother would include the giving of the guarantee. Now, the only ground upon which it is stated in the present case that it was for the benefit of the defendant's business that the guarantee should be given is that Ostrowsky, the person whose debt was guaranteed, owed money to the firm of defendant, and that it was to his interest that the debt should be paid. But I am wholly unable to accept the proposition that a manager is entitled to enter into security for persons who owe that business any debts. It seems to be entirely outside the legitimate position of a manager to give a guarantee for the debts of third persons. There is a further difficulty in the present case, namely, that Henry Henry was not the sole manager of the defendant's business, but was joint manager with another under the power of attorney produced. Upon the question of fact, I am not satisfied that the Magistrate was wrong, and upon the question of law I am not satisfied that there is anything in the circumstances proved in the present case to show an implied authority to Henry Henry to enter into this contract on behalf of his brother Nathaniel Henry. Therefore, upon both grounds I shall not disturb the decision of the Magistrate, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

On the application of Mr. Buchanan, and with the acquiescence of Mr. Benjamin, De Villiers, C.J., altered the judgment of the Court below to absolute from the instance.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN and a Jury.]

SHERWOOD V. HOWARD AND (1906.
SCOTT. (May 30th.

Quantity surveyor—Commission.

This was an action to recover from the defendants £811 0s. 6d., for services rendered in connection with the building of the City Hall.

The plaintiff's declaration was as follows:

1. The plaintiff is an architect and quantity surveyor practising in Cape Town; the defendants, during the period in which the transactions now in question occurred, carried on business at Cape Town in co-partnership as builders and contractors, and were, inter alia, contractors to the Town Council for the erection of the City Hall at Cape Town.

2. (a) Towards the end of the year 1899 the defendants, with a view to submitting a tender for the erection by them as contractors of the proposed City Hall aforesaid, engaged the services of the plaintiff to assist them by furnishing information and supplying data for the purpose of and in connection with the framing of the said tender, and for his said services agreed to pay him a fee of £150. (b) Plaintiff duly discharged his duties in that behalf, and rendered the said services, and thereupon became and was and is now entitled to be paid the sum of £150.

3. (a) For a further count plaintiff says that the said tender was accepted by the said Council, and the defendants thereupon employed the plaintiff to assist them during the course of the construction of the said hall as their business manager, and to survey and measure up the work as it proceeded in connection with the original contract; and further in like manner to assist them in connection with other works the construction of which they might undertake contemporaneously with the building of the said Hall; and for the services to be so rendered they agreed to pay plaintiff one per centum on the contract price of the said works exclusive of the City Hall, and also one per centum on the total amount of the City Hall contract, including extras, and an additional remuneration of one and a half per centum on the amount of all the extras with respect to which plaintiff rendered any services, such extras constituting additions to and alterations in the specifications under the original contract for the said Hall (being in the result as regards the aforesaid extras two and one-half per centum on the amount thereof for remuneration). (b) as to the remuneration in respect of the said extras he says, alternatively, that two and one-half per centum is a fair, reasonable, and customary remuneration for the rendering of such services as aforesaid in respect of such extras.

4. The total cost of the City Hall was approximately £159,000 inclusive of extras. The plaintiff duly carried out the terms of his said employment, and performed his duties thereunder; and for his said services, exclusive of the additional remuneration in respect of extras, his remuneration of one per centum on the said sum amounted to £1,590, and he thereupon became and was and is now entitled to receive payment of the same, besides the special further remuneration of one and one-half per centum in respect of extras as hereafter set out.

5. During the construction of the said hall the said Council decided to substitute two marble staircases in lieu of two teak staircases originally specified and defendants supplied the same for an accepted price, according to tender, of £4,000; it was agreed between them and plaintiff that in consideration of a remuneration of £200, being at the rate of five per centum on the cost of the said staircases, the plaintiff should execute a design, frame the requisite plans and specifications, take out quantities, and draw up estimates to assist defendants in framing their tender. Plaintiff duly performed the several aforesaid duties as agreed and thereupon the sum of £200 became due and payable to him on that head; the said sum of £4,000 is included in the aforesaid amount of £159,000, and one per centum thereon, to wit, £40, is included in the aforesaid sum of £1,590, leaving the balance of £160 as now further due and payable to plaintiff.

6. (a) In addition to the above items of indebtedness, defendants are further indebted to plaintiff in the said special remuneration for work done and services rendered in terms of his said employment on, and in connection with, the aforesaid extras, the amount of these being £58,643 4s. 5d., and the remuneration thereon at one and one-half per centum, amounting to £880 3s. 3d., plaintiff duly discharged his duties and performed his work as aforesaid in respect of, and in connection with, such extras, and the said sum of £880 3s. 3d. is now due and payable to him; (b) he annexes hereto an account, which he prays may be regarded as herein inserted; the said account shows the aforesaid amounts of £150, £1,590, and £160, and also particulars of the several items, making up the additional remuneration of £880 3s. 3d. in respect of the aforesaid extras.

7. The defendants are furthermore indebted to plaintiff in the sums of £1,360 11s. 2d. (being item for sundry accounts) and £66 (being for services rendered in taking out quantities in connection of a building known as Solomon's Building.

The said sums of £1,380 11s. 3d. and £66 represent the remuneration for work duly done and services duly rendered under the aforesaid employment for and on behalf of the defendants contemporaneously with, but exclusive of, the work in connection with the said hall. Plaintiff has duly done the said work, and rendered the said services, and the remuneration therefor, in all £1,446 11s. 3d., is now due and owing to him. Particulars of the said amounts have been rendered to defendants, and the item of £1,380 11s. 3d. figures in plaintiff's favour in an account rendered on behalf of defendant to plaintiff.

8. The aforesaid several services and works were duly rendered and done during a period commencing with January 1899, and ending with December, 1905.

9. The total amount of the above indebtedness to plaintiff is £4,226 4s. 6d. This said amount has been reduced by payments made and cash received from time to time and contra items going to plaintiff's debit in the account between the parties, amounting in all to £3,415 14s., leaving a balance in plaintiff's favour of £811 0s. 6d., and such sum is now due and payable to him; but though all things have happened, all times elapsed, and all conditions been fulfilled entitling plaintiff to receive payment of the said amount from the defendants, they, and each of them, refuse to pay any part thereof.

Wherefore the plaintiff claims against the defendants jointly and severally: (a) Payment of the sum of £811 0s. 6d.; (b) interest a tempore morae; (c) alternative relief; (d) costs of suit.

The defendants' plea was as follows:

1. The defendants admit paragraphs 1 and 2 of plaintiff's declaration.

2. As to paragraph 3 (a) thereof they say that the plaintiff was employed as their surveyor and not as their business manager, his ordinary duties being to measure up and survey the work as it proceeded, to see that extras and alterations were properly allowed for, to assist in preparing statements of account showing work done upon which instalments of the contract price might be obtained, and generally to protect the defendants' interests in regard to work done by them. They admit that they agreed to pay the plaintiff 1 per cent. on the price obtained by them for such work, that is, 1 per cent. on the contract price and all extras allowed less deductions made.

3. During the progress of the work in connection with the foundation of the said City Hall, the plaintiff represented to the defendants that the extra work ordered, being under the surface, entailed more work upon him than was adequately remunerated by the said 1 per cent., and the defendants thereupon agreed to pay the plaintiff an additional half per cent. on the price of the extra foundations.

4. It was further agreed between the parties that in cases when plaintiff was required to frame bills of quantities and prepare estimates for certain work in addition to his duties as aforesaid, he should receive $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. upon the price of such work in addition to the 1 per cent. already stipulated for. The remuneration of the plaintiff was to be considered as due only upon the payment of each instalment of the contract price to the defendants.

5. The defendants deny that the plaintiff was entitled to an extra $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. upon the price of all extra work for the said City Hall, and, save as aforesaid, they deny the said paragraph 3 (a), and also paragraph 3 (b).

6. As to paragraph 4 of the declaration, the defendants say that the price of the said City Hall was £158,200, which price includes £4,000, the price of the marble staircase hereinafter mentioned. The settled accounts of the said contract to date amount to £154,200, and the defendants admit that the plaintiff is entitled to 1 per cent. thereon, viz., £1,542, but deny that he is entitled to the special further remuneration claimed in respect of all extras.

7. As to paragraph 5, the defendants admit having agreed to pay the plaintiff 5 per cent. upon the price of the said marble staircase, but say that in addition to the duties the plaintiff admits having undertaken, it was also part of his duty to measure up and survey work as it proceeded, and prepare accounts to enable defendants to obtain the architect's certificate for payment. The said work is not yet completed, the architect has not granted any certificate of payment in respect thereof, and the defendants have not received payment of the purchase price or any part thereof. The plaintiff has not yet discharged his duties in respect of the said staircase, and until the happening of the aforesaid events he is not entitled to his remuneration. The defendants deny that the said balance of £200 is due, but they have always been and are still willing to allow the plaintiff the said five per cent. in his account with them upon the fulfilment of the aforesaid events.

8. In regard to paragraph 6 of the declaration, the defendants crave leave to refer to their above pleas and say that the special remuneration to which they admit the plaintiff is entitled as set forth in paragraphs 3 and 4 hereof, amounts to £47 17s. in respect of extra foundations and £173 18s. 1d. on other items as specified in the defendants' account hereinafter referred to. They do not admit the correctness of plaintiff's said account.

9. The defendants admit paragraph 7 of the declaration.

10. As to paragraph 8 thereof, the defendants admit the approximate correctness of the date of commencement of the said work, but they deny that the plaintiff's services were completed in December, 1906, or are even yet completed.

11. As to paragraph 9, the defendants annex an account, which they pray may be considered as inserted herein, in which they show the amount they admit as due to plaintiff and the payments they have made to him. The said account shows the sum of £55 6s. 8d. as having been overpaid to the plaintiff up to date, but, as above set forth, the defendants are willing to allow the plaintiff a sum equal to five per cent. on the price of the said marble staircase upon the completion of the same and the payment to themselves of the price thereof, and to pay the plaintiff the said sum less the above sum of £55 6s. 8d. Subject to the above, they admit that they refuse to make any further payment to the plaintiff, and they deny that they are indebted to him in the sum claimed or any part thereof.

Wherefore, the defendants pray that the plaintiff's claim may be dismissed with costs.

Mr. McGregor (with him Mr. Lewis) for plaintiff. Mr. Burton (with him Dr. Greer) for defendants.

In the course of plaintiff's counsel's explanation to the jury, Buchanan, J., remarked that this was one of the very worst cases to put before a jury.

Mr. Burton agreed with his lordship, and suggested that the matters in dispute should be referred to an expert, and referred to a concrete point as to whether plaintiff was entitled to $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on extra foundations, or $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

Mr. McGregor applied to amend the declaration on this matter by striking out "extra."

[Buchanan, J.: Strike out as much as you like. There is no objection to striking out.]

Edmund James Sherwood, plaintiff, stated that the defendants approached him with reference to assistance in connection with the building of the City Hall and other works they might give contracts for. He was to receive 1 per cent. on the amount of the contract, on the actual money drawn, and a further $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on any extra work for which he rendered his services.

Mr. McGregor closed his case.

John Gibson Scott gave evidence for the defence, and in the course of his cross-examination stated that the plaintiff did nothing more than his ordinary duty when Mr. Howard was away. He was positive that the plaintiff did nothing extra. He did not know that £2,000 had been received in respect of the staircase. As regards the work done on the extra foundations by the plaintiff, he (plaintiff) stood on the top of the hall, someone gave him the measurements, and he put them down in his book.

Thomas Masterton, accountant, at present engaged liquidating the firm of Howard and Scott, stated that at the interview, at which Messrs. Scott and Littlewood were present, he did not hear the former make any mention of the foundations.

Cross-examined by Mr. McGregor: The plaintiff did not seem to be a sort of "football" for the defendant partners. Every time the plaintiff gave an account he went on a different line. Witness advised the plaintiff to have his account agreed upon before Scott left for England. It was a common thing for the plaintiff to come up to witness's office for cheques, but witness could not remember any particular one.

Counsel having addressed the jury on the facts,

Buchanan, J., said that he knew of no case more unfitted to come before a jury than the one on which they were asked to adjudicate. The action was brought on an account of some forty items, thirty of which were disputed. Under the Arbitration Act, it was clearly laid down, where an action was one of account merely, the Court was at liberty to refer it to a referee. Fortunately, the parties, after some delay and difficulty, had agreed to refer the account, in the main, to a referee, with the exception of two items, on which the jury would have to decide. It would be for the jury to say whether payment was to be made now on the marble staircase, or whether the plaintiff should await a settlement of account between the defendants and the Town Council, whether on the foundations the plaintiff was entitled to a half per cent. or one and a half per cent. on the extra foundations, and whether the percentage was to be on the whole of the foundations, or the extra ones.

The jury found that the plaintiff was entitled now to his commission on £1,997, as agreed upon in the schedule, with reference to items 2 and 4. With regard to No. 6, they found that the plaintiff was entitled to claim one per cent. on the whole of the foundations, and a half per cent on the extra foundations.

Judgment was entered accordingly; the Court ordering that the accounts between the parties be referred to a special referee for determination, the decision to be reported to the Court. Mr. Ransome was appointed referee, with powers under Act 29 of 1898, the matter of costs to be discussed when the question again came before the Court.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

HEYDENRYCH V. MACKIE. { 1906.
YOUNG AND CO. AND THE { June 1st.
STANDARD BANK OF S.A.

Mr. Searle, K.C., moved for leave to appeal to the Privy Council. The petition was filed in due course. Mr. Burton, for the respondent, applied to have the money in the bank not drawing interest allocated to the special fund on fixed deposit bearing interest to abide the decision of the appeal.

Application granted, the money to be put on a fixed deposit.

PHILLIPS V. MACDONALD.

Mr. Burton said that was return day of a service by edictal citation. The defendant, it appeared, went to German South-West Africa, and service had been effected on him by a German officer. A telegram to that effect had been received from the Deputy Sheriff of Kenhardt. Counsel said that the amount due was £119 for goods sold and delivered, but as the service had only been effected on the 25th May, he would apply for another fortnight's extension of the return day.

It was ordered that the further hearing of the case be postponed for a fortnight.

VUBO V. VUBO.

Mr. Lewis, for the petitioner, said this was the return day of a rule nisi calling on the defendant to return to the plaintiff, or show cause why a decree of divorce should not be granted. Affidavit of non-return was put in.

Decree of divorce granted.

Ex parte SCHUJA AND OTHERS.

Mr. Pymont moved to make absolute a rule nisi under the Derelict Lands Act.

Rule made absolute.

Ex parte ESTATE ZIMMERMAN.

This was an application on a notice to the respondent to show cause why an order should not be granted appointing Francis Guthrie a provisional trustee in the estate of Carl Zimmerman. The Master had threatened unless a trustee was appointed he would discharge the insolvent. Attorney Krige had proved certain claims and contended that one on a bond held by Dr. Viljoen entitled him to two votes and he proposed his partner, Mr. J. J. Moore, as trustee. Counsel for the applicant contended that Dr. Viljoen was not allowed to vote in respect of his bond, and at the same time in respect of an unsecured debt. The Magistrate came to the conclusion that he could not appoint either Mr. Moore or the applicant without consent. The applicant proposed that he should be appointed trustee along with Mr. Moore. Counsel for the respondent had an application for the appointment of Mr. Moore, who represented creditors to the extent of £251, as against £97 proved by the petitioner. He had not the majority in number but the majority only in value.

Mr. Burton was for the petitioner and Mr. Molteno for the respondent.

De Villiers, C.J.: Clearly the parties are not likely to come to an agreement. The Court must now exercise its power of appointing a provisional trustee, with power to liquidate and finally administer the estate. The person who really in fairness ought to be appointed is the person who represents the majority in number and value. It is true that under the 38th section, creditors whose claim does not reach £30 are not allowed to vote in number, but only in value, and if it is counted in that way, there would not be a requisite majority in number. But when the Court is asked to exercise its power to appoint a provisional trustee, it is quite justified in looking into all the circumstances of the case. The Court will appoint Mr. Moore as provisional trustee, with power to liquidate and administer the estate. As to the costs, I think they might fairly come out of the estate, the costs not to include the costs of the previous application, which must be paid by the applicant.

GUNTER V. LIQUIDATORS S.A. NITRATE SYNDICATE, LTD.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan applied to have a rule nisi calling on all concerned to show cause why a certain notarial servitude should not be cancelled made absolute.

Rule made absolute.

Ex parte KLEYNSHAUS.

Mr. Van Zyl moved to make absolute a rule nisi calling on the heirs in a certain estate to show cause why transfer of certain property should not be authorised.

Rule made absolute, the proceeds to be invested in the manner recommended by the Master.

Ex parte DU TOIT.

Mr. McGregor moved for an order, on notice of motion, calling on the respondent's attorneys to show cause why the applicant should not be released from tutelage of his guardian dative. The inheritance in the guardian's fund was no use to him in his farming operations. Although a minor, he was fully responsible for his actions, and he had experience of farming operations. There were affidavits to the effect that to delay investing the money now would be to the detriment of the young man.

The Master, in his report, said he could not recommend the granting of the application, on the ground that the capital was too small for the purpose required. The applicant was out of touch with his tutor dative, who was living in Hanover. The notice had been served on the tutor dative, and he did not oppose.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But he does not consent.]

Mr. McGregor: That is so.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Here we have the Master opposing it, and no consent on behalf of the tutor. I think the tutor should be approached to get his consent. I cannot agree with the Master that the sum is too small.]

Mr. McGregor pointed out that by his three years' absence in the Orange River Colony, the applicant was practically emancipated.

De Villiers, C.J., said there are special circumstances in this case which I think would justify the Court in coming to the petitioner's assistance. He no longer resides in this country, whereas the tutor resides here. The petitioner has been for some years a farmer in the Orange River Colony, and he now wishes to invest his money in that colony for the purpose of buying stock and hiring a farm upon which to keep the stock. I cannot agree with the view that the amount is not large enough for the purpose for which it is required. The amount is £497 10s., which would go a long way to buy sufficient stock for a young beginner. Under all the circumstances therefore I think, as the petitioner has an elder brother living with him in the Orange River Colony who will assist him in his efforts to make a living, and as this application is recommended by certain reverend persons where the petitioner lives, the Court should grant the assistance. On the whole, it is a case in which the Court should come to the assistance of the minor. The inheritance mentioned in the petition will be paid to the petitioner's major brother, and to the petitioner for the purpose of being invested for the benefit of the petitioner.

Ex parte MOCKE.

Mr. Pohl moved for an order confirming the sale of certain property. The Master recommended the application, but advised that an account of the proceeds should be lodged before transfer was allowed to pass.

Order granted in terms of the Master's report.

Ex parte PROVIDENT LAND TRUST.

Mr. McGregor moved, on the petition of the directors of the Provident Land Trust, for leave to rectify a certain register and re-issue certain shares.

An order was granted in similar terms to that of the Contats case.

Ex parte VAN RYNEVELD.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved for an order authorising the Master to assume the death of W. H. de Villiers, who had disappeared on March 16, at Gordon's Bay. Search parties had gone out, but no trace of him could be found. De Villiers was last seen walking along a dangerous path. He was indebted to the petitioner in the sum of £220, and as security petitioner held a policy on De Villiers' life for £500.

A rule was granted, calling on all concerned to show cause by August 1 why an order should not be made as prayed, publication to be made twice in English and Dutch newspapers circulating in Somerset West.

In re ESTATE GOLDBERG.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan moved for the appointment of Mr. A. T. Hennessy as provisional trustee in the estate of Joseph Goldberg, of Caledon-street, Cape Town.

Order granted subject to the Registrar being satisfied that the applicant is insolvent.

This was an application to make final a certain provisional order for the sequestration of the defendant's estate.

Applicant's affidavit stated that the provisional order was granted upon a petition, in which it was alleged that plaintiff had granted to defendant a mortgage bond for $5,000, hypothecating certain property. The bond had become due by reason of the non-payment of interest, judgment had been obtained on the bond, a writ of execution had been issued, and a return of nulla bona made, and the property had afterwards been sold to petitioner for $3,000. Petitioner said that the defendant's liabilities exceeded his assets, fairly valued, and that he was insolvent.

Respondent's answering affidavit denied that he owed the sum of $25,000 to plaintiff, or that he had committed an act of insolvency. He denied that his liabilities exceeded his assets, or that he was insolvent, and he put plaintiff to proof of his allegation that it would be for the benefit of his creditors that his estate should be sequestered. The property had, he said, cost him $7,000, and it had been sold to plaintiff for $3,000. He claimed that in terms of an agreement entered into with plaintiff he was discharged from liability, and that under that arrangement the property was taken over by plaintiff for the amount of the debt, and sold by public auction.

The replying affidavit of J. A. C. Graff denied that such an agreement as that referred to by defendant had been entered into with plaintiff.

Mr. Van Zyl was for plaintiff; Mr. W. Porter Buchanan was for defendant.

Mr Buchanan submitted that the plaintiff had not given clear proof of the alleged insolvency as required by section 4 of the Ordinance. It was not alleged in the summons that the defendant's liabilities exceeded his assets—fairly valued. True, that was alleged in the petition, but the petition was not served upon defendant. Furthermore, one Max had signed as surety, and it had not been shown that Max would not be able to pay up the deficiency of £2,000, so as to satisfy the debt.

De Villiers, C.J.: The petition is made up of a statement of facts, all of which go to prove that the man is hopelessly insolvent. The summons also states that the man was insolvent, but it does not enter into all the particulars of all the facts stated in the petition that the petitioner has referred to. I think there is clear prima facie evidence of insolvency, and the burden is upon defendant of disproving the statements made in the petition. That being so, the plaintiff is clearly entitled to sequestration of the defendant's estate. My only regret is that the defendant should set up a wholly hopeless defence of this kind, because practically he throws the expense of the defence upon the creditors. The final adjudication will be granted.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for leave to examine certain witnesses on commission in an action instituted by applicant, who lives at Barkly East, against respondent, for delivery of a certain erf and for £50 damages. The matter had, since the proceedings were commenced, been narrowed down to a question of damages, respondent having tendered delivery of the erf. Applicant said she was too poor to pay for her witnesses to come to Cape Town.

Mr. Roux (for respondent) read an affidavit by his client, who said that he was opposed to the application in the interests of justice, which would be best served by the witnesses appearing personally and giving their evidence before a Judge.

Having heard Mr. De Villiers in argument on the facts,

De Villiers, C.J., said that the application would be refused, costs to be costs in the cause. He added: My reason for making costs in the cause is that it may appear at the trial that this is a case of gross imposition on the part of defendant in defending the action, and that the plaintiff really had good reason for having her case tried in this way. I have not sufficient information before me to satisfy me as to the question of costs.

Contempt of Court—Letters of demand bearing Imperial Arms—Holding out as an attorney.

This was an application for an order of attachment against respondent, O. Rivera, for contempt of Court by reason of his having issued certain letters of demand bearing the Imperial Arms, purporting to be signed by an attorney of this Court, and intending the public to believe that it was a process issued out of a Court of Justice. Mr. P. S. T. Jones was for the applicant society; respondent appeared in person.

Mr. Jones read an affidavit by Mr. R. B. Sanderson, secretary of the Law Society, who laid before the Court certain letters of demand and a post-card alleged to have been sent by respondent to certain employees of the Railway Department demanding payment of certain fees for tuition in the Spanish language. The documents purported to be signed by L. Matthews and Co. attorneys.

Respondent (in answer to the Court) said that the letters were sent out by one Matthews, who has since gone to Argentina. He obtained these letter forms from the "Cape Times" office. Respondent was a Spaniard, and had been in this country about four years. He had not heard of previous cases in which proceedings had been taken by the Law Society in regard to the use of such letter forms. Respondent bought the forms for Mr. Matthews. He first went to Townshend, Taylor, and Snashall's, and they said that they had none, and referred him to the "Cape Times," Limited, where he got a number of forms. He was a tutor in foreign languages and mathematics. He had not signed the letters.

De Villiers, C.J.: If the respondent in this case had not been a foreigner, I should have been inclined to deal somewhat severely with the case, by committing him for fraud, but as a foreigner he seems not to have been aware that the paper he was using was calculated to impose on others. He finds these documents for sale at the "Cape Times" office, and he naturally concludes that they are documents that he can utilise for the purpose of obtaining payment of what he considers a debt due to him. In similar cases before other Judges they held that the use of such a paper for the purpose of obtaining payment of debts is really a contempt of this Court, Law Society v. Donner and Co. (15 C.T.R., 213), but it is unnecessary for me to express an opinion on the point. In the present case the offence is aggravated by the fact that there is the signature of L. Matthews and Co., attorney, whereas such an attorney is not known in this country. I am prepared to accept the statement of the respondent that this Matthews has left the Colony. He shows from his books that he has had transactions with Matthews, and it is quite possible not only that Matthews might have signed the notes but that he might have said that he was an attorney. However, it is not clear to me that the handwriting is that of the respondent. Under these circumstances I shall not commit the respondent, but I think that the costs of this application should be borne by him, as he has necessitated the application by his conduct. There will be no order except that the respondent pay the costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

REX V. HENDRICKS. { 1906.

Act 23 of 1879—Domestic servant—Illegal conviction.

Mr. Justice Buchanan said that among the cases which had come before him as Judge of the week was one against Jantje Hendricks, a coloured female, who was tried before the special J.P. of Vosburg, Victoria West Division, for contravening section 2, Act 23, of 1879 (the Vagrancy Act), in that she was found wandering abroad and having no visible lawful and sufficient means of support. She pleaded not guilty, but was convicted and sentenced to seven days' imprisonment. She was a domestic servant at the place where she had been in employment, but because a special J.P. wanted a servant she was arrested and sent to prison. Such a conviction could not possibly stand. Unfortunately, before the case came under review, this imprisonment had been served, but it was just as well to have the conviction quashed. The conviction would be quashed.

STEWART V. STEWART.

This was an action brought by Charles Langley Stewart, of Stellenbosch, against his wife, Mary Stewart, described as of the Alexandra Club, Cape Town, for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce and forfeiture of the benefits of the marriage in community. Dr. Greer was for plaintiff; defendant was in default.

Wm. Thomas Birch, of the Colonial Office, produced a register containing entry of marriage.

Charles Langley Stewart, messenger of the R.M.'s Court at Stellenbosch, said he was married in community of property to defendant at the English Church, Stellenbosch, on October 8, 1903. His wife did not bring "a stitch" into the community. In May, 1904, his wife left him, and had not returned to him. He had not since contributed towards her maintenance. He had not given her any cause to leave him. The sole trouble, as far as he knew, was in connection with the children by his first marriage. The letter (produced) was signed by his wife and contained these words: "I refuse absolutely to return to him."

[De Villiers, C.J.: I see your wife is described as of the Alexandra Club. What is she doing there?]

Witness said he did not know anything about that. He had had no communications with his wife since she deserted him. Witness added that he had no desire to press for costs of suit against his wife.

Decree of restitution granted, defendant to return to or receive the plaintiff on or before July 1, failing which rule to issue calling upon defendant to show cause on July 14 why a decree of divorce should not be granted and defendant declared to have forfeited benefits of the marriage.

SMITH AND CO. V. S.A. NEWS- } 1906.
PAPER CO. } June 5th.

Libel—Animus injurandi—Harbour Board—Fair report of debate—Malice—Public body.

The bona fide publication in a newspaper of a fair and impartial report of a discussion at a meeting of the Table Bay Harbour Board upon a matter of public interest is not actionable even if it includes injurious statements regarding the conduct of an individual.

This was an action brought by James Smith, trading as James Smith and Co., forwarding agents, Cape Town, against the South African Newspaper Co., Ltd., to recover £500 as damages for the publication of certain alleged false and defamatory words in the defendants' newspaper, the "South African News."

Plaintiff's declaration was in the following terms:

1. The plaintiff has for several years carried on, and still carries on, business at Cape Town as a shipping and forwarding agent, under the style of Jas. Smith and Co. The defendant is a company duly registered in this colony with limited liability, and is the proprietor, printer, and publisher of the "South African News," a daily newspaper having an extensive circulation in the city of Cape Town and elsewhere in South Africa.

2. On or about the 10th March, 1906, the defendant company wrongfully, falsely, and maliciously printed and published, or printed and caused to be published, in and by their said newspaper of and concerning the plaintiff, and of and concerning him in the way of his said business, the following false and defamatory words, with headings and introductory statements calculated to draw special attention to the same:

FORWARDING AGENTS' CHARGES.

TWO FIRMS' LICENCES SUSPENDED.

PROTECTING THE PUBLIC.

The General Manager of the Cape Government Railways has written to the Harbour Board dealing with the cash-on-delivery system of forwarding goods, and in the course of his communication serious charges are made against certain local forwarding agents (meaning, amongst others, the plaintiff). The letter was read at yesterday's meeting of the Harbour Board, and was as follows:

"It has been brought to my notice that in certain instances the 'c.o.d.' (meaning the 'cash-on-delivery') system is being abused by private forwarding agents, who make use of it for the purpose of extorting excessive charges from passengers, and I subjoin particulars of two cases in point, which have been quoted to me as examples . . . (the first alleged example, relating to a firm other than the plaintiff, is here omitted).

"Consignment for Mr. S. Gordon, Johannesburg, forwarded by Messrs. Jas. Smith and Co., Cape Town (meaning the plaintiff) on April 1, 1906. The forwarding agents' (meaning the plaintiff's) charges amounted to £9 12s. 1d., although only £2 4s. 11d. of this amount would appear to refer to this consignment, the other two items of £1 12s. 8d. and £5 14s. 6d. apparently having no connection therewith. This consignment is still on hand at Johannesburg, the consignee (meaning the said Gordon) having refused to accept it. The goods will probably be sold by the C.S.A.R. (meaning the Central South African Railways) to meet expenses.

"WHY CAPE TOWN HAS A BAD NAME.

"It seems to me that cases such as the aforementioned (meaning such a case as inter alia that of plaintiff) constitute one of the reasons why Cape Town is acquiring a bad name as a landing port for the Transvaal, and I think it is desirable, in the interests of the port, that the forwarding of traffic be taken out of the hands of private forwarding agents altogether, and the whole of the work performed by the Board.

"I am aware that considerable opposition would be shown to such a course, but it seems to me that to give adequate protection to the travelling public demands the abolition of the outside baggage agent."

Mr. L. Wiener, who presided, said one of the two firms was the same firm against whom there had been a complaint recently, when it was told them that if it occurred again their licence would be withdrawn. He suggested that the firm's licence should be suspended. He believed some of the firms had done their work well.

Mr. Hammerley-Heenan said that two or three firms had done their work very well indeed. He thought the best thing the Board could do would be to adopt the chairman's suggestion, and so weed out the bad ones.

Mr. Wiener said all the agents should be informed that if their charges exceeded those laid down by the Board, their licences would be suspended, and that meanwhile the licences of the two firms in question (meaning, among others, the plaintiff's) be suspended. It was a serious matter that the port should suffer for the alleged misdeeds of certain agents (meaning, among others, the plaintiff) who made their living out of it.

Mr. A. J. Robb said that certain agents purposely delayed the baggage until the passenger had gone away, and then sent it on under the "c.o.d." system, so that the owner could not obtain the baggage until the charges were paid.

It was tacitly agreed to adopt the chairman's suggestions.

As the said words meant, and were intended to mean, that the plaintiff was a licensed outside baggage agent, and as such handled and dealt with the luggage and baggage of persons arriving at the Cape Town port, and that he had been entrusted with, or had undertaken, the business of clearing at and through the port of Cape Town, and thereafter forwarding to Johannesburg, the baggage or luggage of one S. Gordon; that plaintiff, on 1st April, 1906, delivered the said baggage or luggage to the officers of the Cape Government Railways, to be delivered to the said Gordon at Johannesburg, on the cash-on-delivery system (in vogue on the Cape Government Railways and Central South African Railways), i.e., with instructions to the said officers to demand on behalf of plaintiff and prior to delivery certain payments from the said Gordon, and that the demands of payment thereby made constituted extortionate and excessive charges as against the said Gordon, that the latter, refusing to pay such extortionate and excessive charges, failed accordingly to obtain delivery of the said luggage or baggage; that plaintiff's conduct in making such charges was extortionate, oppressive, improper, and disgraceful, and tended to bring Cape Town into disrepute as a landing port for the Transvaal; that such misconduct on the part of the plaintiff and others rendered it expedient, in the interests of the said port, and for the protection of the travelling public, that the Harbour Board itself should undertake the clearing and forwarding of such traffic, to the exclusion of the baggage agent; and that, in the view of the chairman and the Board, the licences of the plaintiff and another firm as baggage agents should be suspended owing to their misdeeds; and that, generally, plaintiff had acted improperly, oppressively, and disgracefully in his said business.

4. By reason of the above false, malicious, and defamatory words, the plaintiff has been greatly prejudiced and injured in his character, credit, and reputation, and in the way of his said business, and has sustained damage in the sum of £500.

Wherefore, plaintiff claims: (a) Payment of the sum of £500 as and for damages; (b) alternative relief; (c) costs of suit.

Defendants, in their plea, denied that they were liable for any damages to the plaintiff in, or about the publication of the said report, or that the plaintiff had sustained any damages. The comments made by members of the Harbour Board were published without malice, and as part of the proceedings of the Table Bay Harbour Board, the said meeting being of a public nature, and open to members of the public, and the said report was a correct account of what transpired at the said meeting on a matter of public interest. Defendants prayed that the claim might be dismissed with costs.

Mr. McGregor (with him Mr. J. E. R. De Villiers) for plaintiffs. Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Mr. Van Zyl) for defendants.

James Smith (the plaintiff) said he carried on business as a shipping and forwarding agent in Cape Town under the style of James Smith and Co. He had been in business in Cape Town about nine years. On seeing the report in the "S.A. News," he immediately instructed his attorneys to make a demand on the defendant to withdraw the statement. On the following Monday, the 12th March, he wrote to the editor of the "News" denying statements in the report. The letter was not published, but on the 13th March a note was inserted in the paper in which it was stated that they had received a communication from Mr. James Smith, trading as James Smith and Co., in which he stated that the statements made concerning his firm by Mr. A. J. Robb at Friday's meeting of the Harbour Board were incorrect. He was afterwards informed that the matter would be considered at a meeting of the Board of Directors, but he had received no further notification from the defendant. The report had affected his business.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Did any other paper publish the proceedings?]

Mr. McGregor: Oh, yes, my lord.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The reason why I ask the question is that it may be difficult to identify damages accruing from one publication from damages accruing from another.]

Mr. McGregor: I shall also put in a copy of the "Cape Times" containing the report.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Have proceedings been taken against the other paper?]

Mr. McGregor: A summons has been taken out against the other paper.

Witness (continuing his evidence) said that he had his regular business, and what he called his casual business. His business with his regular clients had been as much as usual, in fact, he had done rather more business with them. He took steps to inform his regular clients of the real state of things after the report had appeared. His business with his casual clients had suffered considerably. He had prepared an abstract of his casual business. This showed that in March, 1905, the amount was £12 10s. In March of this year up to the 10th, the amount was £3 3s. Between the 12th and 31st March the amount was £1. In April the amount was £1 18s., and in May it was nil. The average for twelve months was £9 8s.

Cross-examined: Witness did not object merely to the letter of Mr. Robb; he also objected to the publication. He objected to the "News" not publishing the whole of his letter of the 12th March. He did not offer to indemnify the "News" in case Mr. Robb brought an action against the proprietors for libel in describing his statements he had made as false and reckless. Witness had issued summonses against Mr. Robb and the "Cape Times." The "Times" had published his letter in full. It was an exact copy of the letter he had sent to the "News." All the same, he had since summoned the "Times." He attributed the fact of his having no business in May to the publications in the "News" and "Times." He would not suggest that the defendant's paper had any malicious intention towards him.

Re-examined: The "Cape Times" left out the words "and reckless" from the letter which they published.

Cross-examination continued: Witness was formerly a baggage agent, but when the new system came into force about two years ago he did not take out a licence, because it would not pay him to make the deposit. His casual business was not in baggage, but in cargo. No licence was required for the business that he carried on.

By the Court: He sent a consignment to Mr. Gordon at Johannesburg. The goods were still lying at Johannesburg. Witness's charges were for storing and delivering the goods, the amount being £9 12s. 1d. The value of the goods sent was about £10. The goods had been in store for about two years. The charge for forwarding the last consignment was 14s., plus 24 19s. 6d. for storing the goods for two years. The price was agreed upon with Mr. Gordon.

Frederick C. Donovan, sub-editor of the "South African News," and formerly a reporter of the "Cape Times," said that he attended the meeting of the Harbour Board on the 8th March, and took a report for the "Times." The report produced was a correct account of the proceedings. The "News" reporter was also present. No member of the public was present at the meeting.

By the Court: Witness did not know whether the meeting was open to the public. He had never seen a member of the public present at the meeting.

Cross-examined: The reporters always attended the meetings of the Board. The proceedings of the Board were reported in the three daily papers in Cape Town. The report of the "Times" was identical with that which appeared in the "News," the only difference being in the head-lines.

Mr. McGregor closed his case.

J. F. Sandeman, assistant secretary of the Harbour Board, said that he had been in the Board's employ eleven and a half years. Any member of the public would, he thought, be admitted if he wished to be admitted. He had never heard of anyone being excluded, but he had never heard of anybody asking to be admitted.

Arnold Buyskes, a reporter of the "News," said that he took the report in question on behalf of his paper. The report in the "News" was a correct account of the proceedings of the Board.

Mr. Searle closed his case.

Mr. McGregor said that this case brought into relief two important considerations. The first was the fact that newspapers fulfilled a useful and recognised public function, but the second consideration was that, on the other hand, conversely, a private individual had the right to come to the Court and say that the power of the press should not be exercised in a way to unduly press upon him as a private individual. The words in this case were clearly defamatory. It was alleged of a forwarding agent that he levied excessive and extortionate charges. That was a very serious allegation to make against a man in the plaintiff's position. The injuria was clear, and the onus was upon the defendants to justify the injuria which the plaintiff had suffered at their hands. This was not a case of whether it was a matter of fair comment on matters of public interest. The plaintiff did not allege malice against the defendants. The law had protected fair comment, and perhaps our leading case was that of Upington v. Smit-Solomon (Buch., 1879-276). That case, however, was not touched by the present case, because what was complained of here was, in addition to wrongful allegations, mistaken allegation. He would at once draw their lordships' attention to the head-line. The head-line was unfortunate, because it said "Two Firms' Licences Suspended," thus giving a false impression, as plaintiff had no licence.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The real point for decision is whether a different principle should be applied to a report of a meeting of a public body like the Harbour Board from that which is applied to judicial proceedings.]

Mr. McGregor: Or Parliamentary proceedings.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Supposing what is said by Mr. Robb in this report had been said in a Court of Justice, would it have been actionable?]

Mr. McGregor said that he did not think so.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Any decision on this point would, I suppose, equally apply to Parliamentary proceedings? Papers publishing Parliamentary reports would be equally liable?]

Mr. McGregor: No, my lord.

[Buchanan, J.: Why not?]

Mr. McGregor: One is not for a moment prepared to say that a Court would in the least degree hamper anyone publishing Parliamentary proceedings. He added that, of course, he had not specially considered the point.

[Buchanan, J.: It is privileged for the Court to order witnesses out and prohibit publication until the case is finished.]

Mr. McGregor said that reporters were members of the public, and the point was whether, in a special case, they might not be asked to withdraw, or not to report the proceedings. Counsel cited the case of Davis v. Duncan (43 L.J.C.P., 185), in which Lord Chief Justice Campbell said that a fair report of what took place in a Court of Justice was privileged, but that privilege was not extended to a public meeting. Matters might be perfectly relevant, but injurious to the character of a man who had no opportunity of vindicating his character. The subject matter of a libel might be of public interest, and the report a fair one, without malice, yet the occasion may not be privileged. Counsel also cited the case of Dunning v. the "Cape Times", where the defendants were held liable, as they took little trouble to ascertain whether the newspaper, "Owl," which they printed, contained libellous matter. There were many other cases to show that repetition did not save the person who published defamatory matter. On the question of damages, counsel would leave that matter in their lordships' hands.

Mr. Searle said the case raised a point of considerable importance, and counsel was unable to find any direct authority in Roman Dutch Law as to whether a fair and impartial report of the proceedings of a public body, such as the Harbour Board, was protected or not, whether an action could be brought for anything which might appear in a fair and impartial report in the ordinary course of the proceedings of the Harbour Board. Counsel admitted that if any member attacked someone else and that appeared in a newspaper, possibly a different rule might obtain. The same principle which applied to a court of law must also apply to proceedings at a public body such as the Harbour Board or the Town Council. Very often the proceedings at public bodies such as counsel mentioned were of greater public interest than that which took place in a court of law. As long as the reporter gave a fair and impartial report in such matters counsel contended no action could be taken against the newspaper. The paper was simply performing an ordinary public duty. It was admitted that the proceedings were public, and that the Harbour Board was a public body.

Mr. McGregor having been heard in reply,

De Villiers, C.J.: This is an action against the proprietors and publishers of a newspaper for damages for an alleged libel published by that paper concerning the plaintiff. The defamatory words relate to certain charges made by the plaintiff as shipping and forwarding agent, and they are contained in a report published by the paper of the proceedings at a meeting of the Table Bay Harbour Board. The discussion at the meeting arose out of a letter addressed by the General Manager of Railways to the Harbour Board and complaining of the abuse by the plaintiff of the "cash-on-delivery" system of collecting charges. The letter led to a discussion on the part of the members of the Board, in the course of which the conduct of the plaintiff was condemned, and it was suggested by the Chairman that the plaintiff's licence as forwarding agent should be suspended. The suggestion was adopted at the meeting, but it now appears that, as a fact, the plaintiff never held a forwarding licence.

It is not seriously denied that the report is a fairly accurate statement of what took place at the meeting of the Board, and it is not suggested that the defendants were actuated by personal spite in reporting these proceedings. The report was published in the usual and ordinary course of a newspaper's business, and it does not differ in any material point from a report of the meeting as published in the "Cape Times." The Harbour Board is a body having important public duties to perform under Act 36 of 1896 in connection with the landing, warehousing and delivery of goods shipped to Table Bay. Three of the members are nominated by the Governor and two are selected by persons who had in the previous twelve months paid £10 in customs duties; the Mayor of Cape Town is an ex officio member, and the Chamber of Commerce for Cape Town is entitled to nominate one member. There is no provision in the Act enacting that the meetings shall be open to the public, but in point of fact no impediment has ever been placed in the way of the public attending. Reporters for the newspapers have always attended the meetings, and the proceedings have been regularly reported in the newspapers. At the meeting now in question one of the subjects of discussion was the rate of charges made by agents for forwarding goods to Johannesburg. The matter was of considerable public interest and one which the newspapers would fairly be expected to report upon in due course. The question therefore arises whether a fair and impartial report of the proceedings is actionable by reason of its casting an aspersion on the conduct of the plaintiff. If, instead of at a meeting of the Harbour Board, the statements in question had been made by a witness in the course of a judicial proceeding there would have been no doubt as to the answer which should be given to the question. In the case of Webb v. Sheffield (3 E.D.C., 254) it was held by the Eastern Districts Court that the bona fide publication in a newspaper of a fair and impartial report of judicial proceedings which contained injurious statements is not actionable. In England a similar rule holds good, but, until the rule was extended by the Act of 1888 to the publication of the proceedings of vestries and such like public bodies, the plea that the alleged libel was a fair and impartial report of the proceedings of such a public body, was not held to be a good defence. In this Colony the question has never before been raised and the Court has now to fall back upon the general principles of the Dutch law for a solution of the question. One of those principles is that an injurious statement or publication is not actionable unless there is an animus injurandi, the existence of which must be gathered from the circumstances (see Voet, 47—10—20). If the circumstances attending the publication of an ordinary report of a judicial proceeding are sufficient to exonerate the publisher, I fail to see why a fair and impartial report of the proceedings at a meeting of a public body like the Harbour Board in regard to a matter of public interest should expose the publisher to an action for libel at the suit of a person whose conduct has been unjustly condemned at such meeting. If it is to be held libellous to publish such proceedings, why should it not be equally libellous to publish injurious statements made in the course of a debate in Parliament? Upon this point the Act (1 of 1854) to secure freedom of speech in Parliament and to give protection to persons employed in the publication of parliamentary papers does not offer much assistance. The statutory protection applies only to publications authorised by either House of Parliament, and if the bona fide but unauthorised publication of debates containing injurious statements is to be held not to be actionable, it can only be under our Common law relating to injuries. For myself I have always been anxious to uphold the right which every person has to protection against injurious attacks on his character or reputation: but the necessity for such protection is not so great as to be allowed to override the public good. If it is for the public good that the press should be unhampered in its publication of fair reports of parliamentary debates it would be impossible to hold that the animus injurandi exists in every case where a newspaper publishes a statement made in the course of such debates which is injurious to the character of an individual. On the contrary I consider that prima facie there exists no animus injurandi and that the burthen of proving the contrary lies on the person complaining of the publication. I am not prepared to say that the same principle would apply to the publication of speeches made at an ordinary public meeting. The question does not now arise and I express no opinion upon the point except to say that there may be a difference between a public meeting called by private individuals and addressed by irresponsible speakers and a meeting attended by the responsible members of a public body having important public duties to perform. The presumption of the absence of an animus injurandi might fairly be held to be stronger where the proceedings of such a public body are faithfully reported and commented upon. The object of the promoters of a public meeting might be to defame particular individuals and no public interest would be served by the publication of the speeches: but a body like the Harbour Board is not likely to attack the conduct of an individual except in the performance of the public duties intrusted to it. The publication, therefore, of speeches made at the Harbour Board upon matters of public interest appears to me to be one of those circumstances from which the absence of animus injurandi might fairly be inferred. If such publication is permissible, then, in my opinion, fair comment should also be permissible. I therefore do not attach much weight to the few lines of comment introducing the report of the proceedings now in question, or to the headline "two firms' licences suspended," upon which much reliance has been placed by the plaintiff's counsel.

I quite agree that sensational headlines should be avoided, and that their incorrectness may furnish proof of the existence of the animus injurandi; but in the present case the headline is justified by what was actually said at the meeting. In fact the plaintiff possessed no licence which could be suspended, but the members of the Board seem to have assumed that he held a licence, and they adopted the suggestion of the Chairman that such licence should be suspended. In the absence of any proof of express malice I am of opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to succeed in this action, and that judgment must be for the defendant with costs.

Buchanan, J.: This is a case which is not governed by any previous decision in this Court, I wish also to express my opinion as to the deduction which I think the Court ought to draw from the general principles of law which prevail in this country. This is an action for damages for libel, arising out of a report published in a newspaper. The statements contained in the report are, no doubt, damaging to the plaintiff, and I would go so far as to say that a statement made in the report is not correct, and they were not justified in charging plaintiff with extorting excessive charges from passengers, so that the plaintiff's licence has been suspended. The question is, what duty was imposed upon the newspaper in this matter? I think a newspaper is justified and entitled to report judicial proceedings, Parliamentary proceedings, and those of all public bodies, such as the Harbour Board. In this case, the duty is imposed upon the reporter to make accurate reports, giving the whole of the material circumstances of the case. The reporter is not justified in adding any comments or notes of his own which may affect the report. As His Lordship the Chief Justice has pointed out, what has been added in this case by the reporter may or may not affect the result. In this case, I think, the headlines were justified by the facts which took place at the meeting, but it is desirable that the reports should be kept distinct from matters of comment. The report must be a record, a history, of the actual proceedings. I think the reporter should bear these things in mind. If a fair and accurate report is made of public proceedings, it is, prima facie, done without malice, which is the foundation of all these actions. It must also be borne in mind that reports must be for the public benefit and for information. They must not be maliciously done. You must not introduce into reports matters which are not of public benefit, and if this also is borne in mind, I think the principle would be a guide to the newspapers in reporting the proceedings of any public body. I wish to make these few remarks mainly because,

I say, in this case it is a declaration of a principle which has not previously been decided in the Court; but otherwise I agree fully with what the Chief Justice has said. Judgment will be given for defendant with costs in this case, not because the charges were true, but because the publication of this report shows no malice on the part of defendant. It must not be assumed that the charges are true, but that the publication was without malice.

Town Council—Gas Company— Negligence—Costs.

This was an action brought by the Metropolitan Tramways Company, Limited, against the Town Council of the city of Cape Town and the Cape Town and District Gas, Light and Coke Company, Limited, to recover damages in three sums amounting to £3,777, sustained by an explosion in Adderley-street, alleged to have been occasioned by the defendants' negligence.

Plaintiffs, in their declaration, formally set out the parties in the first and second paragraphs. In paragraph 3 they said that for many years past, and prior to 1902, there existed a certain sewer, which was laid by the Council, from the top of Adderley-street and underneath the said street to the sea. The said sewer was always under the direct control and supervision of the Council, and it was the duty of the said Council at all times to take due and proper care that the same was in a proper state of repair. In paragraph 4 the plaintiffs said that the sewer had been used up to the year 1897 by the Council for the discharge of sewage, but in or about that year the said user ceased, and the said sewer was used by the defendant Council for storm-water purposes, and was thereafter disused altogether. The sewer was blocked at certain points. The declaration proceeded: (5) In or about the year 1892 the defendant company, with the knowledge, consent, and approval of the defendant Council, laid across and underneath Adderley-street a high-pressure gas main or pipe for the conveyance of gas, and the said main intersected the said sewer at a point near the railway station; the said main was thereafter, with the defendant Council's knowledge and consent, used for the conveyance of coal gas and water gas from the defendant company's works at Woodstock to the said company's works in Long-street, whence the said gas was distributed to premises in Cape Town requiring the same, as part of the business of the said company; (6) the said gas main was laid in such a manner as to intersect the crown of the aforesaid sewer, and was at a certain point in or near Adderley-street in direct communication with the interior of the said sewer; (7) in or about the month of June, 1905, the said sewer was in a condition dangerous to the public and persons lawfully using Adderley-street; (8) the said dangerous condition arose from the acts, neglect, and default of the defendant Council in blocking up the said sewer at points opposite Darling-street and below the Railway Station, and leaving no proper ventilation therein, and in permitting and consenting to the laying of the gas main intersecting the said sewer, and having access thereto as aforementioned; and it also arose from the leaky condition of the defendant company's gas mains and pipes as hereinafter described; (9) it was the duty of the defendant company to keep the said gas mains and other gas mains or pipes laid and used by them in due and proper order, to prevent the escape of any gas therefrom by way of leakage from the mains or otherwise, and it was the duty of the defendant Council to take due and proper steps to inspect the said gas mains and pipes from time to time and to ascertain whether they were in proper order, and to insist upon the said company putting and keeping the same in proper order; (10) not regarding its duty in that behalf, the defendant company, prior to June 13, 1905, allowed its gas mains or pipes to become in a leaky condition, either in or near Adderley-street, at or near the point where the said high-pressure main intersected the said sewer or at some other portion of the defendant company's system of pipes, and in consequence of the above neglect, for some time prior to June 13, 1905, gas was allowed to escape from the defendant company's mains or pipes into the said sewer, and the said Council, not regarding its duty in that behalf, failed and neglected to keep the said sewer free of gas and to prevent gas from the mains or pipes of the defendant company filling the sewer, and neglected to inspect the said mains and pipes to ascertain whether they were in proper order, and to insist that they should be kept in proper order; (11) on or about June 13, 1905, the gas that had escaped into the sewer ignited, from some cause unknown to the plaintiff company, and, in consequence of such ignition, an explosion occurred in Adderley-street, and the tram-lines of the plaintiff company were ripped up, broken, and destroyed, and the works of the plaintiff company in the said street injured for a considerable length; in paragraph 12 the plaintiffs said that by reason of the damage the street was closed to traffic for a considerable period, the line had to be relaid, and during that time they suffered loss through not earning the profits they otherwise would have earned, and incurred considerable expense in the management of business, costs of supervision of traffic, and legal expenses; in the final paragraph of their declaration plaintiffs said: "All things have happened, all times have elapsed, and all conditions have been fulfilled necessary to entitle the plaintiff company to recover from the defendants, jointly or one or other of them, the aforesaid sums of £1,044, £2,033, and £700, being damages sustained by reason of the defendants' negligence."

The plea of the defendant Council was as follows:

1. Paragraphs 1, 2, and 4 are admitted.

2. (a) The Council admits that for very many years past and prior to the year 1892 there existed a certain old sewer extending from the upper part of the town and thence from the top of Adderley-street down the said street to the sea. The said sewer was originally open, but was subsequently covered up. It had not been constructed by the Council, but was under its control. Prior to and since the year 1892 the Council had no knowledge of, and there was no reason to apprehend or contemplate danger from the sewer to persons lawfully using the streets of Cape Town. (b) Save as above, the allegations in paragraph 3 are denied. (c) Should this Honourable Court find that there was any duty on the Council such as is alleged in that paragraph, it says that it duly discharged its duty.

3. As to paragraphs 5 and 6, the Council admits that the defendant company had a main or pipe in the vicinity of Adderley-street, which was used for conveying gas; but it does not admit the remaining allegations in the said paragraph and specially denies that the said main was laid or used for the conveyance of gas with its knowledge, consent, or approval.

4. The allegations in paragraphs 7 and 8 are denied, save as to the allegation that in June, 1905, the gas main and the pipes of the defendant company were in a leaky condition, and that gas escaped therefrom.

5. As to paragraphs 9 and 10, the Council denies that it was under the duties therein alleged and submits that the declaration nowhere discloses in what manner such alleged duties arose, and it specially denies that it did not regard or failed or neglected to perform any duty in law resting upon it in that behalf.

6. (a) The Council admits that on the 13th June, 1905, there was an explosion in Adderley-street, that certain tramlines thereon belonging to the plaintiff company were damaged, and certain works belonging to it injured; and that the explosion was caused by the ignition of gas. (b) The gas was not ignited through any negligence on the part of the Council and the Council is not responsible for any escape of the gas which was ignited nor was it guilty of any negligence in that behalf. (c) The plaintiff company on that place, day, and occasion, and immediately before such explosion, by its servants fused a tram-rail joint, and for that purpose negligently applied an explosive mixture, without observing due precautions against danger arising from such application in the neighbourhood of escaping gas, though the said plaintiff company, by its servants, had knowledge or notice that there had been and was an escape of gas from the pipes of the defendant company at, or in close proximity to, the spot where such fusing took place. (d) The said negligence was the proximate cause of the said explosion, and the plaintiff company, by its negligence, directly caused the explosion, and any damage occasioned thereby or directly contributed to cause the same.

7. Save as above paragraph 11 is denied.

8. Paragraph 12 is denied, save as to a temporary closing of a part of Adderley-street for traffic and as to the appointment by Government of the Commission of Investigation. If the plaintiff company suffered damage as alleged in paragraph 12, the Council is not responsible therefor. It does not admit the materiality of the allegations in that paragraph, or the correctness or the materiality of the accounts annexed to the declaration; and it says that in any event the damage alleged in schedule A is excessive, and in B and C both excessive and remote.

9. Paragraph 13 is denied save as to the Council's refusal to pay.

Wherefore the defendant Council prays that plaintiff's claim be dismissed with costs.

For a claim in reconvention the defendant Council (now plaintiff) says:

10. It craves leave to refer to the matters hereinbefore pleaded.

11. By reason of the negligent action of the plaintiff (now defendant) company set forth in paragraph 6 of the plea, the Council sustained damage at the hands of the (now) defendant company in that the street wherein the said explosion occurred, being a street vested in the Council in its corporate capacity, was severely injured and the Council was in consequence thereof compelled to repair the same and to make up the surface thereof; and also to fill up the old sewer, the roof of which had been broken up, to lay water-pipes and to incur other expenses of a similar nature, and suffered loss in the sum of £712 3s. 9d.

12. By reason of the premises the Council is entitled to be paid the sum of £712 3s. 9d.

Wherefore the Council claims: (a) Judgment in the sum of £712 3s. 9d.; (b) Interest a tempore morae; (c) Alternative relief and costs of suit.

The plea of the defendant company was as follows:

1. They admit paragraphs 1 and 2 of the plaintiff's declaration.

2. They admit the allegations in paragraphs 3, 4, and 5 of the declaration, save that they say that they had no knowledge that the defendant Council had blocked the sewer, as alleged in paragraph 4, and save that the date in paragraph 5 should be 1894, and not 1892.

3. They deny the allegations in paragraph 6 of the declaration, and say that even if the gas main did intersect the crown of the sewer, and was at a certain point in or near Adderley-street in direct communication with the interior of the said sewer, the defendant company deny that it did or was so by their act or with their knowledge or consent.

4. They deny the allegations in paragraph 7, and of the declaration, but even if the sewer was in the condition alleged by reason of the causes alleged (which they do not admit), they say that in so far as it was so by reason of the blocking of the sewer, and absence of ventilation thereto, they crave leave to refer to their allegations in paragraph 5 hereof, and in so far as it was due to the leaky condition of the gas main they crave leave to refer to their allegations in the paragraph next succeeding.

5. They say that they exercised all due care and precaution in preventing escapes of gas, and in discovering and rectifying escapes, and if an escape occurred they deny that it was due to any act, neglect, or default for which they are liable, save in so far as is here stated, the defendant company deny the allegations in paragraphs 9 and 10 of the declaration.

6. They admit that on or about June 13, 1905, an explosion occurred in Adder-ley-street, and that the tram lines and certain works in the said street were damaged, but they deny that the explosion was due to gas which had escaped from their mains or pipes into the sewer, and even if it were due to such escaped gas they were not legally liable for such escape, and they say further that the explosion was due to the act, negligence, and default of plaintiffs themselves, their agents, or servants in persisting in using a certain process known as the Thermit process, and liable to cause an explosion, notwithstanding that they knew, and had received warning, that an escape of gas was supposed to exist in the neighbourhood at the time, and that it would be dangerous to continue to use such process.

7. They admit the allegations in the first two lines of paragraph 12, and that in the last line of paragraph 13, but they deny each and every the other allegations in the said two paragraphs of the declaration, and say specially that even if plaintiffs have suffered the damages alleged, the defendant company denies that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover all or any portion thereof.

Wherefore the defendant company prays that the plaintiffs' claim may be dismissed, with costs.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Searle, K.C., and Mr. Struben), for plaintiffs. Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. McGregor), for the Town Council. Mr. Benjamin (with him Mr. Russell), for the Gas Company.

Alfred John Gregory (Medical Officer of Health for the Colony) said that in March, 1897, he made a thorough examination of the drainage of Cape Town, including the main sewer in Adderley-street. He made a report, which was annexed to his report for 1896, as medical officer for the Colony. There was no ventilation to the sewer; the sewer was of such a nature and construction that it was practically impossible to ventilate it. It was purely a sluit, but it had been altered from time to time, so that every short length of it was different from the other.

[Buchanan, J.: No doubt, it is an old canal of prehistoric or pre-municipal times.]

Witness (continuing his evidence) said that the sewer was really sieve-like. Witness recommended in his report that it should be filled in, because it was dangerous to public health. He had taken it for granted that the sewer would be filled in, and, in fact, from what he had seen, he had concluded that that was being done. There were old branch drains running into the sewer at various points. These, he considered, constituted an additional danger to the public. He considered that it was an improper thing to merely block up the ends of the sewer. The remedy would have been to properly ventilate the sewer or fill it in. After the explosion had occurred, he went down in the afternoon. He detected a strong smell of gas opposite the Post Office.

A question arose as to the order of procedure. Mr. Schreiner submitting that the Gas Company should open the cross-examination.

Mr. Benjamin said that the Town Council were sued as the first defendants, and he submitted that the usual practice should be followed.

Mr. Schreiner said that they were much in this position, that one man supplied a gun, another supplied the ammunition, and a third pulled the trigger. Now the man who pulled the trigger was suing the others who had supplied the gun and the ammunition.

[Buchanan, J., said that the Cape Town Council should open the cross-examination, but this would not touch the question of whether the Council or the company should first open their case.]

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: Witness considered that from a health point of view disused sewers in towns should be filled in. When he made the report, it was in his mind that the Adderley-street sewer should not be crossed by the Gas Company's mains. He could not, at this interval of time, tell how he knew that water and gas mains crossed that particular sewer. He was with Mr. Cairncross at the time, but he would not say that Mr. Cairncross gave him the information. He could not go and see where the sewer was crossed by the gas mains. He made a general statement in his report that gas and water mains did cross the sewer. He did not make any specific reference in his report to the Adderley-street sewer. He would not be prepared to swear that anybody gave him information that the sewer was intersected by the Gas Company's mains.

Mr. Schreiner: That is very important, because we say we did not know that the Gas Company's main intersected the sewer.

Further cross-examined: Witness noticed coal-gas when he went down to the scene of the explosion. He did not notice a smell of sewer gas.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: When he spoke of the "health point of view," he meant "health" in the broadest sense. He was not prepared to say that there would be more danger by reason of the sewer being blocked at both ends than if the ends had been left open. That was a matter one could not theorise upon, because the whole of the circumstances had to be considered.

Thomas Wm. Stanithorpe, A.M.I.C.E., Assistant Engineer of the Public Works Department, said he could not discover that there was any ventilation of the sewer before the explosion. Witness gave evidence bearing out the report which he had made for his department. He attributed the leakage to the service pipes. He first looked at the joints on the high-pressure main, exposed to view, but could find no leakage. Across the triple sewers, at the junction of Strand-street and Adderley-street, there ran a high-pressure gas main, 9 inches in diameter. This gas main cut through the crown of three sewers. There had originally been 9 inches of brickwork. This had been cut through, and the main had been placed on the corner of the sewer. He noticed a smell of coal-gas at that point on the morning following the explosion. The smell seemed to be strongest at the sewer on the railway station side. He was shown where the Thermit joint was being run by the Tramways Company; it was within 10 feet of the high-pressure gas main. An examination was made of the joint of the gas pressure main on the centre of the middle arch on the 20th June. He noticed that the earth about this joint was soft, while the earth about the neighbouring joints was encrusted. The state of the joint over the middle arch gave him the impression that it had been very recently interfered with. The earth round this joint could be washed away, the earth round the neighbouring joints had to be chiselled away. Shortly before the explosion the Council built a head wall across the sewer at the junction of Darling-street and Adderley-street. He thought that the head wall was an important element in the explosion. He spoke to two of the Council's workmen on the day following the explosion; the men were working opposite the Standard Bank.

Sir H. Juta was about to question the witness in regard to a conversation that he had with the workmen, when

Mr. Schreiner objected that the evidence was inadmissible.

Sir H. Juta said that he only proposed to lead evidence in regard to what these workmen were doing.

[Buchanan, J.: We had better not have evidence which is doubtful.]

Witness (continuing) said that the workmen were named Rynould and Lindeboom. Witness had never previously heard of a gas main crossing a sewer in the way in which the one in question did. He considered that it was an absolutely wrong thing to do, especially with a high pressure main. The head wall tended to accelerate the accumulation of gas escaping from the high pressure main.

Sir H. Juta: What, in your opinion, was the cause of the explosion?

Witness said that he thought he could not do better than give the words used in the report he presented to the Commission.

[Buchanan, J.: Give it in your own words.]

Witness: The explosion was probably caused by the accumulation of gas in the old disused sewer, and most probably ignition took place at the very moment the Thermit joint was being made by the Tramway Company's workpeople. Witness added that he considered the sewer was an elongated underground gasometer. He considered that it was dangerous to lay a gas main across a sewer in this way.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: Witness was a pupil, and afterwards assistant with the engineer of the county borough of Middlesborough. He left Middlesborough about 1878 to 1879. He then took an appointment at Lofthouse, in Cleveland. Subsequently, he took a position in an urban district, near Middlesborough. Witness had never professed to be a gas engineer.

Mr. Schreiner: Why does the danger arise from simply putting a pipe through the brickwork on the crown of the sewer?

Witness: The danger is from the liability of a joint of a gas main being sprung.

Cross-examination continued: Witness noticed puffs of gas coming from the three sewers on the morning following the accident. The smell was most noticeable at the sewer nearest the railway station. He would not say that the gas was still escaping at that time, or whether it was old gas that had not been used up. Witness did not observe any smell of gas at the telephone chamber, where the lady was killed. The only conclusion he could come to was that the gas had escaped from the joint over the middle arch. One of the Gas Company's workmen bared the joint in the presence of the members of the Commission on or about the 20th June. There was no leak when they saw the joint. His candid opinion at the time he saw the pipes was that the joint had recently been tampered with. Witness thought that the leakages from the iron branch pipes accounted for the flames seen on the previous day near the cable box. He did not consider, however, that the branch pipes materially contributed to the explosion.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin. Witness's first impression was that the explosion was caused by the leakages from the branch pipes, but afterwards his attention was drawn to the lower part of the street. He should call the joint he had referred to an ordinary spicket and socket joint. It was not what he would call a bored and turned joint. He should be surprised to hear that this was a bored and turned joint. The joint of the pipe (produced) looked like an ordinary lead joint. It was dangerous to lay a high-pressure pipe across the crown of a sewer, because the pipe might be sprung or the pipe might rust. The reason why he came to the conclusion that the joint had recently been tampered with was, because where the joint was made, the lead was bright, and where the chisel had come into contact with the top of the cast-iron, it was fairly bright. He knew that at the Commission Mr. Ladell, the Municipal Engineer at Wynberg, gave evidence that the pipe was not bright. He did not agree with Mr. Ladell's evidence; if Mr. Ladell had had more experience, he would speak differently. In such a street as Adderley-street, he thought a pipe should have 3 ft. 6 in. of cover.

By the Court: There was no appreciable explosion above the head wall at the corner of Darling-street. The Thermit process was being carried on near the bottom of Strand-street. The process was going on above the ground. He supposed the gas was escaping in the near proximity. It was a singular coincidence that, as soon as the molten material was opened, the explosion took place. The ground was somewhat disturbed about two feet from the place where rails were being fixed. It was possible that there might have been some ignition from the sparking of a car somewhere near. The fact remained, however, that no car was in the vicinity at the time.

Mr. Benjamin informed his lordship that he could produce the pipe, showing the joint that the witness Stainthorpe referred to.

Sir H. Juta said that he did not think the pipes would be of much service to the Court after they had been in the ground twelve months.

His Lordship said he did not think the pipes would help the Court, and he would prefer to take the evidence of witnesses. It might be interesting to have a demonstration of the making of joints.

Mr. Benjamin said that a demonstration could be given.

Edward George Clifford Jones, electrical engineer, Cape Town, said that soon after the explosion had occurred he went to the scene. He saw steam issuing from fissures opposite the Standard Bank; he observed a smell exactly like the exhaust of a gas engine. On the 14th June he made an investigation. Opposite Lennon's, Ltd., at the point where the high-pressure mains crossed the three sewers, he noticed a smell of coal gas. The smell was observable again on the two following days.

Mr. Searle (in answer to the Court) said that the Thermit joint was being made about 10 feet below where the high-pressure main crossed the three sewers.

Witness (continuing) said that he saw branch pipes opened up opposite the Standard Bank and Millar's. The pipes were full of holes. He should not say there was any direct communication between those pipes and the main sewer. Witness did not think there would be any possibility of a great leakage of gas through the head wall. He considered that the explosion was caused by a leakage into the sewer from the high-pressure main becoming ignited by some means or other. Whether the ignition was due to the Thermit joint, he could not say. He did not think electrolysis had anything to do with the explosion. He did not consider that the explosion was due to sewer gas. The sewer seemed to be clean. He thought a low explosive mixture had been formed, and that there was really only one explosion.

Cross-examined by Mr. McGregor: Witness thought the ignition was probably caused by the Thermit joint. The fact, however, had to be remembered that the night before the cable-box was alight.

Cross-examined by Mr. Russell: The smell of gas became weaker each day after the accident, until on the Friday it was scarcely noticeable. The tramline on the Post Office side of Adderley-street ran over the disused sewer; the Thermit joint was over the sewer. Adderley-street had been watered with salt water; he thought that the salt water would have a good deal of effect on the wrought-iron pipes.

Thomas Govern, police constable, stated that at about 5.30 in the afternoon previous to the explosion he saw a blue flame coming from the edges of the cable box at the corner of Shortmarket-street and Adderley-street. The flame was about four inches in height. He reported the affair at the police station.

Mathias Munro, platelayer, in the employ of the Tramway Company, stated that he was in Darling-street the day before the explosion. In consequence of a message he received, he went to the corner of Strand-street and Adderley-street, where tramway men were working. There was an escape of gas outside of the tracks. The light, which was of a blue colour, was put out by the Gas Company's men. From the smell, it was ordinary coal gas, not sewer gas. The Gas Company's men excavated at the spot where the escape was noticed, and at another spot further towards the side of the street. While witness was working no pipes were disturbed. The gas main was about seven feet higher up the street than where the flame was.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He did not see what the tramway workers did on the morning of the explosion.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: Did you speak to Mr. Humphreys on the day before the explosion?—Yes.

Can you point him out in court?—I can if he stands up.

Do you see him in court?—No; if I take a walk round I can find him out.

You say you had a conversation with him on Monday?—Yes.

George Manus, in the employ of the Tramway Company, who was in charge of a welding gang at the time of the explosion, stated that several joints had been welded in Adderley-street by the same process as they were working at the time of the explosion. Witness described the Thermit system of welding. At the time of the explosion he was waiting to give the word "go" to Higgins to release the pin in order to make the joint when he heard a rumbling noise.

Mr. Searle: What was it like?—It was like an earthquake trying to find its way out. Continuing, witness said there was no explosion on the surface at the exact spot where he was working, although the rails had been shaken. He was positive that nothing overflowed from the crucible; if that had happened, the joint would not be a good one. If anything did come out, it would simply go on to the surface of the ground. There were always sparks when the crucible was working. Before he ran from the spot there was an awful smell of coal gas. The first place where he noticed the explosion was about a couple of feet below the gas main. There was nothing unusual in the joint he made at the time of the explosion.

William Higgins, who was in the employ of the plaintiff company last June, stated he was working with Mann and King at the time of the explosion. There was a strong smell of gas previous to the explosion. Mr. Humphreys asked witness if he smelt gas, and witness replied in the affirmative. In reply to a further question, witness said that the Thermit would not interfere with the gas, as the claying process prevented that. In various parts of the town he had worked on joints effected by a similar process.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: The rumbling began where witness was standing, and extended up the street.

Cross-examined by Mr. Russell: If the Thermit escaped it could not reach the gas main. Gas was escaping just before the explosion. The crucible did not emit sparks like fireworks.

Wm. Craig, chief engineer of the Public Works Department, stated that in June last year he was supervising engineer, and was appointed as a member of the Commission to inquire into the cause of the explosion. He saw the high pressure main in Adderley-street, and examining the middle joint, which had a different appearance from the rest, and he came to the conclusion that the joint had been set up quite recently. By the appearance of the lead, he had no doubt of his conclusion. It was certainly dangerous to leave the old sewer open, as it would act as a reservoir for any escape of gas. If there had been an escape of gas from the middle joint it would have got into the sewer and caused the explosion.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: It would be dangerous to proceed with the process the men were engaged upon in the vicinity of a smell of gas. It was quite possible to ventilate a disused sewer.

James Collier, contractor and plumber who examined certain joints of the high pressure gas main in Adderley-street, corroborated the last witness as to the recent setting up of the joint in the middle sewer.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: He had no experience of gas pipes, but he had of iron pipes. The experience of water pipes would practically hold good in the case of gas pipes.

Robert Caw, plumber, with fifty years experience, examined the joint in the gas-main where it crossed the sewer, and stated that he came to the conclusion on comparing it with others that it had recently been staved up. The other joints were very severely rusted, while the middle one was quite clean.

Robert Caw, Jun., who examined the middle joint with his father, the last witness, stated that it had all appearances of having recently been staved up.

John Dennann, electrical engineer, with large experience, who was also appointed as a member of the Commission, and visited the scene of the explosion, said he noticed a smell of burnt gas opposite the Post Office, of exploded gas opposite the Railway Station, and pure gas at the corner of Shortmarket and Adderley streets. Subsequently he saw the gas-main exposed. Many of the service pipes were in a very leaky condition. In examining the main on the day after the explosion he smelt intermittent puffs of gas coming from the sea end. The bottom of the pipe was the crown of the sewer for about two feet. After the Wednesday he did not smell the gas. The middle joint appeared to him to have been tampered with, as it was quite different from the others. As long as the Commission lasted he knew of no leak discovered by the Gas Company. The molten metal he had found could not pierce through the sand. An experiment was tried on sand and loose earth, and the molten iron would not penetrate. In his opinion the escape of gas from the high pressure main at the foot of Adderley-street was in all probability the cause of the explosion. There must have been a continuous flow of gas to the surface through an aperture. Witness did not see any traces of concrete, although Mr. Arnott, who supervised the laying of the pipes, had stated they were buried in concrete.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He attributed the smell of gas to the leaky service pipes. His view was that the actual cause of ignition was the thermit process. The explosion in the telephone box was contemporaneous with the other explosions. The box was visited about once a week or so.

Chas. Frederick Juritz, senior Government analyst for fifteen years, stated that a couple of hours after the explosion he visited the scene. The earth which was being taken out at the corner of Shortmarket-street and Adderley-street had a strong odour of coal-gas.

It would not be necessary to have an actual light applied to cause an explosion, the white heat of a mass of metal would be sufficient. Assuming the capacity of the sewer to be 30,000 cubic feet, then in order to fill the sewer with explosive mixture, taking it at eleven per cent. of coal gas, it would require 3,600 cubic feet of coal gas to fill what had been called a subterranean gasometer." An escape of a couple of ordinary burners would fill that place in about a fortnight. The explosion, he thought, was caused by a mixture of coal gas and air. Some light, he thought, must have been applied in this case. It was quite possible the gas was burning for some time before the explosion took place.

Cross-examined by Mr. Russell: He had seen showers of sparks omitted from the crucibles.

By His Lordship: It was probable that there was merely ignition directly underneath the crucible.

Andrew McLarity, in the employ of the Tramway Company last June when the explosion took place, stated he was guard on a tram going down Adderley-street on the left hand rail opposite the Post Office.

[Buchanan, J.: What is he called for?] Sir H. Juta: To show there was a tram going down Adderley-street at the time.

[Buchanan, J.: Was the tram injured?]

Witness: No.

Alfred Giles, General Manager of the Tramway Company, stated that within about an hour of the explosion he examined the thermit joint and found it to be a properly-run one. If any metal came through it would run on the flat on the sand. Sand had the effect of cooling off the metal. In consequence of the explosion the line was blown up in several places, and it cost £1,044 to make the repairs. Before the explosion, when the rails were being re-laid, the company used one line in Adderley-street; after the explosion the service was dislocated, and from June 13 to July 11 the section between Darling-street and Strand-street could not be used. From April 19 to May 9, when the service was in order, the receipts, irrespective of the monthly ticket-holders, was £10,168; for the four weeks ending June 6, when they were only working one line in Adderley-street, the receipts were £8,653; from June 13 to July 11, when the Darling-street—

Strand-street section was stopped, the receipts were £5,074. Extra signmen and despatchers were requisitioned to act at the temporary termini. At the same time there was a decrease in the mileage, and that was balanced against the increase in expenditure. The line had sunk in places from Darling-street to Strand-street, and it was also out of gauge. He attributed that to the sinking of the foundations, and that was after the lines had been properly re-laid. It would be necessary to make repairs soon which would cost £250.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: The company was relaying the line because it had got worn, and not because the Town Council had raised the level of Adderley-street. He did not remember making a request to the Council to work the single line after the explosion. He had no recollection of the fine weather in the August-May period and the wet weather in the period after the explosion. The line was up for a considerable distance at Sea Point, and that would also affect the falling off in traffic. It was probable that many monthly ticket-holders took smaller books during the reconstruction as they had not time to journey to Sea Point for their luncheons. He had not found on recent work that the gauges were out in other parts of the system.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: Of the £1,044 10s. 7d. claimed £850 odd had been expended. The traffic for the four weeks ending August 15 last year amounted to £8,283. The falling off, irrespective of the explosion, was going on while the line was up in other parts of the section.

Which is the principal paying portion of your line?—I am not bound to answer that question.

[Buchanan, J.: Can you answer it?—It varies at times.

Mr. Benjamin: Is the Sea Point the principal paying section?—No.

Which is the principal paying section?—I don't propose to answer that.

You must; answer it?—The sections vary at times.

Tell me how they vary?—

[Buchanan, J.: You are unable to give an answer?]

Mr. Benjamin: The witness did not say so, my lord.

[Buchanan, J.: He says so.]

Mr. Benjamin: How does the traffic vary?—It may vary in many ways, such as sports or other functions at any particular district.

Have you got the records week by week of the various sections of your line last year?—Yes.

Can you produce them?—Yes.

Will it take any considerable calculation?—Yes.

Well, you can prepare the figures for twelve months for the information of the Court later.

Sir H. Juta closed his case.

Mr. Schreiner mentioned the matter of procedure as to the examination of the witnesses of the defendants.

Buchanan, J., said he did not see any clear reason in this case to select one to be heard first more than the other. The Town Council was first on the list.

Mr. Schreiner pointed out that at the Commission he drew attention to the position of the witnesses of the co-defendant. A witness was called for the Gas Company, and counsel asked for a ruling as to whether he was at liberty to cross-examine, otherwise he would retire, because it was not evidence against the Council. The Commissioners allowed cross-examination, and counsel suggested to the Court that the case should be treated on the basis of each cross-examining each other's witnesses.

Buchanan, J., said the position of the Court was to ascertain from the evidence laid before it the true merits of the case. He thought therefore that any witness called by one defendant to give evidence which affected the other defendant should be cross-examined otherwise his statement might be prejudicial. A witness called by either defendant would be allowed to be cross-examined by the other defendant.

Mr. Schreiner: That will follow on the main cross-examination by the plaintiff?

[Buchanan, J.: Yes.]

Mr. Schreiner called

John Cook, City Engineer, who stated that May, 1905, was the first time he had anything to do with the old sewer. He had no idea until 24 June, when he returned from Johannesburg, that a gas main crossed the sewer. In May, 1904, the old sewer was closed at Darling-street. So far as he could trace there had never been any construction of a ventilation system for the old sewer.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He ascertained that if the Gas Company sent in a plan which did not clash with work it was passed. Witness did not know what powers the Gas Company had through Parliament. At the Commission he said that he was not aware of any municipal control over the Gas Company which he understood had no Act and had no right to interfere with the street or the sewers without the permission of the Town Council. The record of the various gas mains in Cape Town up to 1902 was very incomplete. Since 1902 witness had plans of all the mains laid. Witness could not say where all the gas mains were at present. After the explosion he found out that there was a water main under the gas main in Adderley-street. It would be wrong for the Drainage Engineer to say that he (witness) was responsible for the sewer six months before the explosion. If the sewer had been filled up there would have been no explosion. If he had known the gas main was running as it did he would have said it was absolutely necessary to fill up the sewer and remove the gas main. He was not aware until recently that in several places in Cape Town gas mains ran through the sewers. He could not say why the sewer was not filled up. In the month of May witness contemplated filling up the sewer, but he had not the control of it until September.

Had you the power to fill it up?—I should have had to ask Mr. Rigby.

You, as City Engineer, would have to ask permission to fill up a sewer?—It is a different department.

Continuing under cross-examination, witness said the idea to use the sewer for the laying of cables was given up. He could not contradict Dr. Gregory that there was ventilation in the sewer when it was used as a sewage channel. He had no doubt that the joint in the middle sewer had recently been set up. In his opinion the coal gas escaped from the joint, mixed with the air and caused the explosion. As he saw the service pipes in the Public Works Department they were in a bad condition, but they might have been knocked into that condition.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: Since the explosion perforated covers had been put over the man-holes of the stormwater drains.

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner: Except by forced ventilation the sewer in question could not be ventilated. About a month after the one in Cape Town there was an explosion in Leeds, caused by the explosion of gas which accumulated in a ventilated sewer. The Drainage Engineer's Department was quite distinct from his, the Drainage Engineer having the power to put down a sewer without witness's permission. Being unaware of the presence of the gas main, he thought the sewer quite safe.

William James Jeffreys, Assistant City Engineer, stated he had held that position in Cape Town for eleven years. During the absence of Mr. Cook, when the explosion took place, witness was acting as engineer. Ten minutes after the explosion took place, witness was in Adderley-street. Arrangements were made with the different departments to rope off the scene of the disaster. In conjunction with the Tramway Company, the work of reinstating the roadway was commenced, and next day witness proceeded to fill in the sewer. The first time witness was aware of the existence of the high pressure main across the sewer was when he saw the Gas Company's men working at it. The Gas Company's men broke the brick-work in order to get at the joint of the pipe. Two days after the explosion, witness examined the middle joint, and, although he was not an authority on the matter, he noticed that it was different from the other two. It was practically impossible to ventilate a disused chamber like the one in question. In 1901 there was an explosion of gas in a ventilated sewer in St. George's-street. He had never heard that a disused sewer was dangerous from collecting gas. The new system of sewerage completely cut off any junction to the old sewer. He was unable to trace from the records of the Town Council where the gas main from Woodstock to Cape Town crossed the sewer. There were a few cases of gas pipes going through sewers, and they were removed between 1897 and 1903.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: Mr. Cairncross was City Engineer when the gas main was laid down. In his opinion, although it was done, it was not necessary to fill up the sewer where there was no explosion. On the 30th May, when the road was being re-graded in Adderley-street, there was no smell of gas. He had no knowledge of an explosion in Wale-street, but he knew of one in Newmarket-street, where gas got into an ejector chamber.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: The fact that the joint was in brick-work and cement might have accounted for its brighter appearance than the other two.

Robt. O. Wynne Roberts, who came out in 1898 as City Engineer to the Cape Town Co-operation, and in 1902 became Water Engineer, which was a distinct department from that of the City Engineer, stated that when he was City Engineer he knew of the old sewer in Adderley-street, but witness never had any control of the sewer. Witness would not anticipate gas collecting in the sewer, which would not be filled in on that account, or would be filled in for sanitary reasons. The very explosive mixture which they might seek to avoid might be created by ventilation through reverse currents. Practically the sewer could not be ventilated. There was no reasonable anticipation of risk to the public in leaving the sewer open. Had he known of the gas main he thought he would have advised the Council to fill in the sewer. It was impossible to make a sewer absolutely gas tight.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: More than once gas had got into sewers in Cape Town. Where it was possible, everything was done to ventilate the sewers.

You say it was impracticable to ventilate this sewer?—Yes.

Why, then, didn't you fill it up?—With the knowledge I have to-day, I would have ordered it to be filled up.

Thomas Wilson Cairncross, formerly engineer to the city of Cape Town from 1881 to 1898, stated that he did not see how the high-pressure main, which was laid in 1892, crossed the street. He had considerable trouble with the Gas Company laying mains without witness knowing anything of them, and then witness established the system of permits. Witness then instituted a further system of submitting plans, but for this main no plan was submitted. There was constant trouble with the Gas Company in filling up the roads. Witness's instructions were that, where mains crossed sewers, the work had to be in concrete. He would not, as City Engineer, have approved of any such work if it was not enclosed in cement. It was not with his knowledge or approval that the gas main was laid in such a position. According to the rule of the office, the permit was taken away by the party applying for it, in order to show it to a policeman or a municipal official as authority to open up the street. There was no specific permission given to cross the part of Adderley-street where the high-pressure main was laid. Ventilation was such an uncertain quantity, it would be a difficult thing to ventilate the old sewer. It might not be practicable to ventilate the sewer by means of shafts, because inlets were often outlets. Municipal county engineers in England had been trying experiments for twenty-five years, and as yet they had come to no thorough decision.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He would not have allowed the pipe to go through the sewer unless it was properly covered with masonry, more especially with a view of reinstating the sewer, and not from the point of view of any danger. When he went round with Dr. Gregory he did not open up the streets to see where the gas mains ran. When the sewer was blocked at the lower portion of Adderley-street, he could not consider it dangerous for the high pressure to remain where it was. Some part of the joint might have projected inside the crown, but he could not say for certain. There were fresh marks on the joint, and he had no doubt that it had quite recently been reset.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: It was several days after the explosion that he examined the joints. The one in question had evidently been laid in brickwork.

Mr. Schreiner closed his case.

Edward P. Reilly, engineer and general manager for the Gas Company, stated that after the explosion he immediately commenced opening up the street to find out if the gas mains had been damaged. He put in specimens of the ordinary lead joint and the "turned and caed" joint. Lead was not essential in a "turned and caed" joint. It was only put in as a support to prevent the pipe sagging. He had never known of any leakage from joints in Cape Town. None of the gas mains were disturbed at all by the explosion. The human nose was the best instrument for detecting gas leaks.

Bars were driven down in the street over the mains in order to let the gas up if there was any escape. He believed there was an aperture connecting the surface of the street with the sewer below the tram rail joint which was being welded. This joint in the gas main had not been recently reset. It was impossible to tell a joint which had been recently recaulked from an old one by the appearance of the lead, but it was possible to tell from the disturbance of the "barnacles" on the joint. It was impossible to caulk in a joint without disturbing the "barnacles." Thirty per cent. of the damage done to the pipes was done by the Town Council.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: Before the explosion he had nothing to show the depth of the high pressure main in Adderley-street. He searched for a leak from the high pressure main after the explosion, but only found one leak in Adderley-street, opposite Logan's. A report was made to the office on Monday, 12th June, that there was an escape of gas somewhere. On Tuesday, about 4.30 p.m., the main had been opened up, the joint over the sewer was exposed, and he thought he smelt gas puffing out of the three sewers, but he was now sure that whatever it was coming out of the sewer it was not coal gas. A flame was burning near the tram rail joint after the explosion.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: The Gas Company's men were working near the gas main till about one o'clock in the morning. The tram rail joint was directly over the water main, about seven feet away from the gas main. The bit of metal was discovered at a depth of about two feet six below the surface of the street. The crown of the sewer was broken away underneath. There was a case where a gas main goes through the body of a sewer on the Parade. In the St. George's-street explosion the leak was not from a joint, but from a fractured pipe.

Re-examined by Mr. Benjamin: When the joint was first uncovered he smelt all round the joint and there was no escape of gas from it. A "turned caud" joint could not spring even if a traction engine passed over the top, and there was an excavation beneath. The pipe might fracture, but it would not spring.

Wm. A. Humphreys, assistant manager under Mr. Reilly, stated that he had had 27 years' experience of gas works in England and Cape Town. In 1891 he arrived here. On the evening of the day before the explosion he reported a leakage of gas in Adderley-street. About two feet away from where the thermit joint was working he smelt gas and ordered his foreman to open up the spot next morning. The foreman was already working on the street. Next morning the workmen were filling up their excavation of the previous day and proceeded to open up the street near the high pressure main. Witness did not see Munro on the Monday, as Munro had stated. When the explosion occurred witness was in Mr. Reilly's office explaining what happened on Monday. Witness saw the street opened up after the explosion, and was almost constantly in Adderley-street up to 11.30 that night. Witness saw the joint when it was exposed. There was no leak of gas coming from that joint. When the Commission examined the joint everyone that came to look at it had a rub at it. Certain indications were pointed out by witness that could not exist if the joint had recently been reset. In February this year on an examination of the main it was discovered that a nine-inch gas pipe opposite Logan's place was broken in two, and immediately underneath the broken main was a nine-inch earthenware drainage pipe running into the old triple sewer. The examination was made because the City Engineer was about to make alterations to the Dock-road. The breakage of the pipes was evidently caused by some shrinkage of the ground. The escape of gas was not very great from the pipe. On the morning of the explosion witness cautioned Higgins if there was any chance of the metal running over, not to run the joint until the leak was discovered. There was a tremendous number of sparks emitted from the crucible, and it was difficult for anyone to stand within eight or nine feet of it. Last Sunday there was an escape of gas in Rose-street. The gas leaked into the sewer although the gas main was ten feet away from the sewer, but there was no explosion.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He smelt gas coming out of the sewer near a high pressure main for several days after the explosion. Three men stayed on the spot all night. They were paid for staying all night. He never anticipated an explosion when he talked to Higgins, but he was afraid that the gas would be lighted by the "thermit," and then he would have the trouble to put it out.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He did not find any concrete round the joint making good the crown of the sewer.

Hugh Ladell, engineer to the Wynberg Municipality, gave it as his opinion that the joint had not recently been recaulked.

Henry A. Mann, of the telephone department of the Post Office, who was called in to inspect the joint over the triple sewer on July 1, stated that in his opinion the joint had not recently been set up. Witness had long experience of setting up pipes.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He had said at the Commission that he thought the joint had been set in a slipshod manner.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He did not work with gas at all.

Frederick S. Sydney, in the employ of the Gas Company, who also examined the joint about eight or nine days after the explosion, gave it as his opinion that the joint had not been set up recently.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: He was asked to look at the joint a few days after he joined the Gas Company. He only saw the one joint.

Elias Lederman, in the employ of the Gas Company at the time of the explosion, stated that on the evening before the explosion he was sent to the corner of Shortmarket-street and Adderley-street. Mr. Humphreys told him to watch the box all night, and to see that no one struck a match in the vicinity. He did not see anyone resetting the joint over the high-pressure main.

Carl September, another employee of the Gas Company, said he was one of the boys who set up joints, and that the night before the explosion he came from Orange-street to Adderley-street, where the ground was opened up at the corner of Strand-street. Witness ran into a shop when the explosion occurred. The night of the explosion witness acted as watchman. Witness washed the joint for the commissioners who inspected it.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: Mr. Humphreys went into the trench between nine and ten o'clock the evening of the explosion.

Jafta Sombaba, who was working for the Gas Company at the time of the explosion, said he was sent from Hatfield-street to Adderley-street the morning before the explosion, and worked opposite Lennon's for a leak, but failed to find one. Witness did not set up the joint, nor did he see anyone do it.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: On the Tuesday night, when he left, he could not see the whole of the pipe, but he saw it the first thing on Wednesday morning.

John Hill, formerly a labourer in the employ of the Gas Company, said that the night before the explosion he extinguished the fire at the cable box. Witness was also watchman on the night of the explosion and carried out the instructions from Mr. Humphreys, "to let no one go down the hole." If there had been any recaulking of the joint he would have heard it.

The evidence of William Arnott, taken on commission, was then read.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., said the Gas Company had no statutory power to lay mains, that the sewers and streets were vested in the Town Council, and its permission had to be obtained by the Gas Company when a main was laid.

In these circumstances the doctrine of Rylands v. Fletcher would apply. The Gas Company had brought a dangerous thing (gas) into Adderley-street, and it had to keep it from escaping and doing damage, at its peril. Counsel quoted on this point: Eastern South African Telegraph Company v. Cape Town Tramway Company (App. Ca., 1902); Batcheller v. Tonbridge Gas Company (17 T.L.R., 577); and Midwood v. Mayor of Manchester (1905 2 K.B., p. 597).

The explosion was caused by gas escaping into the sewer. The Town Council was negligent in allowing the sewer to be there unventilated in spite of warnings, and the Gas Company in allowing the gas to escape and in laying the main as it did. It was not necessary to prove a joint act of negligence, in order to recover damages from the defendants. Counsel then quoted: Newman v. East London Town Council (12 J., 61); Pollock on Torts, 2nd Edn., p. 407; Lynch v. Mudin (1 Q.B., 29); Sullivan v. Sreed (1904 Ann. Dig., 264); Clark v. Chambers (3 Q.B.D., 327). To show the Town Council's breaches of duty he quoted Sections 127, 133 of Act 26 of 1893; Section 20 of Act 23 of 1897; O'Shea v. Port Elizabeth Town Council (12 Juta, 146); and Solomons v. Steynburg Borough Council (1905 Ann. Dig., 222).

If a joint act of negligence was necessary to fix liability on both defendants, then he said there was a joint negligence in laying the gas main through the crown of the sewer. The Town Council must have known how it was laid, because traffic must have been diverted to lay it; also permission was given to lay it from Woodstock to the Docks, and Arnott said the Clerk of the Works knew how it was laid. Cairncross, the late City Engineer, said he could not have known it, because he would never have allowed it, and yet gas mains were laid through the bodies of many other sewers. The Town Council knew also that it was dangerous to lay a main through a sewer, because it had had numerous other explosions, where gas leaked into sewers. There was no contributory negligence in using the "thermit" process. The damages claimed were £1,044 for repairs, £2,033 for loss of profits, £250 for damage to the rails since the explosion by subsidence of the soil.

Mr. Schreiner (for the Town Council): This is an action under the Lex Aquilia. It refers to an accident for which the Town Council was not responsible. There was no culpa on our part. If negligence be urged against us, we say that the accident was not due to our act or default, but to the act of the Tramway Company. Their act was the direct and immediate cause of the accident. If we did not know anything about the conditions which produced the accident surely we are not the causa causans. The direct cause of the accident was the gas made by the Gas Company. The immediate cause was the ignition of this gas, and that was the fault of the Tramway Company. All that can be said against us is that we did not fill up the sewer. It is not contended that if the sewer had been in use that we should have been liable. That is not on the pleadings, nor does it appear on the evidence. Without legal culpa there can be no responsibility. Legal culpa must arise either positively or negatively. As to the former see Clark v. Chambers (3 Q.B.D., 330). As to the latter our authorities draw a distinction between what may be done and what must be done. There can be no culpa in case of a mere permission to do a thing. All culpa implies either an unlawful act or a failure of duty. No statutory obligation was cast upon us to fill up the sewer. As to authorities see Jordaan v. Worcester Municipality (3 C.T.R., 195), and the Liesbeck Municipality v. Partridge (4 Juta, 300). There no duty was cast upon the Municipality. Also Catheart Divisional Council v. Hart (9 Juta, 80). There a duty was cast upon the Divisional Council to keep roads in repair, but in one of the two cases the Council was held not liable because the accident did not arise from its act. Also Kimberley Town Council v. Van Niekerk (1 Ap., 101), Reed v. De Beers' Mines (9 Juta, 370), E. and S.A. Telegraph Company v. Cape Tramways (10 C.T.R., 72). It has been argued on the other side that these cases have been in a sense overruled by Rylands v. Fletcher (3 H.L., 330, and 86 L.T., 457 and 461), but in the case of E. and S.A. Telegraph Company it was shown from Voet (9-2-16), that injury must arise from an act or a default of the defendant; Rylands' case was discussed in Parker v. Reed (21 S.C.R., 496). A man is not responsible for any evil done to others by the use of his own property save in the case of culpa. If the doctrine that in the absence of culpa a man is an insurer for the results of his acts be English law, I say that it is not the law of this country, and that Rylands v. Fletcher is not in accordance with our law. See Voet (9-2-16), Grueber on the Lex Aquilia (p. 208, 209, where he discusses Chapters 1 and 3 of that law). I submit that our authorities and our case law show that if damage arise to another (1) it must be owing to the act of the defendant, and (2) the damage must be incontinenti, i.e., a direct result of the act. See Harrison v. S. Pancras Vestry (43 L.J., 137). This was a stronger case than ours, for there the overflow from their own sewer caused the damage. It has been argued that the duty of filling up this sewer was cast upon us by Act 23 of 1897, but we had power under Sec. 133 of Act 26 of 1893 to construct new sewers, and surely were then entitled to discontinue the use of the old one. It is admitted that the disused sewer was in proper repair. See judgment of Alverston, L.J., in Lambert v. Mayor of Lowestoff (84 L.T., 237). This is quite a parallel case. Here it is contended that the Town Council is liable for a nuisance; but see Midwood v. Manchester Municipality (93 L.T., 525). There a duty was cast upon the Corporation to make compensation for nuisance; but that is not the present case, we did not commit the nuisance. We did not bring gas into our sewer. We are not gas undertakers. See Pollock on Torts (p. 474, 5th edition), citing Smith v. Boston Gas Company (129 Massch. Rep. 318), and Parry v. Smith (4 C.P., 325, for 1879). See also Newman v. East London Municipality (5 C.T.R., 41), cited on the other side. There it was held that the Municipality was liable for the acts of its contractor. Persons cannot be held liable, save for their own acts or those of their servants or agents. See also Hill v. New River Company (9 B. and S., 303, and 18 L.T., 55). This was a case similar to Newman's but here the Company alone was held responsible. In Newman's case possibly the contractor might have been held liable had he been sued. See also Box v. Jubb and Another (4 Ex. D., 76, and 48 L.J., Ex. 417), cited by Pollock with other cases (p. 464, 5th edition). As to joint tortfeasors, there must be separate actions for separate acts, Clark v. Lindsay (88 L.T., 198). In the judgment on exceptions (16 C.T.R., 247) it was held that if the allegations of paragraphs 5 and 6 of the declaration were proved the declaration was not open to exception; but they have not been proved. Lynch v. Nurdin (1 Q.B., 29, and 10 L.J.Q.B., 73) has been cited on the other side, but see Pollock (p. 41). There the cart and horse were the direct cause of the injury, but not so here. Batchelor v. Fortescue (11 Q.B.D., 474 and 84 L.T.), also cited for plaintiffs, is not in point; so also Ballard v. Tomlinson (29 Ch.D., 115, and 54 L.J., 454). We were under no obligation to fill in the sewer; then how could we be compelled to do so? Picton Municipals v. Geldert (69 L.T., 510) and cases there commented on. As to the remoteness of damage, damage must be capable of being foreseen.

But see the judgment in Newman's case. We did not want gas in our sewer. The whole case is founded on the supposition that the Council had something to do with the laying of these mains.

As to contributory negligence, see the "Bernina" (56 L.T., 258). On this case see Pollock (412 and 414, 3rd edit.). The Tramway Company was the direct and immediate cause of the explosion, and therefore cannot recover.

As to damages, that is chiefly a matter of fact and must depend on the view taken of the schedules submitted. Consequential damages, however, are not usually admitted, Wesleyan Church v. Eayrs (12 C.T.R., 147).

[Counsel proceeded to deal with the evidence as to the income of the Tramway Company and other matters of fact.]

Mr. Benjamin (for the Gas Company): I abandon the point raised as to joinder of parties. The points with which I have to deal are purely matters of fact turning on the questions: (1) How was the leak in the main caused? and (2) by what means was the gas exploded?

[Counsel proceeded to deal with the evidence bearing on these points.]

As to negligence, it is for the plaintiffs to prove their allegations. The case of Rylands v. Fletcher has no application to the case. Even in England it has been held that the principles enunciated in that case must be confined within the narrowest possible limits. In support of this view, see Pollock on Torts (p. 472, 6th edit.), Bevan on Negligence (473), Encyclopedia of the laws of England (Vol. 6, p. 57 and cases there cited), Green v. Chelsea Water Works Company (70 L.T., 547), where Rylands v. Fletcher is commented on and distinguished; Batcheller v. Tunbridge Gas Company (84 L.T., 765). There all that the Court held was that the defendants might not pollute the water supply. That was an application for an injunction, not an action for damages. See also Solomons v. Stepney Borough Council (Mews' Digest for 1905, p. 222).

[Buchanan, J.: There the County Court judge seems to have held the damage to be too remote.]

That case, which is years after Batcheller's case, throws an interesting light upon it. If a wide interpretation had been given to Batcheller's case, no question of negligence would have arisen, and the County Court Judge puts the whole case on the ground of negligence. Solomon's case was an action for damages, and applies here; Batcheller's case was a Chancery case (an application for an injunction), and does not apply in this country. In any case where statutory powers are given, the person who uses those powers cannot be held liable save for negligence. Clark v. Chambers (3 Q.B.D., 331) and Scott v. Shepherd (2 W. Bl., 892) do not apply to the case of a Corporation acting under statutory powers. As to statutory powers, see Act 26 of 1893, Section 108 and 130, and 44 of 1882, Section 51.

What evidence then is there of negligence? Simply this, that our main went through a sewer! But it could not have been carried across the street in any other way, if it was to be laid at a safe depth. As to what is a safe depth, see a case referred to in the "Journal of Gas Lighting" for June, 1903. At the time of the accident the main was $3\frac{1}{2}$ feet below the surface of the road, a perfectly safe depth, but they would not have been at a safe depth had we laid it above the sewer.

That would have been yet more dangerous, as the gas, in the event of an escape, might have ascended into the sewer.

[Buchanan, J.: It amounts to this, that if you cannot do a thing without danger to the public you have no business to do it at all.]

We are acting under statutory authority. Various Acts to which I have already referred provide for the introduction of gas into Cape Town. Then, even supposing that there was negligence in taking a gas main through a sewer, whose negligence was it? We did not know that the sewer was unventilated, and we used the most perfect form of pipe joint known in carrying the main through the sewer. I submit that the leak did not take place at the spot where the main crossed the sewer, but elsewhere, probably at Logan's corner. If there as negligence, the Town Council are far more to blame than we are. As to joint liability, see Newman v. East London Town Council and Hill v. New River Company (9 B. and S., 303)—Pollock (451—6th Edition). The distinction has been pressed on behalf of the Council that a body acting under statutory powers is not liable for non-feasance, but only for misfeasance. But here the Council has been guilty of misfeasance. If they did not themselves construct the sewer, they too over and adopted a badly-constructed sewer, they converted it into an air-tight chamber, where the gas accumulated, and they sealed up all the connections with private drains and every other aperture which could afford ventilation. As to the claim for damages, I cannot contest the claim (a) (damage to the line), but the damages claimed for the falling off of the traffic are certainly excessive.

[Counsel proceeded to argue on the facts regarding damages, as disclosed by the schedules of accounts put in by plaintiffs.]

Mr. Schreiner (in reply to Mr. Benjamin) confined himself chiefly to the question of joint liability. The declaration claimed from the defendants "jointly or one or other of them." Hence the liability of the Gas Company does not involve that of the Town Council. At most we were only guilty of non-feasance by not filling up our sewer, and I have not heard a single argument yet to show we were bound to do so.

Sir H. Juta (in reply): The main fallacy of the argument on behalf of the Town Council is that they had no control over the Gas Company. But they had, and Mr. Benjamin has clearly shown that the Council is the employer and the company the agent. The Council lights the streets through the company, and therefore many of the cases cited for the Council are not in point. The next point urged on behalf of the Council was that they were not guilty of misfeasance, but only (at most) of non-feasance; but many of the subtle distinctions drawn between misfeasance and non-feasance are neither law nor common-sense. O'Shea's case shows that by adopting this sewer, and failing to keep it in proper condition, the Council have rendered themselves liable. By statute they were bound to ventilate the sewer, and they not only fail to do so, but carefully close up all means of ventilation, and then bring gas into dangerous proximity to this closed sewer. The correspondence between the Council and the company in June, 1891, shows that the Council exercised control over the company, and were fully alive to the danger of gas getting into unventilated sewers.

[Counsel proceeded to discuss the case of Rylands v. Fletcher and many of the cases cited on the other side, and concluded by dealing with the question of damages.]

Buchanan, J.: This case has lasted for a considerable time, and has been thoroughly thrashed out. The evidence has been fully given, and a number of authorities have been cited in argument, and I therefore do not think that it is necessary for me to take time to consider my judgment. It appears from the evidence that, in olden times, in Cape Town a so-called canal ran down the street now known as Adderley-street; and that from time to time this canal was covered over either by the old Municipal authorities or by the present Town Council. According to Dr. Gregory's evidence this seems to have been done in sections, thus converting the canal into a covered sewer. This sewer was extended to the sea as from time to time Adderley-street was lengthened out over reclaimed land. For many years this closed canal was used as a sewer. In 1897 the Health Officer of the Colony was requested to report on the state of the sewers of Cape Town, and after his report was received and adopted, the Town Council used this sewer only as a storm-water drain. Later on the Council constructed a new storm-water drain and sewer and in so constructing this new sewer they intercepted the old drain at the upper end of Adderley-street, and also lower down they intercepted the triple sewers as they have been called, which formed the communication between the old sewer and the sea. By so doing they closed off the old sewer and made it an underground chamber. In 1891, while the sewer was still being used, the Gas Company laid a high pressure gas main across triple sewers, at the lower end of the main sewer and in so doing cut through the crown of these sewers with their pipe. After the new sewer had been completed, the Town Council officials built a wall at the upper end of the now unused sewer, near what is known as Cartwright's corner—a wall which completely shut off the lower part of the sewer from the upper part. This was done some three weeks or so before the explosion took place. This sewer so shut off had, it is true, some man-holes, but they were closed up and cemented. Unfortunately on the 13th June, 1905, an explosion took place in this sewer. I have no doubt, after hearing the evidence, that the explosion was not of sewer gas, or of any other gas except coal gas, and the question is, how did this coal gas get into the sewer? The weight of evidence, I think, points to the fact that the principal source from which this coal gas got into the sewer was from the high pressure main which crossed the crown of the triple sewers at the lower end of the street. The question we have to consider is: Who is answerable for this explosion? Was the explosion merely an accident, an uncontrollable accident, or was it due to negligence of either or both of the defendants? The defendants (the Town Council and the Gas Company) have been joined in this action. An exception was taken on the pleadings and argued before another branch of this Court before the trial as to whether this joinder of the two defendants was permissible or not under the circumstances disclosed in the declaration. The Court held that the joinder on the allegations of the pleadings was permissible, and this judgment was not appealed against, and must now be held to bind the parties to the suit. In actions for tort the complaint more frequently is, not that those who contributed to the wrong are joined, but that other tortfeasors are not joined in the action. It is true that the plaintiffs had the option of suing alone one or more of the alleged wrong-doers. It is quite possible if they had adopted this course and brought actions against the two defendants separately that the Court would have ordered the two actions to have been consolidated for the purpose of saving expense, or at any rate that the hearing of the two actions should be taken at the same time. In this case I do not see how any injustice is done to either defendant in joining them in one action I am not going to re-open the question of misjoinder. It is true that the counsel have contended that the point upon which the Court went in dismissing the exception of nonjoinder, was that the allegations in the declaration alleged a joint act of negligence by both defendants as the cause of the explosion. I am going into the facts presently, and if there was such a joint action there can be no doubt that the defendants were properly joined. But on the authorities I am inclined to go a step further, and say that if two interconnected acts are done by two different defendants, and they together result in damage to the plaintiffs, though these two acts are done by each defendant independently of the other, still if they are so interconnected as to combine to cause injury, then there is no wrong in joining both defendants in one action. However, I am not now going to re-open the question of misjoinder, but shall leave that matter, if the parties are dissatisfied with my decisions, to be taken to a higher Court. The explosion having taken place, the first point to be considered is: Was the explosion the result of an accident, or was it the result of negligence? For I think that to found these cases there must be negligence on the part of the parties who are brought into Court. A point has been argued as to the application of the principle laid down in Rylands v. Fletcher to this case. The principle of Rylands v. Fletcher, as I understand it, is this, that a person who makes an unnatural use of his property and brings on to his property material that may be dangerous to others is answerable for the material so brought if it escapes and causes damage. Rylands v. Fletcher was discussed in what may be termed the leading case of this Colony, the case of the Electric Cable Company, which went on appeal. Though some misconception of the remarks of His Lordship the Chief Justice in his judgment in this Court as to full application of the doctrine laid down in Rylands v. Fletcher to our law, appears in the Privy Council decision, there does not seem to me to be any real disagreement in principle. If the ground of the decision in Rylands v. Fletcher be stated in its broadest terms, then on that ground alone there may be good reason to hold the defendant Gas Company liable, as the gas which caused the explosion was brought on to the spot by them. But I think there is clear evidence of culpa or negligence on the part of both defendants. The Gas Company had no statutory authority to bring the gas into the streets of Cape Town; but they cannot be said to have brought it there unlawfully. The streets were under the control and management of the Municipal authorities, and I think, looking even at Mr. Cairncross's evidence, it is impossible to hold that the Gas Company brought the gas into Adderley-street and across Adderley-street otherwise than with the knowledge, consent and permission of the Town Council. I also, from Mr. Cairncross's own evidence, come to the conclusion that the gas main, when carried across Adderley-street, was placed through the crown of the triple sewers, with the knowledge, consent and permission of the Town Council. There was some dispute between the Gas Company and the Town Council at the time, but Mr. Cairncross, in his evidence, would indicate that this laying of the mains through the crown was not objected to and was not against the wish of the Town Council. One thing that was remarkable is, that Mr. Cairncross says that he does not know who gave the consent, or superintended the work being done in this particular instance. He had other things to do, but he had a clerk of the works, and as we have seen, it was this clerk of the works who signed the written consent which was the only document which could be produced by the Town Council. Permits were constantly asked for, according to Mr. Arnott, whenever the streets were to be opened and were constantly given by some one or other Municipal official. It is shown that there was no record of such permits kept. The record should be kept, not by the plaintiffs in this case, but by the Council themselves, and I think on the facts that permits were given of which no record was made. Mr. Cairncross says that the general permit which was granted was signed by his assistant, who had just been appointed, and he goes on to say: "My instructions were that where gas pipes had to be taken through the masonry of sewers the mains were to be enclosed in concrete or cement." In the face of this, it is impossible to hold that the officials of the Town Council in 1891 did not know that the mains were being taken through the crown of the sewers, or that this was done against the wishes of the officials of the Municipality. "There were many places in Cape Town," Mr. Cairncross goes on to say, "where it was impossible for the sewers to have escaped being touched by the mains. The sewers were so near the surface that the pipes could not get cover without cutting into the masonry of the sewer." And he says further: "I saw no objection to that gas main coming through the brickwork of the arch of the sewer, taking everything into consideration, on the assumption that it was properly masoned at the sides and at the top." The utmost that can be said is this, that Mr. Cairncross wished when the mains cut through the sewers they should be properly masoned at the sides and top, and I think it is quite possible that the Clerk of the Works saw what was done, and, according to what Mr. Arnott says, approved what was done, so that whatever was done was done with the permission and consent of the Town Council. Now, the high pressure main, which crossed at the lower end of Adderley-street, had, where it crossed the triple sewer, near the centre of the triple sewer, a joint between the pipes. Taking all the evidence—that of Mr. Cairncross, Mr. Craig, Mr. Stainthorpe, and even the present engineers for the Town Council, Mr. Cook, Mr. Jeffreys and Mr. Wynne Roberts—the engineers and experts, after having seen the main, after having seen the way in which it crossed the crown, after having seen the joint, are unanimous in holding that this was the place at which the escaping gas was fed into the sewer. The question is: Was this way of laying the main through the brickwork of the crown of the sewer, a proper way of laying the main or not? Here again the leading engineers both for the plaintiffs and the Town Council are of one opinion. Mr. Stainthorpe says that the laying of the main in this way was absolutely wrong. Mr. Craig agrees with him. Mr. Cook (the City Engineer) had no idea that the main cut through the sewer. Mr. Perkins is one of those who, when the new sewerage works were made, joined Mr. Rigby (the Town Drainage Engineer) in the "crusade," as he calls it, against removing the mains from the sewer. Why should this crusade take place if it was not an improper thing? He also goes on to say that they have taken care in the new works no gas mains cross or intersect any sewers at all. This was done before the explosion, and it points to the fact that the laying of the mains through the sewers was improper. The fact that these mains ran through the crowns of the sewers, or through the sewers, was known to the Municipality long before the explosion is, I think, clearly evidenced by Dr. Gregory's report, which he made to the Town Council, which they accepted, and to which no objection was taken. In this report he pointed out clearly to the Town Council that "a far more serious result than the bad state of the sewers is that water and gas mains have in places to pass directly through the body of the sewers." As to these sewers, it is not shown that they have passed through what is called the body of the sewers, but it is shown that being cut through the crown of the sewer they were connected with the body of the sewer, though they did not decrease the size of the sewer. "Such a thing is undesirable in case of gas mains, but with water mains it is a most improper proceeding, and for obvious reasons it should not be allowed to continue." Dr. Gregory, in so reporting, was no doubt actuated solely from a health point of view, but the other engineers, when they knew of it, condemned it as an unsafe proceeding. Mr. Cook said if he had known of this he would have had the main up at once. I think his language is very strong on this: "Had I known that there had been a gas main running through the triple sewers, I would have had it got out long ago. I would also have had the sewer filled up. It was a very improper and dangerous state of affairs whoever was responsible." Now, here is a strong condemnation by the City Engineer. Of course, there is this excuse for the present city engineers, that the town has grown, the work has increased and has been divided between several different engineers, one having to look after the streets, another to look after the water, another the drains, but the fact that the present engineers, who have recently been appointed, did not know of the existence of what was done by the Council a number of years ago does not excuse the Council from any consequences resulting from their acts in the past. Here the Council have allowed this improper thing to go on and it has resulted in damage. When the main was placed across the sewer the sewer was in use. It was open at both ends. One of the witnesses says that in consequence of the use of this sewer there would necessarily be some ventilation through the sewer and the danger would be minimised. But the cutting off and closing of the drain made it, as Mr. Stainthorpe called it, an underground gasometer. It was not only closed at both ends, but all manholes were closed and cemented over, and absolutely no ventilation left. This clearly was a most dangerous and improper proceeding on the part of the Council. The act of the Gas Company was in bringing their gas to the sewer and the act of the Town Council was in allowing the gas to be so brought, and then in closing in the sewer and allowing the gas to collect therein without possibility of escape. The danger was certainly minimised as I have said, while the sewers were open, but it seems when once the sewers were closed the danger was rapidly increased, and led to the explosion which resulted in this action. I am, therefore, unable under such circumstances to find that the explosion which resulted was a pure accident, one which could not have been anticipated, and which arose from causes not under control. The Town Council had also, from other explosions which took place in other sewers in Cape Town, a warning before this accident that gas would collect in underground chambers, and when these chambers were not ventilated, and that there was considerable danger arising therefrom. Some of these explosions took place even in ventilated sewers, but in this sewer there was absolutely no ventilation of any kind. Both defendants had further pleaded that even if there was negligence on their part there was contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiffs in this case in that the plaintiffs, in welding the tramway joints in the way they did, did that which was the immediate cause of the explosion. Now, I have gone carefully through the evidence and listened carefully to the arguments of counsel to ascertain whether I would be justified, as a juror, in saying that there has been contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiffs. I must say I cannot hold there was such contributory negligence. The plaintiffs did what they were perfectly entitled to do, and what they were allowed to do with reference to the joining of their rails. They had authority to lay their tram rails along the streets of Cape Town, and when those tram rails were laid they had joined the ends of the rails by what is called the "Thermit" process. This process was that by means of a mixture to melt iron filings, which molten metal was run into a mould in which was contained the ends of the two rails. The metal thus united the rails, so that they became right through the whole length and breadth equivalent to a continuous rail. The Tramway Company had been "running," as it is called, these joints all the way along their rails. They had done so for some months in all the joints in Adderley-street, and on the very morning of the explosion they had run a joint very near the spot, at the other end of the rail from the one which they were running at the time the explosion took place. This was done in the open air on the surface of the street, and an expert like Mr. Juritz, the Government Analyst, says that though this melting of the iron for the purpose of running the joint was of such a nature that it would cause gas in the immediate neighbourhood to ignite; still that gas on the surface of the ground would dissipate very rapidly, and it would not be anticipated that there would be any danger in running the joints on the surface of the road. It is only common sense to say that it is a very different thing to run joints on the roadway, in the open air, from a person taking a lighted candle into a room if he knew gas was escaping in the room, and thus causing an explosion. The only negligence which is alleged against the Tramway Company is the fact that there was a strong smell of gas at the place, but there was nothing to indicate to the Tramway people either that the smell came from any concealed gasometer under the earth. There was nothing to indicate the existence of any such gasometer, and all the experts say that the molten metal used for running the joints could not possibly run through the ground so as to communicate with the sewer down below. One of the experts said that there must be an actual aperture, communicating with the gas down below before any ignition of the gas on the surface could be communicated to the gas in the sewer. If the gas was escaping through the earth or through the sand and was ignited on the surface, the flame would not go through the ground to where the gas came from, unless there was an aperture, a connection by air, allowing the ignited gas on the surface to run down into the collected gas in the sewer below. There is nothing to indicate to the Tramway Company the existence of any such open-air connection, or that any danger existed. That the explosion might have been caused by any other person is shown by the fact that, even before the running of this joint, the gas was seen at another part of the street actually burning on the surface. The Gas Company's servants had seen this, and they were working near the spot at the time, and one of them—Mr. Humphreys, I think it was—said this gas might have been lighted by a spark from the pick in opening the ground. The Gas people were working at the place at the time the explosion took place, they were working there before the explosion, and yet they did not consider the escape of gas was of any such importance as to induce them to warn or stop the Tramway people from running the joint. A piece of metal was shovelled up and has been shown in Court, but from what has been said and from the fact that the joint was properly run, I am not clear that this metal had anything to do with the running of this particular joint. But I am certain of this, that even if that metal had escaped from the mould around the joint and had penetrated the earth a depth of a foot or so, which I don't see how it could have done, it could not have ignited the gas in the sewer unless there had been a direct connection by means of an aperture between the sewer and the earth. The Tramway people were doing what they had done safely all along, there was no reason to expect any results at this particular spot; they were running this joint by the aid of skilled workmen, it was done in the usual way; the mould was made in the usual way, and I cannot lay hold of any fact upon which to find that there was such contributory negligence on their part as to justify me in refusing to give them compensation for the damage they have suffered. Summing up briefly, I think in this case it has been shown that there has been negligence on the part of the Town Council and of the Gas Company, that there has been no contributory negligence on the part of the Tramway Company, and consequently that they are entitled to damages for loss they have suffered. The question is, what damage have they suffered? They claim under three different heads. The first is the sum of £1,044, which they allege it has cost them to replace the rails which have been blown up by the explosion. This amount is not seriously contested, and judgment will be entered on prayer (a) for the sum of £1,044. The second is for the sum of £2,033, which is arrived at in this way. They allege that in consequence of this explosion their communication was cut off along Adderley-street and they lost the profits which they would have earned by carrying passengers, and they also incurred other expenses in the supervision of traffic. The amount of £2,000 is arrived at by comparing the amount taken by the Tramway Company in the same period in the previous year with the amount which they took in this year. This I do not think is a basis upon which I can act in this case for several reasons. One is the traffic is likely to be disturbed by the state of the weather; another is all through the six months both before and after this particular month in which the accident took place the takings of the Tramway Company during 1905 were month by month considerably less than the takings of the Tramway Company in the same months of the previous year. Then again it is a question how far traffic might not have been reduced by dislocation of the service in other places besides Adderley-street. But I am forced to the conclusion that the Tramway Company had suffered some additional expenses of management of its business through this interruption and I am also of opinion that they did suffer some loss of traffic on this account. The month previous to the explosion the tramway traffic had been interrupted by the action of the Tramway Company themselves having to lay down fresh rails and this may have effected their takings and naturally would have affected their takings if there had been no explosion at all. Comparing the four weeks it took to repair the consequences of the explosion, with the four weeks immediately succeeding the explosion, there is no doubt an increase of money was taken by the Tramway Company in the succeeding four weeks when the line had been re-opened. The money taken by the Tramway Company after the explosion during the months of July and August was certainly less, considerably less, than the amount of money taken by the Tramway Company during the months of July and August in the previous year, but there is no doubt the Tramway Company must have lost something by the interruption of their line. They also incurred expenses in having extra guards, etc., and having to divert the traffic in other directions.

The onus is upon the Tramway Company clearly to satisfy the Court as to what damages they have suffered. But the amount is left in this indefinite way, and I can only assess an amount which as a juror, I take it they meant at least now lost. Sitting as a juror, I think I cannot award on the second claim more than the sum of £250 as damages. Then there is under the third head a claim for £700. Some of the items making up this amount have been abandoned but one claim of £250 is insisted upon as having been sustained by reason of the sinking of the new rails which were laid after the explosion owing to the settlement of the street after the filling up of the sewer had taken place. In this case I am not inclined to think that that is a claim which can be sustained, for this reason, that the new rails were laid with a knowledge that the sewer had just been filled up. The plaintiffs knew the nature of the ground they laid their rails on the loose ground, and they could have taken due precautions so as to prevent this settlement. Moreover I am not prepared to say that the settlement could not be expected in newly laid rails, and it is one of the contingencies which would happen to the company in laying rails along the street. I, therefore, do not think they are entitled to any damages upon this third item. There is one thing I forgot to mention as evidence of negligence on the part of the Town Council, and that is the fact that their Engineer, when he closed up this underground drain, intended at the time to have it filled up. It is clear that he thought it was an improper thing to leave it unfilled and he says he intended to fill it up, when he was reducing the level of Adderley-street later on, as he thought this disused sewer would be a convenient spot in which to tip the stuff taken off the surface of the street. He said the cost of filling up the sewer was only £150. It does seem extraordinary that when the filling up could be done at such a cost it was not done. The Town Council have wisely, I think, after this explosion has taken place, learnt the lesson which it has taught them, and which they ought to have learnt before, and have filled up unused drains in other streets in Cape Town. The authorities which have been cited have been useful not so much as laying down any particular principle of law, but as illustrations of what Courts have done in other cases in which there has been damage done through misconduct or negligence on the part of the defendants. I think that taking all the circumstances into consideration, I am doing justice to the parties in giving judgment for £1044 and £250 for the plaintiffs against both defendants with costs of suit.

plaintiff, £45 being portion of the balance still in their hands towards the payment of the interest due on the bond on December 31, 1905, and credited the plaintiff with the amount. The property had not been reinstated to the satisfaction of the defendants as holders of the policy. The plaintiff was not entitled to claim payment of any portion of the balance in hand, but defendants were prepared to allow and tendered to allow the sum to be expended in reinstating the property to their satisfaction or to be deducted from the capital of the bond.

In his replication the plaintiff admitted passing a mortgage bond in favour of defendants, and that the defendants insured the property, but he said they did so on his behalf, and that they held the policy of insurance as collateral security for the amount advanced under and by virtue of the mortgage bond. It was admitted that the half-yearly interest was not paid on December 31, 1905, but the matter was settled between the parties. A fire occurred and the defendant received the sum of £207 5s. 10d. on plaintiff's behalf from the Atlas Insurance Co. On January 4, 1906, plaintiff reported the fire to the first defendant, and it was agreed between the parties: (a) that the damage done would be reinstated by plaintiff, provided the Atlas Assurance Co. agreed thereto, and (2) that from any amount which should thereafter be paid by the said company to defendants the interest then due on the bond, £45, should be deducted by defendants. The company agreed that plaintiff should reinstate the property and plaintiff authorised one Henry Rowe Rowe to assess the damage caused by the fire. On January 23 plaintiff informed first defendant that plaintiff would personally attend to the reinstatement of the property and instructed first defendant to deduct the £45 due for interest from £207 5s. 10d. A certain portion of the work was carried out under instructions from the plaintiff by Messrs. Rowe and Co., who satisfactorily completed same, in accordance with their estimate for the sum of £32 10s. The remainder of the work was satisfactorily completed by plaintiff. The whole of the work was carried out in accordance with the municipal regulations and under the supervision of the municipal authorities, and to their entire satisfaction. The defendants applied for provisional sentence against the plaintiff on the mortgage bond, on the ground of non-payment of interest of £45, but their application was refused, with costs, on July 28, 1906.

Mr. Alexander (with him Mr. Long) for plaintiff. Mr. P. S. T. Jones for defendant.

Benzion Cohen, plaintiff, stated that on the 27th July, 1903, he got an advance of £1,500 on his property, and passed a mortgage bond. A policy in the Sun Insurance Company was ceded to the first defendant. The insurance was subsequently transferred to the Atlas Company. On 3rd January this year a fire occurred, and witness saw Mr. Gibson, and told him that he would reinstate the building when he got the insurance money, and a sum of £45—overdue interest—was to be given out of the fund. Mr. Gibson agreed to this, and plaintiff reinstated the building as it was before the fire.

Henry Rowe Rowe, for the defence, said he had recently inspected the property, and it had not been reinstated in a manner he would have passed if it had been carried out under his supervision. From the outside the building had the appearance now as if there was a fire in it last week. The reinstatement of the building was not satisfactory.

Counsel having been heard in argument, on the facts.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (June 12th).

Hopley, J.: This is a case in which Benzion Cohen sues the executors of the estate Stanford for £141 odd, which he alleges is money of his received by the executors, or by Mr. Gibson, one of them, for his benefit, and held by Gibson for him and on his behalf. The facts are that the executors of estate Stanford advanced the sum of £1,500 to Cohen, for which they obtained a mortgage bond on certain property in Vinken-lane, off Long-street, Cape Town. As collateral security they took also a fire insurance policy that was on the buildings at the time for the amount of £1,500. Thereafter the insurance was transferred to the Atlas Company, and it was taken out at that time, not in the name of Benzion Cohen (the owner of the property), but in the name of Mr. Harry Gibson (one of the executors), who, of course, had an insurable interest in the building. Cohen, however, was charged with, and did pay, the premiums, and therefore there seems to be no doubt that the insurance, although taken out in Gibson's name, was eventually, and if anything should result out of it beyond the amount for which it was security for the estate, the balance, if any, should belong to Cohen himself. Now, the whole question in this case is whether the sum of money which did come from this insurance, at present in the hands of Mr. Gibson, is now claimable or not claimable by Cohen. On the 3rd January there was a fire, and Cohen himself called in an architect, who is also very frequently an assessor (Mr. Rowe Rowe), to look into this matter, and to assess the damage. Mr. Rowe undertook the position, and the Atlas Company was represented by Mr. Mount. These two gentlemen went very carefully into the matter, and I think they were assisted by a practical builder, and they came to the conclusion that the amount of £207 odd was the right amount to be awarded to the insurer for the purpose of reinstating the building. That amount was accordingly paid over to Mr. Gibson, who was the only person that the insurance company recognised in this matter. Now, as to the reinstatement and the way in which it was to be carried out, there is a considerable conflict of evidence. Benzion Cohen himself says that on the morning after the fire, or on the day of the fire, he went and had a personal interview with Mr. Gibson at his office, and that he then said to Mr. Gibson that he would himself reinstate the building, that Mr. Gibson might, out of the money to be awarded by the insurance company for the fire, pay an amount to himself of £45, which was interest on the bond overdue, and that he was to pay over any balance that there was afterwards, after all expenses had been deducted, to himself, Benzion Cohen. Now, it seems to me that that interview, which is entirely denied by Mr. Gibson, who says that he did hear that Cohen called the day after the fire, but that he (Mr. Gibson) was out—the terms of that interview, as stated by Cohen, are so wholly improbable that I cannot believe that the alleged interview ever took place, or that such terms were arranged between Gibson and Cohen. I accept Mr. Gibson's evidence in preference to Cohen's on this matter. Gibson says that he said nothing of the sort, that he knew nothing of the fire until a considerable time afterwards, when Mr. Rowe, who had been appointed assessor by Cohen, came and asked him for the fire policy, and Rowe (he says) was the first person who informed him that there had been a fire. However, the matter was finally assessed, and £207 odd was paid to Mr. Gibson. Mr. Gibson swears that Cohen came to him and said that he proposed to reinstate the building himself. Gibson said that he was firm from the very start on that point, and that he would not allow it. Here again, I believe Mr. Gibson in preference to Mr. Cohen. Mr. Gibson was (he says) protecting an estate in which there were minors concerned, and he might, in his capacity under the trust, be called upon at some time or other by the minors or their guardians to account for every penny of this fund, as it was held as collateral security, and he was bound to see that the building was left in as good repair and was as valuable as it was at the time he took the bond. It was extremely unlikely, to my mind—and Mr. Gibson said it was a thing he never contemplated—that he should hand over the reinstatement to Mr. Cohen, who would, in these circumstances, have every inducement to "scamp" the work, for the purpose of being able to get hold of the balance of this fund, which he might, under the circumstances, look upon as a sort of windfall. Out of the fund received by Mr. Gibson, Cohen authorised him to pay two sums of £12 12s. and £8 11s. to the assessor. Mr. Gibson says that he afterwards accepted a tender of £165 from Rowe and Co. He accepted that tender, and told Rowe and Co. to proceed with the work of reinstating the building, under the supervision of Mr. Rowe Rowe. Gibson paid under the architect's certificate £50, and afterwards £12 9s., representing the total disbursements he has made of £83 2s. The people whom Gibson had put on to do the work, with the consent of Cohen, were turned off by Cohen. The only person whom Gibson could rely upon, the trustworthy person that he felt inclined to rely upon, was the architect, who advised him that the place had not been properly reinstated. I think, under such circumstances as these, where such a balance as claimed by Cohen, the onus of proving that the place has been properly reinstated, so that he can claim from Gibson, in his capacity, any balance of moneys he holds as part of his collateral security, rests entirely upon the plaintiff. I think he has failed in that matter in the present case, and it is impossible to say that the sum of £78 13s. 10d., which now remains in Mr. Gibson's hands, will not yet be required for the purpose of properly reinstating the building. I do not think the place has been properly reinstated, at any rate it has not been proved to my satisfaction, and there must be judgment of absolution from the instance, with costs.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

LINDHIRST V. NUTTEBI AND } 1906.
POMLA. { June 7th.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £24 10s., with interest from the 25th August, 1904, and costs.

Order granted.

HAZELL V. SCHMIDT.

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan moved for provisional sentence for £126 19s. 2d., balance of a certain mortgage bond for £160, the bond having been called up; counsel also applied for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable. Counsel added that defendant had filed an affidavit, denying that he was indebted under the bond.

Defendant afterwards appeared, and presented a written statement to the effect that he was a German farmer residing on the Cape Downs, and, although a naturalised British subject, he could not speak English fluently. He was unable to engage counsel, as his resources had been crippled, because of protracted and needless litigation.

Mr. Buchanan read an affidavit by defendant, from which it appeared that there had been a certain lawsuit between John Scott, jun., and himself. Plaintiff had acted for deponent in the matter. Defendant repudiated liability for a number of the items, but admitted that he was indebted in certain sums, and he said that the account rendered by plaintiff must be debated. He denied that he was indebted under the bond. Counsel also read an answering affidavit by Mr. Hazell, who said that the bond was passed to him so as to cover existing debts, the costs of the action Schmidt v. Scott, and for future advances. He repeated that the balance of £126 19s. 2d. was due under the bond passed by defendant.

Defendant protested against being charged with interest on the bond.

Hopley, J: It seems to be a matter rather of account than of the bond.

Provisional sentence will be refused, costs to stand over and to be mentioned when the principal case is heard.

LIND V. EXECUTORS ESTATE CAMPHER.

Mr. Howes moved for provisional sentence on a judgment of the Resident Magistrate's Court at Oudtshoorn for £8 3s. 7d. and taxed costs (£1 17s. 11d.), and costs of the present application, and also for certain landed property at Oudtshoorn to be declared executable. Counsel added that he was instructed to move as a matter of urgency, on the petition of the executors, for leave to sell the property, a minor being interested.

Hopley, J observed that it seemed that a good deal of unnecessary costs had been incurred to recover this small debt. Judgment would be given as prayed, subject to the production of certified appointment of executors. The property would be declared executable.

Mr. Howes then moved, on the petition of the executors, for leave to sell the property for £140, in accordance with an offer, or should the offer be withdrawn, to sell by public auction. The Master, in his report, complained that the information was insufficient.

Leave was granted to petitioners to sell the property for the purpose of liquidating the debts, and for the proper distribution of the balance according to the will.

JEFFCOAT AND ANOTHER V. PETERSEN.

Mr. Swift moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £100, with interest, the bond having become due by reason of the non-payment of interest; counsel also applied for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable.

Order granted.

WAED V. DU PLESSIS.

Mr. De Waal moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £56 15s., with interest, the bond having become due by reason of the non-payment of interest; counsel also applied for judgment for £13 19s., being balance of a certain acknowledgment of debt, with interest, due by reason of non-payment of monthly instalments; counsel asked that the property specially hypothecated be declared executable.

Provisional sentence granted as prayed, property executable for the amount of mortgage.

KING V. SWART.

Mr. De Waal moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £137 10s., with interest and costs.

Order granted.

MOLEVELD V. VAN ROOYEN.

Mr. Bailey moved for a decree of civil imprisonment upon an unsatisfied judgment of this Court for £317 9s. 3d., together with interest and costs amounting to £10 1s. 3d.

Defendant said that he was the holder of a promissory note from another party (Mr. De Jong), and he was gradually getting money from sales of erven in the Orange River Colony. He was prepared to offer 30s. a month until things got better. Property was not very saleable at present. He was willing to cede the promissory note from De Jong to the plaintiff. He was an auctioneer. Things were so bad that he could not increase the offer.

Mr. Bailey applied for an order of £10 a month, and pointed out that defendant admitted that he was an auctioneer.

Decree granted, with costs, operation to be suspended on payment of £1 10s. on the last day of this month and of each succeeding month, at the office of Mr. Home (Worcester), and on condition that defendant cede the power of attorney he holds from De Jong to plaintiff and all rights to any proceeds from the sale of the properties of the said De Jong in the Orange River Colony, or elsewhere, by the last day of this month, plaintiff to have leave to apply for increased monthly payments.

VAN DER SPUY V. GERLOFF.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £2,000, with interest, the bond having become due by reason of the non-payment of interest; counsel also applied for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable, and for the rents accruing from the property to be attached by the Sheriff.

Order granted.

MARSH HOMES V. DU TOIT.

Mr. Toms moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £900, with interest, due by reason of the non-payment of interest; counsel also applied for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable.

Order granted.

PHILLIPS V. RHODIE.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers (for plaintiff) moved for the discharge of the provisional order of sequestration against defendant.

Provisional order discharged.

OHLSSON V. COHEN.

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan appeared for plaintiff; Dr. Greer was for defendant.

Mr. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £5,000, together with interest at 6 per cent. per annum reckoned from July 1, 1905, the bond having become due by reason of the non-payment of interest; counsel also applied for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable.

Affidavits were read, from which it appeared that defendant had had a bottle store in Long-street, and had had an interest in the Mechanics Hotel, Harrington-street. Defendant said that the bond was granted to him in January, 1903, for a period of five years, the consideration being that he bound himself to deal with Ohlsson's Cape Breweries exclusively for Colonial beers for 30 years. A complicated series of transactions in reference to the bottle store and the Mechanics Hotel was set out in defendant's affidavit, the main point of which was that plaintiff had agreed to place interest due against a certain promissory note for £670, held by plaintiff, from one Clarke. This note had originally been given by the purchaser of defendant's share in the Mechanics Hotel. Clarke was now the proprietor of the Mechanics Hotel. Affidavits by plaintiff and others were read to the effect that the interest was overdue, and that no such arrangement had been entered into as that described by defendant. Plaintiff said that he advanced the money personally, and that the company had no interest whatever in the sum of £5,000, or the interest due thereon.

Dr. Greer having been heard in argument on the facts,

Hopley, J.: The only defence to the plaintiffs claim is that the interest is not in arrear, and, therefore, no breach of the conditions of the bond has been committed. The defendant to show that the interest is not in arrear, does not produce any evidence of money payments directly on behalf of himself of interest, but he brings in a promissory note which arises out of another portion of his business, a public house in which he had an interest. This promissory note was given by one Isaac Israel, when he purchased the defendant's interest in the house. That note has been lodged, not with Anders Ohlsson himself, but with the company, of which he is managing director, and presumably a large shareholder. The whole question seems to me to be whether that promissory note was ever taken by Anders Ohlsson in his individual capacity and held by him as security or in payment for any interest accruing out of this mortgage bond. There are voluminous affidavits and numerous contradictions. I have to consider in a case like this whether it looks, as far as the documents before me at present go, where the probable success would be if this matter went to an action. Looking upon the documents as they at present stand and the affidavits as they are, and the value to be attached to them, I come to the conclusion that this is a case in which I ought to grant provisional sentence. One can only look upon this bond as a bond belonging to plaintiff's private estate, and made by him out of his private funds. Clearly the interest on this bond for £5,000 is in arrear; nothing has been done by the defendant to meet that interest, and therefore there has been a breach of the conditions of the bond and provisional sentence must be granted as prayed, with costs.

Mr. Buchanan then moved in the matter of Ohlsson's Cape Breweries v. Leopold Cohen for provisional sentence on two promissory notes for £300 and £200 respectively, less £70 paid on account, and for interest.

Dr. Greer applied for a postponement for a week to enable defendant to file affidavits.

Mr. Buchanan opposed the application on the ground that the case had already stood over for a week for that very purpose. At the very least, he contended, defendant must pay wasted costs occasioned by the postponement.

The case was ordered to stand over until next Thursday, defendant to pay wasted costs, and to file affidavits on or before Saturday next.

ILLIQUID ROLL.

NATIONAL BANK V. BOOSE. { 1906.

HUGO AND ANOTHER V. OLIVIER.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved for an order declaring the respondent of unsound mind and incapable of managing her affairs and appointing a curator of her person and property. Counsel read affidavits by the respondent's medical attendants, and the curator ad litem. In answer to the Court, he said that it was proposed later on to send respondent to a suitable home in Holland or France.

Hopley, J., said that he could not consent to the removal of the respondent away from her home in that way. An order would be granted declaring respondent of unsound mind, and appointing Jacobus P. Hugo (uncle of the respondent) and Andries Philippus Olivier (her brother) as curators of her person and property, with power to sell movables.

DU TOIT V. ROYTOWSKI.

Dr. Greer moved for judgment under Rule 319 in default of plea, in terms of declaration for two sums of £99 9s. 3d., and £24 15s. Defendant had been given leave to file a plea, but he had not taken advantage of the opportunity granted to him by the Court.

KILLINGSWORTH V. KIL- { 1906.
LINGSWORTH. { June 7th.

Dr. Rainsford moved for a decree of divorce in default of compliance by plaintiff's wife with an order of restitution of conjugal rights. Defendant was in England, and a passage ticket had been offered to her, but she had refused to accept the same, as she did not intend to make use of it.

Decree of divorce granted, as prayed.

Ex parte ESTATE CAROLUS.

Mr. Lewis moved for a certain rule nisi to be made absolute, authorising cancellation of a lost mortgage bond.

Ex parte ESTATE KRUMMECK BROS.

This was an application by certain creditors of the insolvent estate of Krummeck Bros., calling upon A. N.

Foot, as curator bonis in the estate, to show cause why Abraham R. Truter and Edward William Rice should not be appointed joint trustees, or, in the alternative, A. R. Truter be appointed sole trustee. Mr. Lourens appeared for applicants; Mr. M. Bisset was for respondent.

It was stated that Mr. Foot was a member of the firm of E. R. Syfret and Co., of Cape Town, and the assets were at Beaufort West. The Cape Town creditors desired that Mr. Foot should be appointed to represent their interests. Mr. Truter was an attorney residing and practising at Beaufort West.

Having heard affidavits and counsel, Hopley, J., appointed Messrs. Truter and Rice as joint trustees, and directed costs to come out of the estate.

Ex parte ESTATE STANTON.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan moved, as a matter of urgency, on the petition of Henry Richard Wood, M.L.A., of Graham's Town, and Pyott, Limited, of Port Elizabeth, for a certain final order of sequestration of the estate of Arthur John Stanton to be set aside. The final order had been granted by the Eastern Districts Court, and the reason of urgency in the present application was that an offer had been made of a composition of 5s. in the £ on behalf of Stanton, provided the final order was forthwith set aside.

Hopley, J., said that he did not feel disposed at present to grant the application. The application was altogether outside the Insolvent Ordinance, and it was sought to interfere with an order granted by another Court. He would, if counsel desired, consult his brother Judges in the matter, but he could not grant an order at present.

SUPREME COURT

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

In re INSOLVENT ESTATE { 1906.
STANTON. { June 8th.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan mentioned this matter, which was an application, on the petition of H. R.

Wood, M.L.A., of Graham's Town, and Pyott Ltd., of Port Elizabeth, to have a final order of sequestration, granted by the Eastern Districts Court in the estate of Arthur John Stanton, set aside.

Hopley, J., declined to interfere, and advised counsel that the application should be directed to the Eastern Districts Court where the order was made. No order would be made on the application.

LOUW V. LOUW.

This was the return day of a summons calling upon Nicholaas Everhardus Louw, at the instance of his wife, to show cause why he should not be declared insane and incapable of taking care of his person and managing his affairs, and a curator appointed, with power to sell the movables for the maintenance of Louw and his wife, the present plaintiff, Classina Johanna Louw, of Somerset Strand; W. Roux appeared as curator ad litem.

Classina Johanna Louw, wife of the defendant, said that she had formerly resided with her husband in the Calvinia district, where he had carried on farming. In 1904 they removed to Somerset Strand, where her husband's condition had become worse. An action had been commenced against defendant by one Sampson. Witness would be able to look after him while he remained at home. She suggested that Mr. H. A. Fagan, of Somerset West, should be appointed curator of his property.

Dr. Waldron, of Somerset Strand, said that some time ago he attended the defendant and found him utterly unfit to manage his own affairs. Defendant was about 72 years of age. At present defendant was physically worse, and he was no better mentally.

Mr. Roux, as curator ad litem, said that he raised no objection to the application except that he suggested Mr. Fagan should be appointed curator of defendant's person and property. It had been decided in this Court that a lunatic's wife could not be appointed curator of his person.

Order granted, declaring defendant of unsound mind and appointing Mr. H. A. Fagan, of Somerset West, as curator of his person and goods, with power to sell movables (if any) as prayed.

HOWARD V. HOWARD.

This was a similar application, the plaintiff being Ellen Mabel Howard, of Durham-avenue, Salt River, and the defendant her husband, James Howard, at present a patient of the Valkenberg Asylum. Mr. Sutton was for plaintiff; Mr. Swift appeared as curator ad litem.

Ellen Mabel Howard, wife of the defendant, said that she was married in community of property to defendant at Johannesburg. Her husband was removed to the asylum about eighteen months ago. He has been very strange in his habits; he used to get up at all hours of the night. His memory was extremely defective. Witness desired to be appointed jointly with Mr. Wm. Arthur Currey as curator of defendant's person and property.

Dr. Dodds, medical superintendent of the Valkenberg Asylum, also gave evidence in support of the application.

Mr. Swift, as curator ad litem, said he was satisfied that defendant could not take care of himself or manage his own affairs.

Order granted, declaring defendant of unsound mind, and appointing Wm. Arthur Currey as curator of his person and W. A. Currey and defendant's wife as joint curators of the goods.

GIRDWOOD V. TODD. { 1906.
June 8th.
" 9th.
" 10th.

This was an action brought by Wm. Girdwood, medical practitioner and District Surgeon, Kentani, against Wm. Todd, also of Kentani, to recover £1,000 damages for alleged defamatory libel.

Plaintiff's declaration was in the following terms:

1. The plaintiff is and was at all times material a physician and surgeon, duly licensed, practising at Kentani, in this Colony, and is and was at all time material the duly appointed district surgeon for Kentani. The defendant resides at Kentani aforesaid.

2. In or about the month of October, 1905, the defendant wrote, and on or about the 26th day of the said month published, or caused to be published in a certain newspaper known as the "Transkeian Gazette," and circulating in Kentani, and throughout South Africa, the following false, malicious, and defamatory words of and concerning the plaintiff and of and concerning him in his said profession of physician and surgeon and of and concerning him in his said office of district surgeon, to wit: "The Editor 'Transkeian Gazette.'"

Sir,—Allow me through the medium of your columns to relate an incident which has caused great indignation here. On Friday last a few sportsmen were practising 'tilting the ring,' preparing for the coming sports in Butterworth, when one of them had a nasty fall. His horse, shying, threw him against the pole; the unfortunate fellow came down with a crash, bringing the pole with him. On examination it was found he had a deep cut along the top of his head, and a nasty bruise on his head.

Fortunately (at least, we thought so at the time) the doctor (meaning the plaintiff) was not far off, having just left the village a few minutes before. One of the young men galloped after him (meaning the plaintiff) and informed him of what had happened, and brought him back. On his arrival home the doctor (meaning the plaintiff) strolled leisurely over to the scene of the accident, and merely putting his hand on the unfortunate fellow's head, pronounced it a case of stunning. He (meaning the plaintiff) advised his friends to take him home, and it was not until he (meaning the plaintiff) was asked that he offered to lend his stretcher. Two young men accompanied him (meaning the plaintiff) over to his house, and on seeing that he had no intention of returning asked him about the dressing of the wounds. At this the doctor (meaning thereby the plaintiff) appeared surprised, evidently not even being aware of them. But even this did not have the effect of bringing him (meaning the plaintiff) to his sense of duty, he merely asking if they "thought" there was any carbolic at the hotel the injured man was staying at, and on being answered in the negative said he would send some down. When the doctor (meaning the plaintiff) was called back, he was on his way (I have since learned) to a musical entertainment at a friend's house about five miles distant, where he stayed overnight, and to this reason was in too great a hurry even to wait and attend the injuries of the young man. On the young men's return with the stretcher they informed their friends that the doctor (meaning the plaintiff) was not returning. Had a bomb-shell been thrown in their midst it could not have caused greater consternation, as by this time the unfortunate man had been lying unconscious for over half an hour. An old resident hurried over to the doctor (meaning the plaintiff) who was just leaving again, and succeeded in getting what dressing was required. An hour after the doctor's (meaning the plaintiff) departure they succeeded in bringing the injured man back to consciousness, but were greatly alarmed to find he was seized with cold shivers. However, with the help of hot water bottles, and all the aid inexperienced hands could do, they fixed him up comfortably for the night. On returning the following morning, the doctor (meaning the plaintiff) asked one who had been present the previous night, how long the man was unconscious after he (the doctor) left, and how his pulse was, showing that even he himself knew there was cause for anxiety. Surely such conduct on the part of a doctor is unprecedented, to leave a man lying unconscious, without examining him to ascertain the extent of his injuries? If the man had died, as it was he had a narrow escape, would it not have been a case for a judge and jury? Apart from his profession, is it not every man's duty to do all he can for his fellow men in such a predicament? I question whether a poor beathen Kafir would have treated a dog as our District Surgeon (meaning the plaintiff) treated this case. Perhaps it would be a good idea to get another medical practitioner to take his place when he is "on pleasure bent." The residents of this district can hardly consider themselves safe in the hands of such a man (meaning the plaintiff).—An Eye-Witness.

3. The said false, malicious, and defamatory words meant and imputed to the plaintiff and were intended by the defendant to mean and impute to the plaintiff that he had been and was guilty of gross misconduct in his profession of physician and surgeon as aforesaid, that he had acted in his said profession and office negligently, improperly, and with great cruelty, and that the plaintiff was so negligent and incompetent and inhuman that he was unfit to carry on his said profession or to perform the duties of his said office, and that the plaintiff had rendered himself liable to a criminal prosecution.

4. In consequence of the premises the plaintiff has been and is greatly prejudiced and injured in his credit and reputation, and in his profession of physician and surgeon as aforesaid, and in his office of District Surgeon as aforesaid, and has sustained damage in the sum of £1,000 sterling.

Wherefore the plaintiff claims: (a) £1,000 damages; (b) alternative relief; (c) costs of suit.

Defendant, in his plea, admitted that he caused to be published in the "Transkeian Gazette" the words complained of, and that the plaintiff was the doctor referred to, but he denied that the words were false, malicious, and defamatory. He admitted that the "Gazette" circulated in Kentani, but he said he knew nothing of its circulation elsewhere in South Africa. He denied the innuendo, and said that the words, so far as they were allegations of fact, were true in substance and in fact, and, in so far as they were comments, they were fair comment on a matter of public interest, and were made in good faith and without malice. He said, further, that the publication of the said words was for the public benefit. He denied that any damages had been sustained.

Mr. Upington (with him Mr. Swift) for plaintiff; Mr. W. P. Buchanan (with him Mr. Van Zyl) for defendant.

Mr. Upington said that he did not propose to lead evidence of special damages, inasmuch as his client had come into court, not with a view of making money out of the case, but solely with the object of clearing his character, which, he said, had been assailed in this letter. Under the circumstances, he submitted that the onus rested upon his learned friend of proving his plea of justification.

Mr. Buchanan said he could not admit that. If the plaintiff did not lead evidence he could get no damages.

Mr. Upington said that the point was important, and he desired to have a ruling of the Court. He must insist upon his right of leading rebutting evidence to any evidence in proof of the plea of justification.

His Lordship said that he saw no reason why the plaintiff should not proceed to prove his case. He ruled that plaintiff must begin the case in the ordinary way; he knew of no precedent to the contrary, and he was not going to create one in a libel matter.

Mr. Upington thereupon called

Wm. Girdwood (the plaintiff), who said that the "Transkeian Gazette" circulated in the Transkei and the district of Kentani. Witness had practised four or five years in Kentani, and he was the only doctor there. In reference to the incident in question, he had left the village, and had gone about a quarter of a mile, when defendant and a young boy came after him on horseback. He was informed that an accident had occurred, and was given particulars, and he drove back to his home. He walked about 30 or 40 yards, where the young man was lying. He walked over to the spot as quickly as he could; he did not "stroll leisurely over." He found one Curnick lying on the ground. He felt the man's pulse. He noticed that muscular rigidity was present, and that Curnick made a movement to elude his grasp. The pulse was regular and strong, but somewhat slow. He examined Curnick's eyes, and recognised that the reflexes were present. Witness (having explained, at the request of the Court, what he meant by "reflexes") went on to say that the eyes were not bloodshot. There was no discharge from the ear, but there was a slight discharge from a bruise on the nose. On the top of the head he found a shallow scalp wound, about an inch to an inch and a half long. He satisfied himself that there was no fracture at the base of the skull. He was satisfied that it was merely a case of stunning. The proper treatment for such a case was to put the patient to bed and keep him quiet. Witness offered to lend his stretcher, and showed defendant and another young man (James Macready) where it was. He told Curnick's friends to take him to the hotel and put him to bed. Witness went to his surgery and prepared some simple dressings and a sedative to lessen the nervous shock. He handed the dressings and sedative to an old resident named Macready, and gave him instructions. Witness then proceeded on his journey, and stayed that night at a friend's house, about five miles from Kentani. He wished to be handy for a confinement that was expected, though it did not take place, as a matter of fact till three or four days afterwards. He saw Curnick next morning, and he then seemed to be himself again. Curnick, who was the postmaster and telegraphist, could have returned to his duties on the following Monday. The case was never regarded by witness as critical. He thought it was advisable that the man should have a week's rest, and he gave him a certificate. The publication of the letter had done witness great damage. The Traders' Association sent a copy of the letter to him.

By the Court: He considered that that action of the Traders' Association was a piece of officiousness—an impertinence.

Witness (in further evidence) said he treated the present case as he should have treated any other.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: Witness was the only doctor in Kentani, and there was no chemist there. The nearest doctor was about twenty miles away. On the night in question he was going to spend the evening at the Rev. Mr. Auld's.

Mr. Buchanan: I put it to you that the treatment you have described to-day is what you should have given, but what you did not do?

Witness said that he administered the treatment he had described.

Cross-examination continued: The wound was not covered with grass and dirt. Curnick was partially conscious when witness left him on the evening of the accident. He did not hand over the responsibility for the case to Mr. Macready, sen. He admitted that he gave a certificate to Curnick recommending ten days' rest, his idea being that in a head injury it was well to guard against remote contingencies. The letter was also put into the "East London Dispatch" as proof of the report of the Traders' Association. He did not think the fact of bringing the action had done more harm than the original publication. He objected to the whole tone of the letter. Witness was still district surgeon, and the only physician at Kentani. He did not say that his practice had fallen off, but he thought the letter would damage him if he applied for an appointment elsewhere. He admitted having refused to attend Mr. Macready on February unless he gave him an assurance that he had not aided and abetted defendant throughout the proceedings. He denied having had a disagreement with Curnick.

Dr. E. B. Fuller, of Cape Town, and Dr. W. Darley Hartley, also of Cape Town, gave evidence to the effect that the diagnosis and treatment made and given by the plaintiff in this case were correct, assuming that the injury were such as had been described by the plaintiff.

William McGill, trader, Kentani, said that he was on the scene soon after the accident. He saw the doctor examine the injured man; the doctor was on the spot between five and ten minutes. He did not regard the case as serious, or one to make a fuss about. The wound was on the crown of Curnick's head; it was about one and a half inches long, but was not deep. He did not notice any dirt or grass in the wound.

Cross-examined: Witness admitted that the evidence he now gave differed from a statement he had made to defendant's attorney. Witness did not think there was any consternation over the doctor's conduct.

Mr. Buchanan: Some of the "young bloods" there wanted to tar and feather the doctor?

Witness: I did hear about it.

In further cross-examination, witness denied that he had been a leader in the movement against the doctor. He heard the letter read in the hotel dining-room before it was sent to the "Gazette"; he did not raise any objection to it. He would not say that he approved of the letter. Todd had discussed the present case with witness, and had shown him some of the letters. He did not think he had been Todd's "bosom friend" until lately.

Re-examined: Curnick, young Macready, and others were present when the letter was read in the hotel dining-room.

This concluded the evidence for plaintiff.

William Brown Macready, trader, Kentani, said defendant was his nephew, and assisted witness in his business. He had known plaintiff, whose father was a missionary, ever since he (the doctor) was a child. Curnick was shot from his horse against a sharp-edged pole, and he fell like a dead man. When the doctor came he felt the man's pulse, and asked how long he had been hurt. He said it was a case of stunning, and the best thing to do was to take Curnick to bed. Plaintiff did not make any further examination at that time. Curnick was lying with his head in a pool of blood, and even his friends did not recognise him. The doctor afterwards told witness that he did not intend to wait and see Curnick later that night. Witness received medicine and a dressing for Curnick from plaintiff. The wound extended from the brow to the crown of the head. The bone was bared at the crown. There was a wound on Curnick's nose as if it had been penetrated by a nail. Witness described the steps he took that night to attend to Curnick's injuries. He thought the wound was serious. A few days later McGill was at the hotel for the express purpose of keeping plaintiff out of Curnick's room. Curnick's hand was also cut by the accident, and he was still unable to use two of his fingers properly. Plaintiff had refused to attend witness unless he took a solemn oath that he had nothing to do with the letter. Witness had nothing to do with the letter, and he saw it for the first time when it appeared in the "Gazette."

William Brown Macready, of Kentani, cross-examined by Mr. Upington, said that plaintiff was not with the injured man Curnick for more than five minutes. Witness had often assisted plaintiff in dressing injuries. The doctor did not pass his hand over Curnick's head.

By the Court: Witness thought that the doctor should have come back to Curnick on the same night as the accident. He would not deny that plaintiff had reason to think the case would be properly attended to if left in his (witness's) hands. Dr. Girdwood was not very popular in Kentani. It was difficult to say why, but he had never been very popular in the district.

[Hopley, J.: Is there a feeling that you would like to get rid of him and get another district surgeon?]

Witness: As far as I am concerned, no.

As far as the feeling in general is concerned?—The feeling in the district is inclined that way. I think he is as clever a man as we could get in the town. His manner is just a little against him. He is rather short and abrupt, quick, and sensitive.

He has not got what they call the "bedside manner" to perfection?—Exactly; something of the kind.

This being the feeling against the doctor, do you think these young men thought it was a good chance of giving him a knock?—I don't think so; but I don't know. At 11 o'clock that night the witness McGill (called by plaintiff) said: "Let us tar and feather the b——; let us smash him up." I quietened the young men down. There is a bad feeling against the doctor for leaving Curnick as he did.

In further reply to the Court, witness said that he did not consider that the doctor's conduct was brutal, but he thought he had neglected the case.

William Todd (defendant), a young man, then gave evidence. He described the accident. As to the letter complained of, witness admitted that there was a "clerical error" in the statement that the doctor passed his hand over Curnick's head. By a "clerical error" he meant that he might have made a mistake in copying the original, which was in pencil. The letter sent to the "Gazette" was in ink. Everybody in Kentani was indignant over the doctor's conduct.

Cross-examined: Witness composed and wrote the letter; he was the sole author.

By the Court: Witness gathered the facts for the letter from eye-witnesses.

Further cross-examined: He admitted that it was only surmise on his part when he said the doctor wanted to go to a musical entertainment that evening. He did not now withdraw the statement nor did he adhere to it. Witness thought Curnick's condition was very serious when he was seized with cold shivers. That was what he meant when he said Curnick had a "narrow escape"; he always thought the end was near when the cold crept up a man.

Mr. Upington: Are there not a lot of you who want to get rid of Dr. Girdwood?

Witness: No; I have been quite satisfied with any treatment I have had from him. In answer to further questions, witness said that he still considered the letter to be fair criticism of a public man. Witness found fault with the doctor not for what he did, but for what he did not do.

By the Court: Witness sent the letter to the newspaper as a warning to the doctor. He thought when the doctor heard of it, he would be more careful in the future.

Wallace Whitfield, trader, Kentani, said he thought plaintiff was careless in his treatment of this case.

Norman Mills, salesman, Kentani, said that at the hotel on the night of the accident the young men were indignant because the doctor did not come back to see Curnick. McGill proposed to tar and feather the plaintiff, and give him a jolly good hiding. The Cricket Club had found some fault with plaintiff for not turning up at the matches, but they did not want him to neglect his patients.

This concluded the evidence.

Mr. Upington said that the questions at issue in this case were: (1) Were the allegations made in the letter false, malicious, and defamatory; and (2), if so, had the plaintiff sustained any damages. Now, publication was admitted, and it was admitted that the letter referred to plaintiff. Defendant had set up the plea of justification. There was no doubt that the letter was defamatory, if untrue. If the serious and grave imputations made against plaintiff were substantially true, he would be wholly unfit to hold the position of district surgeon in Kentani, or, indeed, to remain in the medical profession. Counsel commented on the discrepancy between the evidence for defendant and the alleged "clerical error" in the letter, to the effect that plaintiff passed his hand over the injured man's head. It was said that the plaintiff only stayed with the injured man a very little time, but they had the evidence of Dr. Fuller that an experienced medical man could diagnose such a case in thirty seconds, and it was admitted that plaintiff, though he might be abrupt, was a clever doctor and a quick worker. Was there a shadow of proof even upon the evidence of defendant's witnesses that the plaintiff acted negligently or with gross inhumanity or brutality, because, after all, that was the inference to be drawn from the letter? He submitted not. The injury was merely a cut on the head requiring simple treatment and rest and quiet. Dr. Girdwood, he submitted, did everything in the case that could reasonably be expected of a medical practitioner under the circumstances. As to the question of damages, counsel contended that under our law damages would naturally flow from such an injury, as it was clear plaintiff had sustained in this case. The matter was further aggravated by the fact that defendant had refused to apologise and withdraw the allegations, and to the very last he had persisted in his plea of justification.

Mr. Buchanan said he thought in the first place they must take out of the case the exaggerated innuendoes alleged in the plaintiff's declaration. The letter did not contain anything to warrant such innuendoes as were set out in the declaration. Plaintiff was not charged with cruelty or inhumanity or incompetence as a medical man. The gist of the letter was that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence, not perhaps even a high degree of negligence, but guilty of some negligence, as the only medical man on the spot, in his diagnosis and immediate following-up of the case. The question of whether there were a few slight inaccuracies in the letter was not of importance in such a case as this; it was not material whether defendant should have used the word "head" or "hand" in the letter. The question was whether the allegations contained in the letter had been proved to be true. They had the version of Dr. Girdwood, which was uncorroborated except by McGill, who admitted that he saw the letter before it was sent for publication, and raised no objection to it, and who also, it was proved, had been one of the foremost in wanting to do the doctor some injury at the time of the accident. The fallacy underlying the plaintiff's case was the assumption that Curnick's injury was of a minor character, and that the history of the case showed that. The good recovery made by Curnick was not attributable to the doctor's treatment, but to the care given by Mr. Macready, Sen. Plaintiff had no right to throw the responsibility for the care of Curnick upon Mr. Macready. Counsel submitted that the evidence of Dr. Darley Hartley showed that he was fighting the case point by point for plaintiff. He contended that Curnick had sustained a serious injury, and that the doctor's treatment was negligent and that the letter was true in substance, and in fact. Should the Court be against him on the facts, counsel submitted that the plaintiff had not even shown any likelihood of damages. No evidence had been adduced that any damage had been sustained or that any damages would be sustained.

Hopley, J.: In this matter the plaintiff is the District Surgeon for the district of Kentani. He seems to be the only medical man there and it appears from the evidence which has been elicited in the course of the case, that he is not altogether popular with some of the people in the district, possibly because he keeps himself rather aloof from a certain class in the town, and is not inclined to be exceedingly hale fellow well met, with the result that, as far as we know, some time before the unfortunate accident which has given rise to this case, in a small matter of village politics, some of these very young men who have been engaged in this case, either as witnesses or as the recipient of the injury which resulted from the accident, had actually asked him to resign from the local Cricket Club, on the ground that he sometimes did not play in the matches. That would rather show the temperament of these young men and the class of mind that there is in them. Surely it is an idiotic policy and an extreme measure to ask a member, and a reputable member, of the club, to resign because he did not always play in the matches. The sensible course would be to take his subscriptions and to make him an honorary member. On the 20th October last the doctor was going out in the afternoon about half-past four to spend the rest of that day at the Rev. Mr. Auld's, about five miles from Kentani, and, as it happens, in the direction in which he anticipated that he might have to attend that night a confinement. With him was Mrs. Girdwood, who was herself in a delicate state of health at the time. When they started, some men were practising for some sports, and were engaged in tilting the ring. For this purpose a pole, or quartern, was standing resting on a cross with arms about three feet long. This had been procured from Mr. Macready, who is one of the oldest inhabitants, and probably one of the most responsible men in the place. There was a ring on an arm and the young men were in the usual way, cantering or galloping past, trying to take off the ring with their lances. A man called Curnick, who is the local postmaster and telegraphist, and who was riding a horse lent him by the defendant in the present case, was unfortunate enough not to be able to control the horse at the last moment, so that it swerved and knocked his head against the pole. Fortunately for him, the pole was not fixed firmly in the ground, or his injuries might have been severe. The poet was knocked over. Considering that Curnick had his hat on at the time when his head was struck, that would in itself show that the injury could not have been exceedingly serious. However, it was sufficient to stun him for a time, and he fell down on the ground and slid along on his face a short distance on the village green. Now, anyone who had known the history of a case like that, and anyone who knows anyone who knows anything about falls from horses, would at once have concluded that it ought not to have been an exceedingly severe case. The doctor was sent for; he had only gone about a quarter of a mile, and horses and mounted men being ready, they soon came up with him and stopped him; and no doubt the boy who first reached the doctor told him briefly what the circumstances of the case were. The second man then came up with him—I am not sure that it was not the defendant himself—told him more, but the defendant himself admits that when the doctor stopped, he asked him something about the accident, and whether the man was conscious, and so on, so that when he had returned to the village he knew something of the nature of the injury, and the circumstances of the case. However, having put his wife off the cart, he did what I suppose anyone else would do,—he walked across to the spot where the man was lying. This walking across is described in the letter, (which is to my mind a somewhat highly coloured account of what happened, and written with the intention of creating prejudice against the doctor) as "strolling leisurely across to the scene of the accident." The evidence, however, is that he walked across in a businesslike, ordinary way. One does not expect that a doctor would run on such occasions so that he would arrive on the scene out of breath, and possibly in such a condition that he could not give a calm consideration to the matter. The plaintiff did what any doctor would have done under the circumstances; he walked over and examined the man. The gravamen of the charge against him in this letter is that he made a perfunctory, cursory, and wholly inadequate examination of the case that was before him. It is admitted by the witnesses of the defence, by Mr. Macready and by the defendant himself, that Dr. Girdwood was there for something like four or five minutes; they say not more than five minutes at all events. Well now, five minutes is a considerable time, longer than most people seem to think, and a great deal can be done in the way of diagnosis in an ordinary simple case in five minutes, and as far as the circumstances of this case go, I do not think and I do not see the slightest reason for supposing an ordinary skilful man could not have diagnosed the whole of the case in two minutes. All that was required was that the pulse of the man should be felt, and then passing the hand over the head would be almost enough to finish the diagnosis. Then there are the reflexes. That is not more than a matter of seconds in the hands of an experienced man. Anybody can do that in a couple of seconds. All the doctor would have to do when he saw a wound on the top of the head would be to pass his three fingers along, running one finger up the wound. It would require only a few seconds, not minutes; and I quite agree with Dr. Fuller, that such a case might possibly be diagnosed in half a minute. That certainly is somewhat quick, but we have the evidence that the doctor was with the man four or five minutes, enough time surely for a skilful man, who is admitted to be an able man at his profession and a quick worker, to make up his mind as to the diagnosis of the case. Had he found the man pulseless and lying livid there, he would have had to stay a longer time, but the man's heart was beating, the pulse was going normally though rather slowly; he himself swears he passed his hand along the wound, which would be a matter of only seconds, and sufficient to show an experienced man what the state of affairs was. He could see no blood issuing from the ears or eyes, and so he knew there was no fracture of the base of the skull. He pronounced it, as I suppose every other doctor would have done, to be a case of ordinary concussion, or a simple case of stunning. But this did not seem to satisfy the people who were round. He walked off to his surgery to prepare certain things, and he showed the young man where the stretcher was. One of them then seems to have asked him about the dressings for the wound, and in this letter it is said that he seemed to be surprised to hear that there was a wound at all. Of course, it is difficult for anyone in the circumstances to suppose that a medical man, who goes for the purpose of examining a case and finds a person lying on the ground, as Macready says, in a pool of blood issuing from his head, did not know there was a wound. It seems so absurd to suppose that a medical man, or even an ordinary common-sense man, being brought to look at an accident, would not have looked to see where the blood was issuing from. However, it was a ridiculous assumption on the part of the young men that there was a surprise on the part of the doctor to hear there was a wound at all. No doubt the doctor was surprised to hear these young men instruct him as to what his duties were. It appears that he was making a dressing. He also was going to make a sedative medicine to be given to the young man after he had recovered consciousness,

These two men, who seemed to have lost their heads, went across and told Macready that the doctor was not coming back. Instead of this announcement having the effect which it would have upon common-sense people, and leaving the impression that it could not be a serious case, they say it was like a bomb-shell bursting in their midst; and then Macready went to the doctor's house and found the doctor making up simple dressings in his dispensary. It appears that he was a bit short of carbolic oil himself at the time and so he asked whether there might be some at the hotel where Curnick lived. Having been told that there was not, he said, "Oh, very well, I will send some." Even this circumstance is taken against him as showing some sort of a grudging spirit, and that he did not then want to part with some of his carbolic oil for the purpose of this particular case. However, when Mr. Macready came across and, apparently taking an interest in the case, asked the doctor whether he was coming back, he said that he was not. Macready walked off, whether the specific instructions from the doctor as to what to do or not, does not matter much. He saw that Mr. Macready was taking an interest in this case, and as he had previously helped him, the plaintiff was justified in feeling certain that he was going to take care of the case. That was what was in the Doctor's mind, and it seems to be the sort of thing that anyone knowing a place like Kentani would have in his mind. What then ought the doctor to have done besides what he did? It is suggested that he should have gone back and done the surgical work himself. Any woman could have done it, certainly Mr. Macready could do it. Had it turned out that this man was more deeply hurt, had there been some broken bones, some of these comments might have been justifiably used in regard to the examination which was made; but the doctor was right in his diagnosis and the whole case went exactly as he expected it to go. Macready went and attended to the case as well as anyone could have attended to it. Some of them went there and jabbered and talked, and made a fuss and crowded in his room. They were turned out by Macready, and the case went in the ordinary way, and the man was put to bed and kept quiet as the doctor had said he was to be. Well now, is there any justification in such a set of circumstances as that for the publication of such a letter as this?

The letter was written on the very day of the accident by the defendant, who seems to have lost his head about this matter; and these young people thought very probably, that as the doctor had been a little short and abrupt about this matter and did not talk much—and I can quite understand his reason for not talking much to them—that this was a good opportunity for getting at him somehow or other. The defendant wrote this letter, I do not know whether he was proud of his composition, but he went and took it to some of his friends in the bar, amongst whom was McGill. I am not concerned much about McGill's position either one way or the other in that matter, and his conduct, which has been commented upon, does not effect the issue. The letter was in pencil, and it was afterwards copied in ink, and four days later it was sent for publication. That seems to me to give these people less excuse for the course adopted, because by that time it was quite obvious that the doctor was perfectly right in his diagnosis, that it was a mere case of stunning, that he had advised the right thing, and that nothing was going to happen of an evil nature to Curnick. Curnick was recovering, it was quite clear that he would be about his work again in a few days, and yet on the 24th, four days after the accident, when everything was going well, this letter was sent for publication. It seems to me to have been a malicious and wholly unnecessary thing to do. The doctor may not have been very popular with these young men, but that certainly was not the way in which to try and get even with him. It seems to me that the letter is highly coloured, that the facts are misrepresented, and that the conclusions led to be drawn are those which are attributed to the letter in the third paragraph of the declaration, where the innuendoes are set forth. It seems to me that the things set forth are true, it might fairly be said of plaintiff that he was a negligent man, that he grossly misconducted himself in his profession, and that he exercised his duties negligently, improperly, and even with cruelty.

It is the intention of this letter to convey that meaning, it does convey that meaning, wholly unjustifiable in my opinion, and it was sent for publication to the paper for the purpose of conveying that meaning to anybody who happened to read the Gazette, and it ends by saying that a poor heathen kafir would not treat his dog as the plaintiff treated this accident, and that it would be a good idea to get another medical practitioner when their District Surgeon is on pleasure bent. The whole tone of the letter leads people to infer that plaintiff neglected a dangerous case for the purpose of having a musical entertainment at a friend's house. But that was a wrong impression, the facts were wrong, the conclusions were wrong, and the publication was, to my mind, actually malicious.

For that reason damages must follow. If defendant were a man of larger means, I should certainly make damages more heavy than I am going to do, and moreover it was stated at the outset of this case that the doctor came more for the purpose of vindicating his character (I do not see how he could have helped doing that, after the publication of such a letter) than for the purpose of getting heavy damages. Yet I cannot give purely nominal damages in a case like this, because, although it is impossible to prove damages, it is not impossible to conjecture how such a letter might cause serious damage, while the damages I am about to award are much smaller than in my opinion the plaintiff is really entitled to, that is due partly to the position of the defendant, and I hope defendant has learnt a lesson, both in law and in temperance—at the same time I do not want to make them so small that people might think that I take a light view of the circumstances of this case. I think there should be damages for £50, for which sum there will be judgment for the plaintiff with costs.

Order granted as prayed.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

Ex parte LIS.

{ June 9th.

Undesirable—Alien.

Under the Common Law, no alien can claim, as a matter of right, to enter this Colony, even if he has formerly been domiciled therein.

Dr. Greer moved for an order calling upon the immigration authorities to grant permission to Jack Lis to land in Cape Town from a German steamer now lying at the Docks.

Mr. Howel Jones opposed on behalf of the Attorney-General's Department.

Dr. Greer read an affidavit by Chris Brady (attorney to the applicant), who called attention to an order given by the Court on the 15th December last, restraining the authorities from deporting the applicant. (15. C.T.R. 1011) The Court held that, under section 3 (sub-section D) of the Immigration Act, he was exempted, on the ground of having served in H.M. Volunteer Forces during the late war. The applicant had been seen by deponent, and he said that he desired to land in Cape Town for the purpose of transacting important business. He was at present detained on a German steamer, which had arrived at the Docks this morning, and which was about to leave in the afternoon. The immigration authorities refused him permission to land.

Mr. Jones said that he had no affidavits to produce, because there had been insufficient time in which to have affidavits prepared. The applicant, however, seemed to be under the false impression that he was being kept out of this colony under the Immigration Act. As a matter of fact, there was an order from the Colonial Secretary to the immigration authorities to prevent him from landing, on the ground that he was an alien and a most undesirable character. Under the circumstances, counsel submitted, applicant had no locus standi in this court. He admitted that he was an alien of Russian nationality. Counsel relied on the case of Raner v. Colonial Secretary (14. C.T.R. 247) and the applications of Mina Belmont (16. C.T.R. 231) and certain Montenegrins, recently heard in this court.

Dr. Greer submitted that the present case was not on all fours with the cases mentioned by his learned friend, inasmuch as this man had been proved to have served in His Majesty's Volunteer Forces, and it had been held that there was no right to deport him.

[Hopley, J.: Is not this man a notorious pimp? I think I have heard the name before.]

Dr. Greer said that he had no knowledge as to that. He might mention that there was another man of a somewhat similar name.

Mr. Jones produced affidavits sworn for the previous application, and said that his lordship's designation of the applicant was correct.

Hopley, J.: There is very scanty information before the Court as to the present application, but both parties have referred to the previous record and the previous order, in which this man was the applicant, and from these affidavits, which are practically admitted for the purpose of this case, it appears that he is a Russian alien and not a naturalised British subject at all. It would also appear that he served as a Volunteer or mercenary during the late war, and in consequence, when in the late application it was attempted to deport him under the Prohibited Immigration Act, it was held by the Court that he was exempt from deportation by virtue of such mercenary service. Since then, however, the position has changed. He has chosen to deport himself, to take himself from the boundaries of this colony, and has been in German South-west Africa, and is at present on a German ship, and now wishes to land here again. Now the question arises: can he claim, by virtue of exemption from deportation when he was in this colony, a right to come and land here whenever he chooses? Under the common law, it has been held that aliens have no right to land in this country. Does it make any difference if they have been here and have gone away again? In my opinion, it does not make any difference. He still is an alien, he is out of the Colony, and he wishes to land again, and the Colonial Secretary refuses him permission, on the ground that he is an undesirable alien. I see no reason whatever for making the order asked for in this case. There will be no order.

Dr. Greer then asked his lordship if he would be prepared to grant an order authorising the applicant, on providing satisfactory security, to land and stay in the Colony a certain time, so as to enable him to transact necessary business. Counsel said that he relied upon the decision of the Court in the case of Mina Belmont.

[Hopley, J.: I suppose if he consults the Colonial Secretary or the authorities, and gives security, they will allow him to land. I know nothing as to the matter here, and I shall make no order. If he can arrange it with the authorities, then let him do so, but he has no right to such an order as is now asked for.]

SUPREME COURT

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

BURTON V. SCHAEFER	{ 1906.
	{ June 11th.
	" 12th.
	" 18th.

This was an action brought by Conyers Burton, lithographic artist and printer, Cape Town, against Paul Schaefer, trading as Paul Schaefer and Co., also of Cape Town, to recover a sum of £150 upon a contract to print and supply a consignment of postcards.

Plaintiff's declaration was as follows:

1. The plaintiff is a lithographic artist and printer, carrying on business at Cape Town. The defendant is a dealer in postcards, carrying on business in Cape Town under the style or firm of Paul Schaefer and Co.

2. On or about the 22nd July, 1905, the plaintiff agreed to supply to the defendant and the defendant agreed to take from the plaintiff 120,000 postcards, in size 5½ in. by 3½ inches, printed in colours and lithographed. The defendant agreed to supply to the plaintiff 6,300 cards in size 19 in. by 23 in. for drawing and printing 20 subjects, and the plaintiff agreed to supply 6,000 copies of each of the said twenty subjects, making a total of, in all, of the 120,000 postcards aforesaid. The said subjects were to be approved of by the defendant. The defendant agreed to pay to the plaintiff for the said postcards the sum of £150, in three instalments of £50 each, the first instalment to be paid on delivery of the said postcards, the second and third instalments payable by bills of exchange due respectively on December 1, 1905, and January 1, 1906.

3. The plaintiff proceeded with the execution of the said contract, and thereafter, in the months of November and December, delivered large quantities of the said postcards to the defendant in terms of the said contract.

4. In or about the month of November, 1905, disputes arose between the said plaintiff and defendant with regard to the said contract, and in order to bring the said disputes to an end, it was agreed between the said plaintiff and defendant, on or about December 13, 1905, that the said plaintiff should forthwith complete delivery to the defendant of two-thirds of the said postcards, and that the defendant should pay the sum of £50 to the plaintiff on the completion of the delivery of two-thirds of the said 120,000 postcards, and should further pay to the plaintiff two further sums of £50, thirty and sixty days respectively, after the complete delivery of the total number of postcards. Save as aforesaid, the said contract set out in paragraph 2 hereof remained in existence.

5. The plaintiff completed delivery of the said 120,000 postcards on or about the 15th day of December, 1905, and the said three instalments have become due and payable in terms of paragraph 4 hereof, but the defendant, though requested so to do, neglects and refuses to pay the said three instalments, or any part thereof, as promised by him.

Wherefore the plaintiff claims: (a) Judgment for the sum of £150, being the said three instalments of £50 each; (b) alternative relief; (c) costs of suit.

Defendant in his plea said that the contract was set out in a letter from plaintiff to defendant dated 13th July, 1905, and that plaintiff failed to deliver the cards within the specified time, or before or subsequent to the expiration of that time, to deliver cards properly and satisfactorily executed according to the terms of the agreement. By reason of the aforesaid failure plaintiff committed a breach of contract which entitled defendant to refuse to accept and pay for the cards actually delivered by plaintiff, and defendant did so refuse to accept and pay for the said cards. Defendant subsequently entered into a compromise with plaintiff, by which the latter agreed to assist him in sorting out the good and the satisfactory cards, defendant undertaking to pay for good cards on plaintiff supplying good cards in lieu of the rejected ones. This compromise, however, fell through because defendant failed to fulfil his part thereof. Defendant tendered to return all the cards in his possession and to pay £15 to plaintiff for certain cards which, in anticipation of a compromise, he had forwarded to his Johannesburg branch. Defendant claimed in reconvention the sum of £100 as and for damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of plaintiff's failure to supply him with good and satisfactory cards in terms of the agreement.

Plaintiff, in his replication, said that even if there was delay in delivery of the cards attributable to his default or neglect defendant was estopped from taking advantage of that fact by reason of the agreement of December 15. The tender, he said, was wholly insufficient. For a plea to the claim in reconvention, he denied that he had committed any breach of contract, or that defendant had suffered any damage for which he (plaintiff) was liable.

Mr. Sutton for plaintiff; Mr. Van Zyl for defendant.

Hopley, J., suggested that the case was one that might very well be sent to a referee.

Mr. Van Zyl said that that course had already been discussed, but the parties had been unable to agree upon a referee.

Mr. Sutton said that the plaintiff relied upon the compromise arrived at between the parties in December. Disputes had occurred between the parties, and there was a novation of the original contract, the compromise of December being come to in order to put an end to all disputes.

The plaintiff gave evidence.

Harold Jones, a partner in the firm of Findlay and Tait, attorneys, gave evidence as to the compromise arrived at between the parties on the 15th December last, and upon which plaintiff relies. Plaintiff, he said, after the interview, called and informed him that he had been to defendant's place, but the latter had refused to allow him to sort out the unmerchable cards. The defendant's attorneys subsequently took up the position that plaintiff had neglected to carry out the conditions of the compromise, that they renounced the compromise, and intended to revert to the original agreement.

Cross-examined: Witness was not aware that Burton had stopped Schaefer in the street and told him that it was not his (Burton's) business to sort out the cards. The agreement was that the cards should be made merchantable. Schaefer did not object to accepting cleaned cards. The arrangement was that unmerchable cards should be rejected and replaced by good merchantable cards, bringing the total up to 120,000. He thought the meeting at which the compromise was arranged took place on Friday, December 15, not on the 14th December.

Arthur Walter Townshend, of the firm of Townshend, Taylor and Spenshall, printers, said that, as regarded the cards, it would be impossible for anyone to have told the difference between a cleaned postcard and a card that was regarded as merchantable.

Cross-examined: Witness did not think they had any reason to be ashamed of the way in which this work had been done by his firm. As to the alleged spoilt cards (produced), such cards would be found on sale at any stationers in Cape Town, whether produced in England or Germany. The picture of an arum lily (Bella Donna) was produced in the colour furnished by the artist. They, as printers, were not botanists. If they had had the job in hand properly, they would not have printed the cards on such paper as was supplied by Schaefer. The cards supplied he should describe as "good" and "better"—not "bad" and "worse." They had been prepared to make good any unmerchable cards, but he did not say they were prepared to do so now, because things had changed, and their lithographic department was not so busy then as it was now.

Mr. Van Zyl: How would you clean the cards?

Witness: I don't propose to disclose any of the secrets of the lithographic art. Further cross-examined, witness said that his firm could have sold thousands of these cards in their retail shop for the Christmas mail. His firm were interested in this case, because they printed the cards on behalf of Burton. As to the card (produced) showing the Victoria Falls, witness said it was usual to slightly exaggerate the colours in picture postcards, otherwise the cards would not sell.

Re-examined: Burton was charging Schaefer 25s. per 1,000 for the cards he supplied. Witness thought that the card produced was too good at the price.

George FitzHenry, a lithographer, employed by Townshend, Taylor and Snashall, said that the real difficulty with regard to the contract was the kind of card supplied by Schaefer. Trouble was caused by the creasing of the cardboard, due to the fact that the material was new and unmatured.

Mr. Sutton closed his case.

Paul Schaefer (the defendant) afterwards gave evidence. He spoke of a visit which he had paid at the request of the plaintiff to Townshend, Taylor and Snashall's works after the blue process had been reached in the printing. At that time, he said, no complaint was made to him about the cardboard creasing. Burton told him that the second lot of cardboard that he had supplied was better than the first, but he said that he really wanted a white card. Witness then ordered, on the 10th October, a white cardboard from Germany, but this order he subsequently cancelled. Witness found that the first lot of cards supplied by Burton were dirty and faulty in colour. Mr. Burton said that he would give a better delivery of the second lot. The question of the defective cards was left over until further cards arrived. Witness sent 10,000 cards to his Johannesburg branch. About one-third had been disposed of at the usual rates of 6s. or 8s. per 100. The other two-thirds were still on his hands in Johannesburg. His representative made complaints in respect of those cards. Witness went on to deal with further negotiations prior to the 15th December.

Hopley, J., informed Mr. Van Zyl that he did not want to prevent him from putting his case in the way which seemed to him to be best. At the same time, he thought there had been a novation, and that the matter, so far as the present case was concerned, really commenced on the 15th December.

Witness, in further evidence, said that they had a meeting on the 14th December. He fixed the date by the fact that it was the day before he received the rest of the cards from Mr. Burton. Witness declined to accept cleaned cards. Except as to that point, Mr. Jones's account of what took place at the meeting was correct. Plaintiff did not, as had been arranged, come to witness's office. He saw Mr. Burton in the street on the following Monday. Mr. Burton then said that it was not his affair to come and help to sort the cards, and he would not come. He also said it was his (witness's) business to sort the cards, and to send back the rejected ones.

By the Court: The cards had not even yet been sorted.

Witness (in further examination) said that when Burton would not come and sort the cards, he thought he (Burton) was making a fool of him. He wanted the cards for the Christmas trade. He had tried to dispose of the cards locally, but he had been unable to do so. He had sent travellers out with the best of the cards. Witness produced samples of the cards produced under the contract and of cards printed in Germany.

Mr. Van Zyl called his lordship's attention to the uniform quality of the cards produced abroad.

Witness (in reply to the Court) said that he made a suggestion to Burton that an album of picture postcards should be sent to the Governor as showing the class of work that could be produced in South Africa. He was judging at that time by the sketches which had been prepared, and he anticipated good results from the printing, which, however, were not realised. Continuing his evidence, witness said that when the cards were ordered there was a good demand for picture postcards of the Victoria Falls and Cape flowers. The market was now quite stale.

Mr. Sutton produced a picture postcard, which he said had been bought during the luncheon hour at a shop in Cape Town for 2d.

Witness, asked his opinion of it, said that he would not buy such a card.

Cross-examined: Witness denied that he had refused to have anything to do with the sorting because he wanted to go up the coast. He could assign no reason for Mr. Burton having refused to go through the cards.

Charles Friedlander, attorney, of the firm of C. and A. Friedlander (defendant's attorneys), also gave evidence. He told how he urged upon the parties to come to a settlement instead of spending a lot of money in going into court.

Mrs. Helen Schaefer (wife of the defendant) substantially corroborated the evidence given by her husband.

In cross-examination, the witness said the cards that were delivered were at present in the shop. Some were lying loose in a wooden box.

[Hopley, J.: But how are they kept together?—They are just as they were [Hopley, J.: And the different designs kept together?—Yes.

A German named Schlicht, at present touring South Africa, and representing a Dresden firm of photographic post-card printers, stated the lithography of the cards depicting arum lilies was bad, and the colours had not been watched. The colours were irregularly printed. There was no uniformity amongst the cards themselves. There was also a considerable number of soiled cards which could not be cleaned.

Hopley, J., inquired if the paper was new would it be liable to stretch.

The witness replied that that would make very little difference if the address side of the post-card was printed first. The sea journey would have rested the cardboard.

[Hopley, J.: Perhaps it had not recovered from the sea journey. There are some things which are affected by the sea journey, and take some time to get over it—delicate wines, for instance.]

In cross-examination, the witness said he had never printed a card himself, but he had superintended the work of printers for eight years.

In reply to His Lordship, the witness said that if work like that produced was done by machinery under his supervision, he would have the machinery stopped.

In further cross-examination, the witness said the fact of a post-card being true to life depended on the artist's work, which the lithographer followed. The machine in question was good, but the light in the room was bad. The firm witness worked for turned out very good work.

Mr. Sutton: And I suppose you expect the work to be turned out in Cape Town as well as it is done in Germany?

[Hopley, J.: And why not, Mr. Sutton? Don't let us be down on our own country. If a man says he can contract to do work as well as it is done in Europe, he should be compelled to do it. It is not necessary for him to say, "Oh, it is not so good, because it was done in Cape Town."]

Mr. Thorpe, the manager of Messrs. Watson, Ltd., wholesale stationers, stated he had, on behalf of his firm, purchased cards from defendant on several occasions. He was offered the cards in question, but refused them because he did not think them good enough.

In cross-examination, witness said the cards were generally purchased by his firm at £3 per 1,000.

Mr. Sutton: Would you take these cards at 25s. per 1,000?—I would not put them in my stock, but as a job line I might purchase them at that price.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

Hopley, J., said that in this case the plaintiff sued for a sum of £150 upon a certain contract entered into between him and the defendant last year, in which he agreed to supply the defendant with 120,000 post-cards of a certain size, and, of course, of a satisfactory description. Plaintiff was to supply him with the cardboard on which these cards were to be printed, and they were to be ready by a certain time. There was some delay in getting out the cards, and the time was extended, and it was agreed that they were to be completed about the middle of November. The plaintiff, who seemed to know something about the art of lithography, set about getting from the printers who contracted to do the work the stones and the various colours necessary. Apparently the process involved 8 or 9 different coatings of paint. It was apparent from the evidence that he used an old stone. About November 17 a number of these cards were delivered, and the defendant seemed to complain at once of these cards. He complained that they were badly cut, and that the colouring was defective, and in his evidence he had pointed out how the colour was defective. He showed that the colouring had not been accurately done, which possibly was owing to want of experience, and he also drew attention to the fact that the colouring was not constant. In the course of the work it was shown that the boards had not been taken accurately over the stone, so that the colours did not lie exactly on each other, as they ought to do, and the result was an uncertainty of colour. The plaintiff admitted that the first lot of cards sent in were unsatisfactory. However, the defendant did not look on them as so hopelessly out as to prevent the contract being carried to a conclusion, and he was promised by the plaintiff that the others would be replaced, and he and his wife took out 10,000 of them, which they sent to Johannesburg to catch the Christmas trade, and in respect of this there was a tender of £15. The next lot came later on, and the plaintiff refused to take them as a whole. He had previously given to plaintiff a post-dated cheque, payment of which he stopped. The whole case rested on the reading of the letter written on December 14. To His Lordship it seemed that the reading of that letter meant to convey that he was to reject such cards in the last lot that defendant did not care about, and to return the others. It seemed that the plaintiff had not fulfilled the contract he entered into, and that the defendant's version of the story was the most credible. On the claim in convention the plaintiff would succeed in the sum of £15, but as that amount had been tendered and refused, he would have to pay the costs. On the claim in reconvention the defendant was entitled to £30 and costs. Judgment would be entered accordingly.

COOKE V. COOKE.

Mr. Swift moved, as a matter of urgency, for the appointment of a commission de bene esse to take the evidence of plaintiff in London (England), in an action which Mrs. Cooke has brought for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce.

Application granted. Mr. Cecil Joun Dwyer, barrister, London, to act as commissioner, costs to be costs in the cause.

REX V. ANDRIES. { 1906.

Fraud—Registered voter.

To falsely pretend to be a registered voter, in order to obtain intoxicating liquor does not constitute the crime of fraud.

Rex v. Jacobs and another (13, C.T.R., 144), followed.

Hopley, J.: A case has come before me for review from the Resident Magistrate's Court at Beaufort West in which Marthinus Andries was convicted of the crime of fraud and sentenced to two months' hard labour. The fraud alleged was that he pretended that he was a registered voter and by that means succeeded in buying a couple of bottles of brandy. The conviction must be quashed on the authority of Rex v. Jacobs and Brits (20 Supreme Court Reports, 82) where, in exactly similar circumstances, this Court ruled that such an act was not fraud within the meaning of the common law of this colony. The conviction must be quashed.

Ex parte NESER AND OTHERS.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for an order upon Roelof Andries Jansen, as sole trustee in the insolvent estate of Annie Susan Priest, requiring him to call a special meeting of the creditors and to hold in suspense a certain commission granted by the Court to examine the insolvent and owners in regard to certain transactions until the creditors should have decided whether the commission should be proceeded with. The trustee had declined to call the meeting until he had obtained counsel's opinion.

Hopley, J., said that he did not see any particular objection to giving an order on the trustee. The trustee was now practically a consenting party, and the Magistrate might safely postpone matters until after such meeting had been held. As far as the trustee's own action was concerned, it did not seem to him that the trustee had done anything improper. He supposed the application for costs against the trustee would not be pressed.

Mr. Bisset: We do not press that part of the claim. Perhaps it would be best that the costs should stand over until application is made for rescission of the commission.

Hopley, J.: Perhaps that would be a wiser course. The order will be that the trustee call a special meeting of the creditors as requested, and that the Commissioner be instructed to postpone the inquiry for six weeks pending further steps within that period by creditors or trustee, costs to stand over.

Ex parte WARD.

Dr. Greer moved, on the petition of John Ward, of Wynberg, for an order for the attachment of certain funds in the hands of the South African Turf Club. Petitioner said that he was interested in racing matters, and that in all matters connected with racing he was in partnership with his brother, David Ward. From August to November, 1905, petitioner stabled and fed and had trained at his directions certain two race horses named respectively Kingthorpe and Lent Lily. Petitioner had since discovered that the owner, J. P. Cupido, presently of Kimberley, and one Shaw, a jockey and trainer, had, about the 3rd December, removed the horses from his stables either personally or through their orders. There was a total amount due for keep and disbursements from the said Cupido of £64 10s. 11d., but Cupido, although he had repeatedly promised and undertaken to pay, had failed to do so. Petitioner was informed that there was a sum of £300 due to the said Cupido as stakes for the South African Turf Club. He was informed that the horses had been pledged to Shaw for a debt of £250. Cupido had no landed property. Petitioner prayed for an order restraining the South African Turf Club from paying over the whole or any portion of the sum of £300 to Cupido or any person on his behalf, pending an action to be instituted forthwith to recover the sum of £64 10s. 11d.

Rule nisi granted attaching the sum of £150, rule to be served personally on Cupido and on the secretary of the S.A. Turf Club, and to be returnable on the 21st June.

ZEEMAN V. CENTRAL NEWS AGENCY, LTD., AND ARGUS
PRINTING AND PUBLISH-ING COMPANY, LTD. { 1906,
June 13th.
" 14th.

Malicious prosecution—Reasonable and probable cause.

In an action for malicious prosecution, the onus is on the plaintiff to prove that the defendant acted without reasonable and probable cause. The fact that the plaintiff was acquitted of the alleged crime affords no presumption that the defendant acted maliciously in laying a criminal charge against him.

This was an action brought by Charles William Zeeman, publisher's clerk, Cape Town, against the Central News Agency, Ltd., and the Cape Argus Printing and Publishing Company, Ltd., to recover as against the first defendants £20 wages, and as against both defendants £2,000 damages for alleged malicious prosecution.

Plaintiff's declaration was in the following terms:

1. Plaintiff resides in Cape Town. Defendants are companies duly incorporated and registered with limited liability, carrying on business in Cape Town and elsewhere.

2. In or about the month of June, 1903, plaintiff was engaged by first defendant as a monthly servant, and continued in first defendant's service at Cape Town at a salary of £16 per month, payable weekly, until the 24th day of August, 1905, when first defendant wrongfully and unlawfully dismissed plaintiff from his employment.

3. By reason of the said wrongful dismissal, plaintiff is entitled to damages in lieu of a month's notice, to wit, £16, and in addition to his salary for the week ended August, 1905, to wit, £4.

4. Thereafter defendants wrongfully, unlawfully, maliciously, and without reasonable or probable cause, preferred a charge of theft against plaintiff, of which plaintiff was duly and lawfully acquitted on or about the 17th day of November, 1905, at the Criminal Sessions of this honourable Court.

5. By reason of the said malicious prosecution plaintiff has suffered damage in the sum of £2,000.

6. All things have happened, all conditions have been performed, and all times have elapsed and passed necessary to entitle plaintiff to claim the said sums of £4 and £16 from the first defendant, and £2,000 from both defendants, but defendants wrongfully and unlawfully refuse and neglect to pay the said sums to plaintiff, though requested so to do.

Wherefore plaintiff claims, as against the first defendant: (a) Judgment for the sums of £4 and £16, with interest a tempore morae, and as against both defendants, (b) for the sum of £2,000, with interest a tempore morae; (c) alternative relief; (d) costs of suit.

Defendants' pleas were: For a plea to the declaration the first defendant says:

1. Paragraph 1 is admitted.

2. The first defendant admits that it employed the plaintiff as a publisher's clerk at a weekly salary of £4, the said employment being terminable at one week's notice, and the plaintiff entered upon the said employment and undertook to perform the duties thereof with care, diligence, and in a proper and efficient manner.

3. Among the duties of the said employment were the supplying of the current issue of a certain newspaper known as the "Cape Argus" to newsvendors, and the receiving for and on behalf of the first defendant of moneys paid in respect thereof by the said newsvendors at the time of such supplying, the receipt of unsold copies of such issues when returned by the said newsvendors, and the delivery, with reasonable diligence, of such copies to the second defendant.

4. The plaintiff carried out his said duties in a grossly negligent, improper, and inefficient manner, to the detriment and loss of the first defendant, who in consequence, lawfully dismissed him from the said employment, without notice, on the 24th day of August, 1905.

5. On the said date the salary as aforesaid, amounted to the sum of £3 10s. 4d. sterling, and no more, which said sum the first defendant, before issue of summons, tendered, and again hereby tenders, to pay to the plaintiff. That, as above, it denies the allegations in paragraphs 2 and 3, and so much of paragraph 6 as is relevant to the said sums of £4 and £16 claimed by plaintiff.

And for a plea to the declaration, the defendants say:

1. Paragraph 1 is admitted.

2. The defendants admit that the plaintiff was, on or about the 17th day of November, 1905, acquitted, upon an indictment charging him with the crime of theft, presented by the Attorney-General, but save as above they deny each and every allegation in paragraphs 4, 5, and so much of paragraph 6 as is relevant to the said claim for £2,000 damages, as specifically as if herein set out specially denying that the plaintiff has sustained any damage for which they are liable.

Wherefore the first defendant prays, subject to the above tender, that the plaintiff's claim as against it may be dismissed, with costs. And both defendants pray that the plaintiff's claim as against them may be dismissed, with costs.

Plaintiff's replication was:

1. Plaintiff admits paragraph 3 of first defendant's plea, and says that he always performed the duties of the said employment satisfactorily.

2. Defendant admits the tender referred to in paragraph 5 thereof, but says that it is wholly inadequate to meet plaintiff's claim.

3. Save as above, and save in so far as defendant's pleas admit any of the allegations in plaintiff's declaration, plaintiff says that he denies all and singular the allegations of fact, and conclusions of law in the said pleas contained, joins issue thereon, and again prays for judgment in terms of his declaration.

Dr. Greer for plaintiff; Mr. Upington (with him Mr. Howes) for defendants.

Dr. Greer objected to the presence of Mr. C. E. Solomon on the jury on the ground that, as an employee of the "Cape Times," Ltd., he was directly or indirectly interested in the case.

Mr. Solomon (in answer to the Court) said that the "Cape Times," Ltd., were shareholders of the Central News Agency, Ltd.

Hopley, J., thought Mr. Solomon should not sit on the jury. Another juror who was picked, Jacob Stoke, was also excepted to by Dr. Greer, and he admitted that he had an interest in the Central News, and was informed that he should not sit on the jury.

Dr. Greer having opened the case,

Evidence was led on behalf of the plaintiff.

John H. C. Breda, clerk in charge of the criminal records in the Resident Magistrate's Office, Cape Town, produced the records of the preparatory and other examinations in the case of Rex v. Zeeman.

The record in the trial at the Criminal Sessions was also put in.

Henry Henning, sub-inspector of the C.I.D., produced the original affidavit sworn by Mr. Portas Moses (manager of the Argus Company), on the 5th September last.

Mr. Upington asked witness if he had any other affidavits.

Witness said that he had.

Mr. Upington: Then put them in.

Witness put in affidavits by Mr. Macfarlane and Mr. Woodley, and also a statement by James Anderson.

Charles Wm. Zeeman (the plaintiff) said that he entered the service of the Central News Agency in June, 1903. He was engaged by Mr. Lindbergh, the general manager, at £10 per month, payable at the rate of £2'10s. per week. He was made inspector of the news-vendors in the street. About September of the same year Mr. Mansfield, the publisher, absconded, and witness was appointed to his position at a salary of £16 a month, payable at £4 a week.

[Hopley, J.: That does not work out to £16 a month. Four pounds a week works out to £208 a year.]

Witness said that he was engaged at £16 a month, and was paid £4 a week. Witness explained that his duties necessitated that he should have an office at the "Argus" Buildings to receive the copies of the "Argus" as they were printed, and distribute them. He described the method of checking the number of copies issued to him by means of cards. Witness said that the lot he had to deal with was the wholesale cash sales, to be sold in the streets, which he sold at the rate of 9d. per dozen. When he sold to the vendors he took back their returns; for instance, if a man wanted eight dozen papers and he produced four dozen unsold copies, witness received the returns, and charged for four dozen. At the end of each day witness made up a bundle of returns so received, plus his excess on the supply, and he returned these at nine o'clock next morning, and was given a receipt by an employee of the "Argus." The returns were checked by this employee, and he was given a receipt in a pass-book.

[Hopley, J.: Supposing that you returned only 200 and got a receipt for 2,000, who would make the profit?]

Witness: The Central News, my lord. Witness, in further evidence, said that he received the cash from the sales. This arrangement went on until July, 1905. In that month Share, who had charge of the Central News Agency's sales in the streets, went to America on a holiday. It was reported in the "Argus" that Share had gone to America to be married. Share gave witness the key of the safe, and another key, which witness had since found was the key of the cupboard. Things went smoothly, as far as he knew, until the 24th August, when he handed in the return as usual to the "Argus" representative, who counted the returns and initialled witness's book. The number of returns for that day was 301. The "Argus" representative then took the returns and threw them into the cellar. The bundle was not marked in any way. About five minutes to one Mr. Moses, the manager of the Argus Co., and Mr. Woodley, manager of the Central News Agency, came in, and Mr. Moses said: "I can only speak to you through Mr. Woodley." Wood-ley asked him how many papers he returned that morning. Witness said 301. Woodley then said: "Do you know you can't return papers more than a month old?" Witness said then he did not. Woodley then said that he had returned papers that day for June 3 or June 6. Witness denied that he had returned old papers. Woodley asked him whose the cupboards behind, about seven in number, were. Witness replied: "Share's." After further questions, witness produced the key that Share had left with him. He opened the door, and found that the cupboards were full of old papers. Woodley then said: "Oh, here are the papers that Zeeman has stolen." Mr. Moses then produced a list showing the number of returns witness claimed to have returned, and the number that he was alleged to have actually returned. On one date that list showed that he had had 582 initialled as returns, and against that it was alleged he had returned no papers at all that day. Witness was afterwards told to go home. Woodley said: "You have robbed the Argus Co. of at least £1,000; this has been going on for the last twelve months. You should be doing six months the same as Wilson, who will probably get six months, and who is in Roeland-street now." Wilson was awaiting his trial, and he was afterwards acquitted. Mr. Moses said: "You are a parasite amongst your fellow-workmen." Witness thought he meant an infectious germ.

Witness described his subsequent arrest on a charge of appropriating £24 10s. 9d., and the proceedings in the Magistrate's Court and the Criminal Sessions. He spent one night in the cells until he was released on bail. Witness denied absolutely that he had made the admissions ascribed to him in the affidavit of Mr. Moses.

By His Lordship: Share had not made any profit on the papers that he had stored in the cupboards. Witness thought that Share, Anderson, and another (Blevins) had conspired and collected the 7,000 copies in the cupboards, so as to get witness into a difficulty.

[Hopley, J.: Is your idea that Store was playing the game that they accuse you of playing?]

Witness: That is what I suppose. In further evidence, witness said that he had made out an account showing the losses he had sustained, and on which he based his damages. Witness was a cab proprietor, and he estimated his loss at £343. He had had to sell his cab, horses, and wagon in order to raise funds for his defence. His business, horses, cabs, etc., cost him £560, and he sold the lot for £217 10s. He estimated his loss of profits on his cabs at £108, and he had a loss on wagon hire. He estimated his damages by loss of employment at £168. The cost of his defence at the Criminal Sessions was £37. His detention in Wale-street, loss of health, and inconvenience represented the balance of £1,280.

Cross-examined: If on the 24th August he returned papers for the 6th June, he should not be making money out of it. Those were papers he should have received from the boys.

By the Court: It was not likely that the boys would have on their hands a large number of old papers dating back to the 6th June.

Cross-examination continued: Mr. Moses and Mr. Woodley, on the day they came in and spoke to him, were the worse for liquor. Until the cupboards were opened, he knew nothing whatever of the existence there of 7,000 old copies. Witness said that the papers he handed in were dropped by the checker into the cellar.

Mr. Uppington: The checker had special instructions to retain the papers and take them to the front office to be checked. If he says he did not throw them down the cellar, he is committing deliberate perjury?

Witness: Yes.

Plaintiff's wife having given evidence,

Dr. Greer closed his case, subject to the right to call rebutting evidence.

Mr. Uppington then called

Portas Moses, manager of the Argus Printing and Publishing Company, who said that plaintiff, acting on behalf of the Central News, received copies of the "Argus" from the machine for distribution. About June, 1905, witness complained to the Central News about the way in which plaintiff was carrying out his duties. His suspicions were aroused by differences in the circulation as disclosed in the books. The returns from the Central News to the Argus Company were exceptionally high. The Argus Company had a checker to receive the returns from Zeeman. God-year was at first the checker. Macfarlane was appointed checker in June, 1905, and he was given special instructions as to what he was to do. Witness received a report on the 24th August, through Mr. Blevins, the works manager. In consequence thereof, he gave the checker certain instructions, and later the checker came into his office with one Heydenrych, who was carrying a parcel that purported to be returns from the previous day. Witness opened the parcel and examined every copy, and he found 300 papers of the 6th June, and also, on the top, a paper of the 23rd August. Witness afterwards communicated with Mr. Woodley, and later on they both waited upon Zeeman at his office. Mr. Woodley said to Zeeman: "How long has this been going on, Zeeman?" Zeeman said: "I am sorry; I was led away by Share. It has been going on since he left."

Witness was absolutely certain that those were the words that Zeeman used.

[Hopley, J.: Is there anything in the suggestion that you had been having something to drink?]

Witness: The idea is preposterous. It is an absolute falsehood. In further evidence, witness said that they found a shortage of 41 copies in the returns of the "Weekly Argus" of the previous day. When questioned as to the cupboard, Zeeman took a key out of his pocket and handed it to Woodley. Woodley started to open the presses, and said: "This is where the papers are." The presses were packed with copies of the "Argus," the total quantity in the presses being about 7,000. Witness had no animosity against Zeeman, and he had no malicious intent.

Cross-examined: He would not deny that he had said, in the course of the criminal trial, that the whole of the 301 papers in the bundle were dated the 6th June.

Dr. Greer: You see that is an important difference from the statement you now make.

Cross-examination continued: Witness had his suspicions aroused, because he thought the machines were perhaps not putting out a sufficient supply. The automatic register told the output from the machines. If Mr. Blevins, the works manager, said that the automatic register never worked correctly, he was mistaken. If the clock went wrong, it would be immediately put right. Blevins told him on one occasion that there had been discrepancies in Zeeman's returns, but that the checker had given the thing away to Zeeman.

Dr. Greer: Mr. Moses, you seem to have had a nice lot in that office of yours?

Witness: We had.

Further cross-examined: Witness said that the returns on the 24th August were brought in to his office between 10 and 11 a.m. He supposed they would be handed by Zeeman to the checker after nine o'clock. It never struck witness at that time to consider what Zeeman had done with the actual returns of that day. Sometimes there were no returns at all in the course of the seventeen days on which a check was taken. On some days Zeeman might have no returns. Witness was of course, always glad when the paper was sold out. The checker was instructed to initial Zeeman's book, whether he produced any actual returns or not. That was part of the plan of checking.

Dr. Greer: But was the instruction to the checker that he should initial 483, when not a vestige of a copy was received?

Witness: I did not know this had been done.

Further cross-examined: A report was made by the caretaker that Anderson was removing old papers. It did not strike witness then that they had got hold of the wrong man, and it had not so struck him yet. The bundle of papers in question was not produced at the criminal trial. The papers were left in the front office, and during the night of the 24th they were spirited away, he thought, in the interests of Zeeman. Anderson was in charge of the office that night. Witness was not absolutely sure that Anderson was in the employ of the Argus Co. on the 24th August. Whoever the caretaker was, he must have taken them as surplus papers. He did not know whether Anderson was the caretaker in the office that night.

Ernest James Woodley, manager of the Cape Town branch of the Central News Agency, said that plaintiff was a weekly servant of the company, and was paid £4 per week. His rate of wages was not £16 a month. Witness went on to speak of the incidents of the 24th August. On going to the "Argus" office, he said, he was shown by Mr. Moses a bundle of unsold copies of the "Argus." He did not look at all the papers. Those he saw were dated June 6th. He saw the returns of the weekly, and found a shortage of 51 copies between the actual returns handed in and the number claimed by Zeeman. Mr. Moses's account of the interview with Zeeman at noon was correct. Witness denied having said that Zeeman should have six months' imprisonment. Originally he did not intend to proceed against Zeeman, but, acting on instructions from the head office in Johannesburg, he made an affidavit against Zeeman on the 5th September.

Cross-examined: Wilson was at that time awaiting trial on a charge preferred by the Central News. He was undefended, and he was acquitted. In that case also witness was unwilling to prosecute. Witness's principle was that it was better to discharge the man and have finished with him, than to prosecute him. Witness believed at that time that Zeeman was guilty. His theory as to what was done with the actual returns by Zeeman was that they had been put in the presses with the other old papers. He had formed his theory this morning after listening to the evidence. He thought it was not at all improbable that a man, even if he had received three dozen returns from the previous day, would send in very old papers to be credited as returns.

By the Court: The cupboards were filled with bundles of old papers ready to be sent in as returns.

Further cross-examined: Subsequently to Zeeman's dismissal, instructions were given that no returns were to be accepted from the third edition of the "Argus." The third edition was the biggest of the day. Returns were not taken from the "stop-press edition." Before Zeeman's dismissal, they did not accept returns of the third and stop-press editions.

Colin W. Macfarlane, a clerk in the Argus Company's employ, said that in June, 1905, he received special instructions to receive the returns from Zeeman. He was not a checker in the ordinary course, but was specially detailed for this duty. On certain occasions he signed Zeeman's book without satisfying himself that there was a parcel. He subsequently checked the parcels unknown to plaintiff, and compiled a list of the returns received and those Zeeman alleged that he had put in. Blevins also checked the parcels. Heydenrych (the caretaker) used to take the parcels into the cellar, and witness followed him and checked the numbers. On the 24th August witness did not throw the bundle of returns into the cellar. He had received special instructions on that morning. Both Mr. Moses and witness checked the returns that day. The whole of the returns were dated June 6. The parcel was delivered to Mr. Moses exactly as witness had got it from plaintiff. There was a shortage of 41 copies in the returns of the weekly edition handed in by Zeeman.

Witness was cross-examined at some length. He said that on July 29 he got special instructions to check Zeeman's returns, and from that date the returns began to go wrong.

Jan Heydenrych, until recently a caretaker and timekeeper in the Argus Co.'s employ, said that on June 29 he received special instructions from Mr. Moses (the manager) as to the returns handed in by Zeeman. Zeeman used to throw the bundle that he brought down into the cellar. He did this every day. Witness and the checker used to go down and count the papers afterwards.

Cross-examined: Witness was given a week's notice to leave the Argus Company's service, and he had been out of work about four months. He had a disagreement with the works manager, Mr. Hamilton. The evidence given by Mr. Macfarlane as to the papers being handed to him by Zeeman each morning was incorrect. The bundles were generally thrown down into the cellar by Zeeman. After counting Bennoni's returns he gave the figures to Blevins. There was one morning when no returns were received. If the list showed seven mornings when no returns were received it might be correct. He could not remember exactly, but there were several times when he went to Mr. Blevins and told him there were no returns.

Dr. Greer called his lordship's attention to the manifest contradictions in the witness's evidence.

[Hopley, J.: The jury will be able to weigh his evidence.]

Cross-examination continued: Witness denied having, in January last, in the presence of Detective Ward, said that Anderson should be standing in Zeeman's shoes.

Alfred Eugene Blevins, master printer, Roeland-street, formerly works manager in the employ of Argus Co., said that he left the "Argus" because of a difference of opinion as to the policy that he had with Mr. Moses towards the end of July, in consequence of what he thought was insufficient checking of the returns witness instituted a system of checking. Witness instructed the clerk who received the returns from Zeeman to count the papers, and he also told Heydenrych to count them. After receiving the figures from the clerk, witness used to go into the cellar and check the returns and enter the number in his notebook. There was always a big difference between the figures claimed by Zeeman and the number of returns actually received.

Cross-examined: Witness did not know what had become of the bundle of August 24. He had finished his count on the previous Monday, and on Tuesday he gave his report to his nominal chief (Mr. Moses). Witness instituted the system of checking on July 29 of his own motion, and without instructions from Mr. Moses. He had been unable to account for the discrepancy between the number registered by the machine clock and the returns. He had found the clock absolutely reliable. He had not previously said that he found the clock inaccurate. Witness looked at the contents of the bundles of returns received from Zeeman, and he did not remember a day when there were not old papers in the bundle. By old papers he meant out of date—three or four days or three or four weeks old.

Dr. Greer: The record of the criminal trial says you stated that: "If any witness said the bundles contained old papers it is not correct." How do you explain the discrepancy in the evidence you then gave, and that you give now?

Witness said that the evidence must have been bearing upon another point.

By the Court: The deficiencies in the returns claimed by Zeeman would equal in some instances considerably more than £1 a day. There was no conspiracy to get Zeeman into trouble. Witness had had no animosity against Zeeman, and he had always admired the smart way in which he did his work.

Mr. Uppington closed his case.

Dr. Greer dwelt at considerable length upon the discrepancies in the evidence led by the defendants. He submitted that all the facts of the case put Mr. Moses and Mr. Woodley upon inquiry, and that they had no right to accept the statement of the checker on August 24 as to the history of that particular bundle. There were wholesale discrepancies in the evidence on a great many points between the witnesses called for the defence. Mr. Moses and Mr. Woodley were put upon inquiry by the whole of the circumstances of the case, and an account of the character of the men they had to deal with, but disregarding all these things that might have put them on inquiry they accepted statements that were recklessly made to them, and they recklessly swore affidavits. By their recklessness they had inflicted irreparable injury on an innocent man, and a man who had been found by a jury of his fellow-citizens to be innocent. He submitted that the case was one in which the plaintiff should be awarded substantial damages.

Mr. Upington said that it would be a very nice thing if every time an accused man was acquitted he was allowed to bring an action against his employer for damages. The law, however, protected a man who honestly, without any malice and upon sufficient information to justify him in coming to the conclusion that a man was probably guilty of a criminal offence laid the information before the proper authorities. As to the bundle of 301 papers received by the checker employed by the Argus. Counsel submitted that the jury must either accept his evidence or come to the conclusion that he was a deliberate perjurer? If he were a perjurer, what could be his motives? He could, counsel urged, have no motive for speaking anything but the truth. He (Mr. Upington) accepted the challenge of his learned friend that a man who was going to accuse another must have an honest belief that the person whom he charged was probably guilty, and he submitted that in this case Mr. Moses and Mr. Woodley had come to the honest conviction that Zeeman was probably guilty, before they commenced proceedings. Woodley himself did not want to prosecute, and it was only when the head office of the Central News said that a criminal prosecution was necessary that he swore his affidavit. After the plaintiff made his demand upon the Central News they repudiated liability, but tendered £20 to the plaintiff, as they said, to save further expense and annoyance. It would have been well for Zeeman if he had accepted that £20. It was by no means a remote probability that every penny of any law suit by plaintiff would have had to be paid by the Central News; that they knew; thence their desire, if possible, to keep the matter out of court. As to the claim for wages, counsel submitted that it was clear from plaintiff's evidence that he was under a weekly engagement. Without saying whether plaintiff was or was not guilty of theft, he submitted that the circumstances which came to the notice of Mr. Moses and Mr. Woodley on the 24th August were so suspicious that they were justified in prosecuting, and, indeed, it was a duty cast upon them to prosecute.

Dr. Greer said that, as to the first part of the claim, his learned friend had gone outside the defendant's plea. The plea alleged that the plaintiff carried out his duties in a negligent, improper, and inefficient manner, but his learned friend had set up a case of malpractices. That he was not entitled to do. Counsel submitted that the letter in which the Central News tendered £20 was an admission of some liability.

Hopley, J., in summing up, pointed out that the case seemed to hinge on the question of whether plaintiff was or was not justifiably dismissed. The jury had to try a question of law and of fact. The plaintiff might have suffered hardship, but the jury had nothing to do with hardship, with equity, and so on. The question they had to consider was, had he suffered this hardship in consequence of his own acts or without any reasonable and probable cause animating his prosecutors? In an action for damages of this kind, the burden of proving all the essentials of the case rested upon the plaintiff. He must not only prove his acquittal, but he must also prove absolutely and conclusively that he was maliciously prosecuted, and prosecuted without reasonable and probable cause. The fact that plaintiff was acquitted at the Criminal Sessions raised no presumption, in law, of the absence of reasonable and probable cause for the prosecution. As long as a man was acting under a genuine bona fide belief that the person he was accusing was probably guilty of crime, he was protected by the law. The whole question was whether the defendants' managers had reasonable and probable cause for the steps they took in regard to prosecuting the plaintiff.

The jury found that the defendants were justified in their action, and that the plaintiff was only entitled to £2 10s. 4d.

Dr. Greer moved for judgment for plaintiff for £2 10s. 4d., defendants to have costs from date of tender.

His Lordship entered judgment for plaintiff for £2 10s. 4d., plaintiff to pay costs.

SUPREME COURT

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

In re INSOLVENT ESTATE { 1906.
BASSON. { June 15th.

Removal of trustee — Insolvent Ordinance, Sec. 52.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved, as a matter of urgency, on the petition of Alfred Hinton, of Cape Town, as joint trustee in the insolvent estate of Matthys

Michael Basson, for an order authorising the acceptance of Gysbert Willem Kotze's resignation as co-trustee and confirming the appointment of petitioner as sole trustee. Petitioner said that when Mr. Kotze was appointed he was secretary of the Malmesbury Board of Executors, but he was no longer in their employ, and he had stated that he was leaving Malmesbury. Differences had arisen between petitioner and his co-trustee in regard to liquidating and realising the assets of the estate, and the present application was in the interests of the creditors.

Counsel, having been heard in argument on the facts,

Hopley, J.: This matter comes before the Court in an unusual and, as far as I know, unprecedented way. It is an application under the 106th section of the Insolvent Ordinance for the joint trustee to be allowed to resign his office. The joint trustee, Mr. Kotze, does not make this application, and Mr. Jones (for the applicant) is bound to put his application under the 52nd section, which deals with the removal of trustees, and, according to the 52nd section, he may be removed for personal insolvency, or for misconduct in the said trust, or on account of his absence from the Colony. Now, it is not alleged that he is insolvent, and it is not alleged that he is absent from this colony, and it is not alleged directly, but it is stated that we may infer from the correspondence that has been put in, that he has been guilty of misconduct as trustee. I do not think that follows from the wording of the correspondence. The utmost I can see is that there is an accusation that, while he was curator bonis he dealt improperly with the assets of the estate. That would be before the time of his trust began, as he could not then have been elected a joint trustee. However, I have no doubt if misconduct as curator bonis were only found out after the appointment of trustee had been made, and if it could be shown that he was in a position of trust, the same sort of position which caused him to be appointed trustee, and that during the time he was curator bonis he committed acts of misconduct—if that could be shown, in all probability the Court would hold that these were acts of misconduct in the course of his trusteeship. The case, however, is a fairly strong one, on the ground that the joint trustee whose appointment it is now wished to set aside is practically a consenting party to his supersession. He has been written to and asked to resign unconditionally, and after some shuffling, you may call it—at all events, some fencing—he has adopted that position and sent in an unconditional resignation. I do not say there is absolutely enough on the affidavits to accuse him of misconduct, but there is enough to make me feel that it would be in the interests of the estate, especially in view of the impending third meeting, to grant a rule nisi, and the order of the Court is that there will be a rule nisi calling upon the said Kotze to show cause why he shall not be removed from office as joint trustee, and why applicant shall not be declared to be sole trustee, rule to be made returnable on Thursday, June 28, and applicant in the meantime to act as sole trustee.

ARMSTRONG V JEPPE.

This was an action brought by George Armstrong and Co., agents and auctioneers, Cradock, against Heinrich Otto Ludwig Jeppe, of Draghoender, division of Prieska, to recover a sum of £101 19s. 8d., moneys advanced and disbursed for and on account of defendant.

From the pleadings it appeared that plaintiffs claimed a sum of £101 19s. 8d., and interest and costs, the amount, it was alleged, representing money advanced and disbursed for and on account of the defendant, at his special instance and request. Defendant, in his plea, admitted that £56 17s. 10d. was due, and specially denied that he had instructed or authorised plaintiff to make advances on the 23rd and 25th October, 1905, of two sums of £20 each to one Kennedy, in respect of certain carts, and he denied liability therefor. Defendant did not admit that he agreed to pay interest to plaintiffs for moneys advanced and disbursed, but he said he was ready and willing to pay £4 15s. 10d. as interest, less 16s. interest claimed on the said sum of £40. Defendant said that on or about 26th January, 1906, he tendered to plaintiffs £60 2s. 2d., being the sum of £100 2s. 2d., less £40, in accordance with the account rendered to him. He now tendered £61 3s. 8d., together with taxed costs to date of tender, in full satisfaction of plaintiff's claim. Plaintiffs, in their replication, admitted the non-acceptance of the tenders.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones for plaintiff; Mr. Sutton for defendant.

Mr. Jones said that the sole question to be determined was whether defendant should have tendered £40 16s. more than he had tendered.

Edward Bernard Biddulph, a partner in the plaintiff firm, said that a Mr. Green was a third partner in the firm, and they carried on business as general agents and auctioneers at Cradock. They became acquainted with defendant about June, 1905, when the latter called to see if any arrangements could be made as to the purchase of live-stock. Vehicles were also mentioned in the course of the conversation. Witness introduced defendant to J. and E. Kennedy, wagon and cart makers. Before leaving Cradock, defendant called at the plaintiffs' office, and said that Messrs. Ken-neddy would require some reference as to any orders for carts to be built. Witness, in the presence of Jeppe, saw Kennedy, and said that any orders executed by defendant would be paid for by the plaintiffs on behalf of the defendant. Kennedy said that in executing the orders, he would require advances from time to time on account of the materials. When the carts were finished, Kennedy would call and inform the plaintiffs, and made arrangements about the forwarding of the carts. They also had certain transactions with defendant in reference to stock, but these were not disputed. On the 23rd October the plaintiffs advanced £20 to Kennedy, and on the 25th a similar advance was made on account of carts ordered by Jeppe from Kennedy Bros. In September witness went to Prieska, at the opening of the railway, and he saw defendant. Defendant then told him he had sent Kennedy an advance of £50 on account of a cart, wagon, and buggy. Witness expressed surprise, as he knew Kennedy was in want of money. Defendant said he had wired £50 through the Standard Bank, but had not informed Kennedy. The money would be lying in the bank all the time. When witness returned to Cradock, he informed Kennedy, and the amount of £50 was handed over to Kennedy. Witness's firm advanced the balance of the purchase price, viz., £65. A letter of demand was at a later date sent by F. W. Green to the defendant, in respect of an advance of £20 to Kennedy. The letter was not returned through the Dead Letter Office, and it was not answered. This was the second advance of £20 made by the firm. Witness did not think it was necessary to send that letter, because the general authority given to his firm by defendant was sufficient to cover such advances.

Mr. Sutton said his client denied having received the letter.

Hopley, J., said that the position taken up by the defendant on the correspondence was that the two carts were never ordered, and he repudiated all liability.

John Kennedy, of Kennedy Bros., wagonmakers, Cradock, said Jeppe told him he was to get money from plaintiffs for all orders executed on behalf of defendant. Witness was still holding the carts in dispute.

Cross-examined: It was arranged that with regard to advances on carts in course of building he was to write to Jeppe. He was to receive the balance on finished carts from Armstrongs.

Mr. Jones closed his case.

The defendant stated that he was a farmer and post-cart contractor. His farm was sixty miles distant from Prieska. He had considerable transactions with Armstrongs in June last, purchasing about £1,400 worth of stock. The transactions were profitable to both parties. The only authority he gave to Armstrongs in regard to Kennedy Bros. was to pay a balance of £35 on the cost of a cart on which witness had already paid £10. Witness had already deposited the sum of £35 with Armstrongs. Armstrongs paid the balance on other carts without any authority from witness. He did not write to Armstrongs about their action, because there were no more dealings. He had told Kennedy that if he wanted an advance he must write to him (witness). Witness in August sent an advance of £50 to Kennedy. On the 23rd August witness ordered two more carts, and informed Kennedy that he must apply to him if he wanted an advance. He had to pay 5 per cent. interest on advances as made by plaintiff.

[Hopley, J.: Then the only reason for this suit is that you would have to pay 5 per cent. on £40 for two months?]

Witness: It will be £110, two carts at £55 each.

[Hopley, J.: But they are only charging you for the advances.]

Witness (continuing his evidence) said that the two carts he had first got were defective.

[Hopley, J.: Then you are fighting this case and repudiating these advances to get out of the contract?]

Witness: I wanted some security for my money. I wanted to see if the carts were all right.

[Hopley, J.: But you cannot make advances after the carts have been built and delivered?]

Witness (in further evidence) said that he was still willing to take the carts, but he objected to the advances made by plaintiffs. He had been kept in the dark a good deal, although he had asked for information.

[Hopley, J.: All you are fighting about is the interest on £40 at 5 per cent. ?]

Witness: No, my lord; I will take the carts when they are delivered, but they must be satisfactory.

By the Court: The opening of the railway had not made any difference to him in regard to the price of carts. They must have carts made from wood grown in a dry climate, hence Paarl carts were not of much use to them.

Mr. Sutton closed his case.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts.

Hopley, J., said that this was a very paltry matter, and it was a great pity that the time of the Court had been taken up by such a case. He preferred to believe the evidence of Mr. Biddulph, because he thought Mr. Biddulph's memory was to be trusted rather than that of Mr. Jeppe. But he did not impute to Mr. Jeppe anything like intentional perversion of the facts, because he thought it was quite possible that Mr. Jeppe might have forgotten the arrangement entered into. He held that there was authority in plaintiffs to make the advances, and he held that there was nothing in the documents which showed any revocation of that authority. Judgment would be given for the plaintiff for the amount tendered, with costs, and for £40, with interest to date of summons, with costs, Mr. Biddulph to have his expenses as a necessary witness.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte EXECUTORS ESTATE { 1906.
VAN RENSBURG. { June 15th.

Mr. Roux moved for an order authorising the Registrar of Deeds to register transfer of certain landed property in an estate in the district of Riversdale. The first named petitioner had bought the property.

Order granted as prayed.

GREENBERG V. ROSENBERG.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved on behalf of petitioner, who carries on business in Cape Town, for leave to sue respondent by edictal citation for damages in the sum of £3,000, for breach of agreement, and for the attachment of certain goods now lying in Cape Town. Respondent's address was given as London, N.W.

His Lordship said it seemed to him that the proper person to be sued was the assignee in the respondent's estate, and there was also a question of domicile.

Mr. Jones said he believed Rosenberg was making considerable efforts to prevent the goods from being attached.

His Lordship said that the whole matter seemed to him to be rather questionable. The assignee should be given notice of the presence of the goods, and if it were found that he raised no objection against their attachment, then the application might be renewed. No order would be made at the present stage.

Ex parte SCHOLTZ.

Mr. Roux moved, on the petition of P. E. Scholtz, for the appointment of a curator ad litem to represent his brother-in-law, Albertus Jacobus du Plessis (an inmate of the Valkenberg Asylum) in a lunacy application.

Mr. Advocate De Waal was appointed curator ad litem, summons to be returnable on the 12th July.

Ex parte BILLSON.

Mr. Roux moved for an order authorising the amendment of petitioner's name in certain ante-nuptial contract.

Order granted as prayed.

DAVIDS V. DAVIDS AND ANOTHER.

Mr. Roux moved for an order for the removal of respondents from office as executors in the estate of the late Marthinus Davids, Kokstad, and for directions as to the appointment of an executor dative. One of the respondents had been out of the country for four years, and the other had done nothing to administer the estate, and apparently desired to be relieved of his office. It was proposed to take steps to have an executor or executors appointed in due form of law. The applicant, Mrs. Davids (widow of the deceased) recently obtained an order against respondents for delivery of half-share of certain erf.

His Lordship said that, in matters of this kind, when the respondent was not represented, it was usual to grant a rule, but in view of the special circumstances of the case, he thought nobody would be prejudiced if he at once made a final order. An order would, therefore, be granted removing the respondents from office as executors, and directing the Master to take the necessary steps to appoint an executor dative, costs to come out of the estate.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), the Hon Sir JOHN RUCHANAN, and the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

STUTTERHEIM SCHOOL { 1906.
BOARD V. TURPIN. { June 16th.

School Board—Election—Act 35 of 1905—Divisional ratepayer.

Under the 10th section of Act 35 of 1905, a lessee of land, who is also the occupier of the land and has paid the Divisional Council rates, is entitled to vote in the election of members of the School Board.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice Maasdorp, sitting as a Divisional Court of the Supreme Court, in an application brought by the present respondent, who was an unsuccessful ful candidate at the recent election of members of the Stutterheim School Board, to have the said election declared null and void and set aside.

The Judge's reasons were as follows:

I held that Appleby, Brown, Warren and Cochrane, who were lessees of land in the Division of Stutterheim were Divisional Council ratepayers, under Section 10 of Act 35 of 1905, and entitled to vote at an election of members of the School Board. The polling officers in pursuance of instructions received from some Government officer, rejected their votes on the ground that only owners of property were qualified to vote, in terms of the section. If the four votes above-mentioned had been received the applicant would have been entitled to be declared duly elected. Upon this ground I declare the election invalid.

Mr. Howel Jones (with him Mr. Nightingale) was for appellant; Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. P. S. T. Jones), was for the respondent.

Mr. Howel Jones said that this was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Maasdorp in an application by one Turpin calling upon the Stutterheim School Board to show cause why the election of members of the School Board for the school district on December 5 last shall not be declared invalid and informal, and as such set aside. His lordship granted an order as prayed. The present respondent (the then applicant) was a candidate for the election of this School Board, and he set out that certain four gentlemen who filed affidavits would have voted for him, and that they were refused permission to vote on the ground that they were not ratepayers, inasmuch as they were occupiers and lessees of property, and not holders of property. The point involved in this matter was a very important one, as concerning the definition of a Divisional Council ratepayer within the meaning of the Divisional Council Act. The learned judge gave his decision in the absence, through a misunderstanding, of counsel for the respondent. There was some difficulty in reopening the matter when a decision had once been given, and it was finally decided to go to appeal. The 10th section of the School Boards Act (No. 35, 1905) said: "In every School Board district two-thirds of the members shall be elected by the municipal ratepayers or by the Divisional Council ratepayers of the school district, according as the district is or is not a municipal area, and the remaining third shall be appointed by the Governor." The Stutterheim School Board was a School Board within a Divisional Council area. "Municipal ratepayer" was defined in the Act (section 3), but there was no definition of a Divisional Council ratepayer, and, of course, one must take the ordinary construction of the term "ratepayer," and the definition which was actually given in the Divisional Council Act was a person liable to pay rates (Act No. 40, 1889, section 4). Then one had to go to that Act to find out who were the persons liable to pay rates. He submitted that the persons who were liable to pay rates were the persons referred to in section 243, viz.: "All persons owning immovable property in any division, including any municipality within such division, shall be liable to be rated for the purposes of this Act." If the Act had stopped there, the only persons liable to be rated would be the owners of property. The question then arose: did the 269th section, upon which the respondent relied, carry the case any further? Did it make an occupier or any other person than the owner liable to pay rates? The section was: "Every Council may, in suing for the recovery of rates, proceed against the owner or lessee or occupier, either separately or both of them in one and the same action, each for the whole rate, in any competent court, and recover the same by the judgment and process of such Court."

[De Villiers, C.J.: If a man may be sued for the recovery of rates, surely he is liable to pay rates?]

Mr. Jones: No, he is not liable. He is only liable, my contention is, as the statutory agent for the owner; he is a compulsory agent, and he is not the person liable to pay the rates.

[De Villiers, C.J.: He may recover from the landlord?]

Not only recover, my lord, but he may retain it. Counsel went on to point out that the Act said: "Provided that any occupier of property on which a rate has been assessed, who is not the owner thereof, and who has not entered into such occupation, pursuant to any agreement for becoming the owner thereof, shall, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary, be enabled to retain or recover from such owner the amount of any rates which he may have so paid, etc." So that, although the occupier paid the rates, he did not do so out of his own pocket. Counsel proceeded to urge that it was merely a duty cast upon the occupier by the 269th section to see that the rate was paid, and that, if he had to pay the rate out of his own pocket, he could recover it. One had to interpret what the Legislature intended in passing not only the Divisional Council Act, but also the Act of 1905.

[Buchanan, J.: Surely, in passing the Act of 1905 for the election of School Boards, the Legislature contemplated that the person on the spot who sent his children to the school was more likely to be interested than an absentee landlord?]

Mr. Jones said that they had to keep in view for the present the financial side, and, besides, the Court would see that the effect of making an occupier a voter as well as the owner a voter would mean a double vote. That could not have been the intention of the Legislature.

[Buchanan, J.: You would give a vote to a person who held under an agreement which entitled him to become the owner?]

Yes, but he would be liable as the owner.

[Buchanan, J.: He would be liable as lessee under an agreement which entitled him to become the owner.]

Then, clearly, under the Divisional Council Act, he is liable to pay rates.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Still, the owner of the land would be entitled to vote, and you would have the same difficulty there of the double vote that you have spoken about.]

Well, I suppose there would not be many cases of that kind. Counsel went on to emphasise the fact that the School Boards Act did not say "voters," but "ratepayers," arguing from that fact that the object of the Act evidently was that an occupier should not have a vote.

Hopley, J., put to counsel the case of Beaconsfield, where, he said, there was only one landlord, viz., De Beers, and the people were tenants under leases which were renewable at stated periods. Were they to infer that in such a case only De Beers should have a vote, and that all the others should not vote?

Mr. Jones said that he did not know sufficient of the conditions at Beaconsfield to enable him to deal with such a case.

[De Villiers, C.J.: In regard to Beaconsfield, I do not know whether they are perpetual leases. But the recent decision of the Court in the case of Indwe was that where a lease is perpetual the lessee is liable for the payment of municipal rates, and for the landlord's rate, not the tenant's rate. At Indwe they wished to have all the benefits of municipal government without paying the rates.]

Hopley, J., took the case of the Standard Bank, and said that surely it could not be argued that the manager who occupied the bank premises should not have a vote, and that the Bank Corporation in London was to vote.

Mr. Jones said that they had to keep in mind what was the intention of the Legislature.

[Buchanan, J.: I should say that the intention of the Legislature was to see that the children of the district were educated.]

[De Villiers, C.J.: I find these people paid their rates.]

Well, my lord, two of them paid their rates, but the two others had their rates paid. They did not pay their rates themselves.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But is it likely they would have paid the rates if they did not consider themselves liable to pay the rates?]

I must submit that while they may pay the rates, they don't pay it themselves, but they pay it out of the rent which is due to the landlord and pay it out of the landlord's money.

[De Villiers, C.J.: That is as between them and the landlord; but as between them and the Divisional Council they are liable.]

Mr. Jones went on to argue that both a principal and agent could not have a vote. He added that it seemed to him if the Legislature had intended that owners and occupiers should have votes they would have said so.

At the request of the Chief Justice, Mr. Jones handed up to the Bench a copy of the instructions issued by the Government for the guidance of returning officers in the recent School Board elections.

Sir H. Juta said that the Court had already decided in De Klerck v. Marais (8, Juta, 202) that where a Divisional Council rate was levied, not only was the occupier liable to pay the rates, but the rate became due from him. It seemed to him that that case disposed of the whole of his learned friend's argument. In De Klerck v. Marais it was sought to strike off the votes of certain occupiers who had not paid their rates. It was argued that these were not persons from whom the rates were due under Section 18 of the Divisional Council Act, and that, therefore, they could not be struck off. The Court, however, held that the rates were due.

[De Villiers, C.J.: There is one point that has not been raised, but, still, it is a very serious question whether the learned Judge ought to have declared the whole election void. The witnesses say that they would have given their votes to the applicant.]

They tendered their votes.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Very well; but they might have voted for the other candidates also; they don't say that they would have voted for him alone. Of course, I don't know whether the Court should now raise a question which the appellant did not raise.]

Sir H. Juta pointed out that the real respondent in the first instance did not now appear. It was merely that the Government wished to have a judicial interpretation as to the meaning of the word "ratepayer." The respondents in the motion had acquiesced in the decision given by the Court below.

Mr. Jones, in reply, submitted that the case cited by his learned friend did not bear on the point in the present case. A strict interpretation should be given by the Court as to the meaning of the word "ratepayer" under the School Board Act.

De Villiers, C.J.: The question to be decided on this appeal is whether a lessee of property who is also an occupier, and has paid his Divisional Council rates, is entitled to vote in an election of members of a School Board in a divisional area. That is the main question raised. The School Board Act of 1905 provides in the 10th section that "in every School Board district two-thirds of the members shall be elected by the municipal ratepayers or by the Divisional Council ratepayers of the school district, according as the district is or is not a municipal area, and the remaining third shall be appointed by the Governor." The question which arises is whether the persons who had tendered their votes at the election were qualified as voters or not. The words "Divisional Council ratepayers" are not defined in the School Board Act of 1905. Reference has been made to the Divisional Council Act (No. 40, 1889), where we find a definition of the word "ratepayer" in the case of Divisional Council elections. The fourth section gives the following definition: "Ratepayer shall mean a person liable to the payment of rates in any division." The Government in issuing their circular seem to have confined their attention to the 243rd section of the Act, and to have relied upon that section as giving the owner alone the right to vote, and not the occupier or lessee." The section is as follows: "All persons owning immovable property in any division, including any municipality within such division, shall be liable to be rated for the purposes of this Act." The 244th section refers to Crown lands. I quite agree with Mr. Howel Jones that if the Act had stopped there, there would have been strong reason for holding that it is only the owner that is to be held liable for the payment of rates. But, then, when we come to the 269th section of the Act we find the following: "Every Council may, in suing for the recovery of rates proceed against the owner or lessee or occupier either separately or both of them in one and the same action, each for the whole rate in any competent court and recover the same by the judgment and process of such Court." Then there are three provisos. The first is: "That any occupier of property on which a rate has been assessed, who is not the owner thereof, and who has not entered into such occupation in pursuance of any agreement for becoming the owner thereof, shall, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary, be enabled to retain or recover from such owner the amount of any rate which he may have so paid, but not any costs or expenses which he may have incurred or been condemned to pay in the course of any suit or action brought against him by the Council for non-payment of any such rate." Mr. Jones, on behalf of the appellant, contended that this proviso shows that the intention was to make the occupier the mere agent for the payment of the rates, as he may recover the rates again from the owner. But he cannot be regarded as merely the agent, because he is held liable to pay it out of his own pocket. As between the occupier and the Divisional Council, clearly the occupier is the ratepayer. As between the occupier and the owner, no doubt, the occupier may recover again from the owner, but that does not take away the liability of the occupier to the Divisional Council. He is liable to pay rates in terms of the definition clauses, and this view is strengthened by the provisos (b) and (c). Proviso (b) is: "That any occupier of any immovable property shall be liable for any rate which had become due and payable thereon at any time before he entered upon the occupation thereof," showing that, in the contemplation of the Legislature, the occupier does become liable to pay rates after he has entered into occupation thereof. Then comes proviso (c): "That any person who may have become liable for any rate as aforesaid shall continue to be liable for such rate, although he may have ceased to own to hold on lease, or to occupy the property in respect of which the rate has been imposed," clearly showing that the liability to pay the rate was in the case of the occupier in respect of his occupation. Well, then, if there is any doubt left upon the matter, that doubt is removed by the decision of the Court in the case of J. Klerck v. Marais (8, Juta, 202). No doubt the question for decision in that case was somewhat different from what is now raised but in order to decide that question it was important to ascertain whether any occupier, as such, was liable for the payment of rates. This question was decided in the affirmative. Clearly the learned Judge in the Court below was correct in holding that the persons who tendered their votes were persons who were entitled to vote, and ought not to have been rejected. Then there is another important question, upon which, however, there has been no appeal, and that is whether the learned Judge was right in declaring the whole election null and void. It is an important matter, and may prove an important question in the election of members of Parliament, and I very much doubt if a similar case had arisen, say, in an election for members of the circle, any circle returning three members, I doubt whether any Court would have set aside the whole of the election. In a recount, possibly the result would have been that the last man would have fallen out, but I express no opinion on the point, but I do think that the Court, in confirming this judgment, should do so without expressing any opinion on that point which has not been raised on appeal. The Court will dismiss the appeal, with costs.

Buchanan and Hopley, J.J., concurred.

Mr. Jones (in answer to the Court) said that he appeared for the Civil Commissioner.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Well, then, the costs will be paid by him in his capacity of Civil Commissioner.]

BEHR V. MURRAY. } 1906.
June 16th.

Pound regulations—King William's Town Borough Act 27 of 1905.

At the time of the passing of the Act 27 of 1905, the Municipality of King William's Town was under the operation of the Municipal Act of 1882, and had a legally constituted pound subject to the provisions of the Pounds' Act of 1892. By the 1st section of Act 27 of 1905, the proclamation bringing the Borough under the Municipal Act was repealed, except as to acts and things done or commenced, and under the 122nd section the existing rules and regulations shall remain as legal as if inserted in the Act, until altered by the Council. Among the powers conferred on the Council was that of establishing pounds, appointing pound masters and making pound regulations. Before such new pound regulations had been made, the plaintiff's cow trespassed on the land of the defendant, who seized her for the purpose of impounding her.

Held, that the seizure was legal.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Judge-President of the Eastern Districts Court (Mr. Justice Kotze), sitting at the Circuit Court at King William's Town, in appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of King William's Town.

The matter arose out of a trespass by Mr. Murray's cow upon Mr. Behr's garden on the 30th June last.

Mr. Behr said that the cow ate his cabbages and carrots, and he refused to release it until plaintiff had paid 2s. 6d. as damages.

Mr. Murray paid the money under protest, but said the cow had been illegally detained as no pound regulations were in force at the time of the alleged trespass, and he afterwards claimed £1 from Mr. Behr in the Resident Magistrate's Court as damages for unlawful and wrongful seizure of his cow. The Magistrate gave judgment for defendant with costs.

Mr. Murray then carried the matter on appeal to the Circuit Court, when Mr. Justice Kotze found that the impounding was illegal, as there did not exist at that time any rule or regulation in the borough of King applying to the impounding of cattle. His lordship reversed the Magistrate's decision, and gave judgment for plaintiff for 2s. 6d., and for defendant for 2s. 6d., and ordered each party to pay his own costs in both courts. From this judgment Mr. Behr now appealed.

The Magistrate's reasons for his judgment were as follows:

In this case Mr. H. W. Murray sues Mr. W. Behr for £1 damages. Both are resident within the borough of King William's Town, and the action arises out of the seizure, on or about the 30th June last, of Mr. Murray's cow by Mr. Behr, for the purpose of impounding her for trespass within the borough of King William's Town.

Mr. Murray alleges wrongful seizure and detention, and further that to release the cow he paid under protest 2s. 6d. demanded. Damages to the extent of £1 are demanded for the alleged wrongful action.

Mr. Smith, on behalf of Mr. Behr, pleaded the general issue, and claimed in reconvention 2s. 6d. done to Mr. Behr's property by the cow in question.

Mr. Murray, in the course of the case, admitted the cow had done 2s. 6d. worth of damage, but denied liability.

The Magistrate's reason was as follows:

The first question for decision is what law governed pounds and trespass in the borough of King William's Town on the 30th June last. Up to the 29th January, 1903, the borough was under the Kaffrarian Ordinance No. 9 of 1864, and its pounds governed by regulations under that Ordinance, approved by the Governor by Proclamation No. 49 of 1873. Those regulations were in force on the 29th January, 1903, when the borough was, by Proclamation No. 29 of 1903, brought under the Municipal Act of 1882, and the Borough Ordinance repealed. Upon the Municipal Act of 1882 operating, the Pounds and Trespasses Act of 1892 came into force, under Section 81 of the latter Act, superseding pound regulations, framed under Proclamation No. 49 of 1873, and, I think, beyond a doubt, repealing them.

The Municipal Act of 1882 only remained in force until the 6th June, 1905, when the New Borough Act No. 27 of 1905 was promulgated.

Sections 122 to 128 of the new Act deal with rules and regulations, and Section 122 provides that the existing rules and regulations of the borough of King William's Town, in so far as the same are not contrary to law and not repugnant to the true intent and meaning of this Act, shall remain as legal valid and effectual as if inserted in the Act, until altered by the Council in due form of law.

I was at first rather puzzled as to what was the position of affairs as regards pounds under the new Act, and after consulting a number of authorities, found the explanation in the Statute Law.

The old pound regulations had gone, and would not be revived by the removal of the borough from the Municipal Act of 1882. So, unless the provisions of the Pounds and Trespasses Act of 1892 could be regarded as regulations, the borough, under the new Act, would be without them until new ones were published.

The "Pounds and Trespasses Act of 1892" is a consolidation with some amendment of the Statute Law previously existing. The preamble of Ordinance No. 16 of 1847, then repealed, shows that "whereas the existing pound regulations of this Colony are in many instances defective," etc., etc.

"And whereas it is expedient to provide for the better regulation of all public pounds, not being within or belonging to any Municipality," etc., etc.

Considering those provisions with Section 164 of the "Municipal Act of 1882," and Sections 81 to 84 of the "Pounds and Trespasses Act of 1882," it seems to me all difficulty is removed, and the "Pounds and Trespasses Act of 1892" contains the pound regulations of this Borough until altered by the Council in form of law. See also Section 2 (2), Act 27 of 1905.

That being the case, Mr. Murray had no grounds for action, the seizure of the cow being legal and the detention justifiable until the 2s. 6d. (admittedly the fair amount of damage) had been paid.

Judgment must be for the defendant with costs and the contra claim falls away.

The judgment of Kotze, J on appeal to the Circuit Court was as follows.

In this case which is an appeal from the decision of the Resident Magistrate of King William's Town, a somewhat interesting point arises as to statutory interpretation. It appears that in June last a cow, belonging to appellant, trespassed in the garden of the respondent and did damage to the extent of two shillings and sixpence. The respondent detained the cow and would not deliver her up to the appellant until the 2s. 6d., the amount of the damage had been paid. The appellant being of opinion that the Borough of King William's Town was without any pound regulations and that the detention of his cow was illegal, at first refused to pay the 2s. 6d., but eventually did so under protest in order to release his cow. The appellant then sued the respondent in the Magistrate's Court at King William's Town for the sum of £1, being damages sustained through the wrongful detention of his cow. The cow was detained for the purpose of impounding her for trespass in the garden of the respondent within the Borough of King William's Town. The appellant however contends that at the date of the detention of his cow, viz., the 30th June, 1905, there existed no pound regulation justifying the detention of cattle found trespassing and doing damage, and that by Common Law the only remedy is an action for the recovery of such damage. The Magistrate has very carefully and very clearly given the reasons which induced him to dismiss the claim of the appellant, the plaintiff below, and to give judgment in favour of the respondent, the defendant below, with costs. The Borough of King William's Town had its own Bye-Laws and Regulations promulgated under the King William's Town Borough Ordinance No. 9 of 1864. Under Regulation 2 of Section III. of these Bye-Laws provision was made for the impounding and detention of animals found trespassing. By proclamation No. 29 of 1903, however, the Borough of King William's Town was placed under the Municipal Act of 1882. By paragraph 164 of this Act it is provided that the Pound Ordinance of 1847 and all Acts amending the said Ordinance shall Mutatis Mutandis extend and apply to every Municipality hereafter constituted or brought under the operation of this Act.

There have from time to time been several amendments of the Pound Ordinance of 1847, the last of which is the Act No. 15 of 1892, known as the Pounds and Trespasses Act of 1892, which repeals the Pound Ordinance of 1847, and all subsequent Acts dealing with Pounds and Trespasses. By section 81 of the Pounds and Trespasses Act of 1892 it is provided that the provisions of this Act shall apply to every pound in any Municipality constituted or brought under the provisions of the Municipal Act of 1882. The provisions relating to Pounds as contained in this Act therefore came into operation within the Borough of King William's Town, which was brought under the provisions of the Municipal Act of 1882 by the Proclamation No. 29 of 1903. That being so, I agree with the view expressed by the Magistrate that the provisions of the Pounds and Trespasses Act of 1892 superseded and repealed the Pound Regulations which are contained in the Bye-Laws of the Borough of King William's Town promulgated under the Ordinance No. 9 of 1864. So much appears to me to be quite clear and plain. But during the present year the Legislature passed an Act No. 27 of 1905, called "The King William's Town Borough Act of 1905." By section 1 of this Act the Proclamation No. 29 of 1903, bringing the Borough of King William's Town under the operation of the Municipal Act of 1882, and any other law, or Proclamation contrary to this Act of 1905 are expressly repealed. Section 2 of this Act, however provides inter alia that all Borough Regulations in force in such Borough of King William's Town shall (unless repugnant to the provisions of this Act) continue in force until altered or amended under this Act. Section 122 of this new Act is to the same effect. It provides that the "existing rules and regulations of the Borough of King William's Town, in so far as the same are not contrary to law, and not repugnant to or inconsistent with the true intent and meaning of this Act, shall remain as legal, valid and effectual as if they had been word for word inserted in this Act, until such time as the same shall have been altered by the Council in due form of law." By section 123 power is given to the Council of the Borough to make and alter Borough rules and regulations, and section 124 specifies the various heads or matters with regard to which regulations may be so made, in which regulations may be so made, including (sub-section 21) the establishment of one or more pounds within the Borough and the making of such pound regulations as may be necessary.

The Magistrate appears to have had some difficulty as to the meaning of sections 2 and 122 of the new King William's Town Borough Act, which expressly states that all Borough Regulations in force in the Borough shall, except where repugnant to the Act, continue in force until altered or amended under the Act. He considered that as the former regulations with regard to pounds contained in the Bye-laws and Regulations promulgated under the Ordinance No. 9 of 1864 had virtually and in effect been repealed by the bringing of the Borough of King William's Town under the Municipal Act of 1882 and were not revived by the removal of the Borough from the operation of that Act by the new Borough Act of 1905, it must be taken, in order to give a meaning and effect to the language of sections 2 and 122 of the new Act, that the Pounds and Trespasses Act of 1892 should be regarded as the existing pound regulations for the Borough of King William's Town until altered by the Council as prescribed by these sections. Otherwise, the Magistrate thought the Borough would be without any pound regulations until new ones were framed and published. He accordingly held that the provisions of the Pounds and Trespasses Act of 1892 still contain the pound regulations of the Borough and gave judgment against the appellant, Mr. Murray, with costs. While I agree that it is to be regretted that the Borough should for the present be without any pound regulations, I think that the words of sections 2 and 122 of the new Act for the Borough of King William's Town cannot be so construed as to make the Pounds and Trespasses Act of 1892 still applicable to the Borough. It is true that Section 2 lays down that, notwithstanding the repeal of the Proclamation 29 of 1903, bringing the Borough under the operation of the Municipal Act of 1882, all Borough Regulations in force shall so continue until altered by the Council. This, I venture to think, does not mean that the provisions of the Pounds and Trespasses Act of 1892 must be considered as the Borough Regulations of King William's Town so far as the matter of pounds is concerned. It can hardly be that the Legislature intended this Act of 1892 to continue in force until the Borough Council altered the provisions of this Act by framing new pound regulations. Such a view seems to me open to a twofold objection. First of all it would indefinitely, if not perpetually, continue the provisions of the Pounds and Trespasses Act of 1892 as of force in the Borough of King William's Town, if the Council does not choose to frame new pound regulations. In the next place the Legislature, when speaking in Sections 2 and 122 of the existing rules and regulations of the Borough of King William's Town, seems rather to have contemplated the local Borough rules and regulations in force in the particular Borough of King William's Town, with which alone the new Act deals, as distinct from the provisions relating to pounds contained in the Pounds and Trespasses Act, which is a general Statute applying generally to the whole Colony. It should be borne in mind that the Borough Regulations framed and published under Ordinance No. 9 of 1864 were only affected and repealed by the Municipal Act of 1882 so far as inconsistent with that Act. Sections 2 and 4 (Subsection 2) of this Act of 1882 expressly lay that down. It is, therefore, quite possible and probable that many of these Borough Regulations of King William's Town, dealing with municipal matters other than pounds are still in force, and that it is to these and similar rules and regulations that the language of Sections 2 and 122 of the new Act of 1905 applies. It seems then to follow that so far as the matter of pounds is concerned the Borough is at present without any rule or regulation on the subject, for, as already pointed out, the bringing of the Borough under the Municipal Act of 1882 caused the Pounds and Trespasses Act of 1892 to operate, which later Act, while repealing the regulation as to pounds contained in the Borough Regulations of King William's Town, has now in turn been itself repealed. This may cause a temporary inconvenience to the inhabitants of King William's Town, but the Council of the Borough has the remedy in its own hands and can immediately frame and submit for approval new regulations dealing with the subject of pounds within the municipal limits.

As there does not exist any rule or regulation, either Statutory or Municipal, applying to the impounding of cattle within the limits of the Borough of King William's Town, it follows that the cow of Mr. Murray, found trespassing, could not be detained with the view of sending her to the pound. Nor does the common law of the Colony permit the impounding and detention of cattle found trespassing and causing damage, if what Voet in his Commentaries 9.1.3. lays down that, in the absence of pound regulations, the Roman Law is still in force, be true and applicable at the present day. Voet refers to Digest 9.2. lex 39 Section 1, where Pomponius says that if a man finds the cattle of another on his land he must drive them off and will not be entitled to shut them up, for he has special actions if he has suffered damage from the trespass. This may be very well where the owner of the cattle damage-feasant is known and an action de pauperie can consequently be brought against him, but if he be a stranger and not known it may happen that the person, who has sustained the damage, being unable to discover the owner, will be remediless. It is, however, unnecessary to pursue the subject any further for the purpose of this case, as the respondent in the Court below did not rely on any common law right of detaining or impounding the cow. The Magistrate found that the seizure and detention of the cow were legal and that the appellant (plaintiff below) could not insist on the delivery up of his cow until the sum of (2s. 6d.) two shillings and sixpence (the admitted amount of damage sustained by respondent, defendant below) had been paid. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendant with costs, holding that the counterclaim for 2s. 6d. damage done fell away. As the cow was strictly speaking illegally detained in the yard of the defendant, the plaintiff is entitled, in the absence of proof of any further damage, to the 2s. 6d. which he paid under protest in order to release his cow. This sum should therefore have been allowed him in convention. On the other hand the defendant sustained damage to the amount of 2s. 6d. for which he duly counterclaimed, and if he had to restore the 2s. 6d. to the plaintiff, who had paid under protest, it follows that defendant should also have been awarded 2s. 6d., the admitted amount of damage sustained by him. The effect of this would be that the one amount or claim is set off or compensated by the other. I, therefore, think that the judgment below should have been in favour of the plaintiff for 2s. 6d. and in favour of the defendant on the counterclaim for 2s. 6d., each party to pay his own costs. The judgment below will accordingly be altered to judgment in this form. As to the costs of this appeal I do not think, under the special circumstances of the case, that I should make any other order than that each party shall pay his own costs. It is much to be regretted that the parties, who are next door neighbours, did not settle this trifling dispute between them amicably.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan for appellant;
Mr. Benjamin for respondent.

Mr. Buchanan said that the real point to be decided in this case was whether the seizure for the purpose of sending to the pound was legal and justifiable, or wrongful and unlawful, as the plaintiff said. The whole question was whether section 2 of Act 27, 1905, the new King William's Town Borough Act, repealed Proclamation 29 of 1903, which brought the municipality under the terms of Act 45 of 1882, the general Municipal Act. It was contended for the present respondent in the Court below that, since the King Boro' Act of 1905 was promulgated on the 30th June last, the borough was taken away from the general Municipal Act, and that the Pounds and Trespasses Act (No. 15, 1892) did not apply, and accordingly that no regulations were in force in the borough relating to pounds and trespasses, except it were held that the words of section 2 (sub-section 2) saved the regulations to the borough. While the borough was under the General Municipal Act, the pound was under Act 27 of 1905. Act 15 of 1892 had been superseded, and these regulations were made under 15 of 1892.

[Buchanan, J.: There were no special regulations for King William's Town.]

If there had been no pound regulations in force in that town, under the Common Law a man has a right to send trespassing cattle to the pound. If there was no municipal pound they could have been sent to the divisional pound. See Section 7 of the Pounds' Act.

Exactly; the whole scope of Act 20 of 1892 is that trespassing animals must be sent to the nearest pound. That would apply even if the pound were in another division. Sections 25, 73, 83 and 84 allow animals impounded outside a municipality to be sent to the municipal pound. That is clearly put in Ordinance 16 of 1847, Section 59, which, however, has been repealed. Voet (9-1-3), Grotius and Van Leeuwen all agree that should there be no public pound, animals may be impounded elsewhere. See Maxwell on Statutes, p. 319 and 327, as to interpretation of Statutes. If it be held that the regulations cited do not apply, the man upon whose property trespass is committed would have no remedy.

Mr. Benjamin (for respondent): If it be urged that Act 18 of 1882 is still in force, it appears to be argued for the other side that pound regulations, etc., can be altered only by Act of Parliament. In this case I submit that Act 18 of 1882 applies. From 1892 municipalities who have no special Act are under Act 18 of 1882. If Section 122 be construed in the wide sense contended for it, it would make that section practically an Act of Parliament. According to the construction of the other side, the regulations of the Town Council might over-ride an Act of Parliament. Section 81 of the Ordinance contemplates that every municipality should provide its own pound.

That would be the fault of the municipality. As to the construction of the Act, surely one cannot seize an animal within a municipality and send it to a Divisional Council pound. The whole tenour of the Act is that every animal seized within a municipality must be placed in the municipal pound, or in a Divisional Council pound, within the division in which it has been seized. See Voet (9-1-3) and the authorities there cited. But all these authorities are discussing purely local laws (Hand-vesting); see Grotius (3-38-11). Voet's context shows that on this point Roman Law and the Law of Holland are identical. The man whose lands are trespassed upon may sue the owner of the trespassing animals for damages, but he cannot shut them up in a private pound.

Mr. Buchanan was not heard in reply.

De Villiers, C.J.: The learned Judge in the Court below ended his judgment as follows: "It is to be regretted that the parties, who are next-door neighbours, did not settle this trifling dispute between them amicably." I quite agree with that remark, and if it were applicable to that Court, it is equally applicable to this Court; but, of course, if people have rights, it does not depend upon the amount in dispute as to whether they are entitled to assert those rights. It appears that the plaintiff's cow trespassed upon the defendant's land and did some damage. The defendants' servant seized the cow with the object of sending her to the pound, but before she could have been sent to the pound the plaintiff's servant appeared on the scene and demanded the cow. The defendant refused to deliver the cow unless at all events the damage done by her was paid to him. Accordingly, under protest, the plaintiff's servant paid 2s. 6d. Then the plaintiff brought an action, in which he claimed damages for the unlawful seizure of this cow. The Magistrate came to the conclusion that it was not an unlawful seizure, inasmuch as the pound regulations which had been in force in the borough of King William's Town at the time of the passing of the Borough Act in 1905 were still in force in the municipality. The learned Judge, however, held, on appeal, that these regulations were no longer in force, that there was no pound in the municipality, that consequently there was no right on the part of the defendant to seize the cow, and he gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff for 2s. 6d., for unlawful seizure of the cow, and, on the other hand, allowed the counter-claim of the defendant for 2s. 6d. damage, and ordered each party to pay his own costs, and from this judgment the defendant now appeals. I am inclined to agree with the view of the Magistrate that until the borough made its own pound regulations, the provisions of the Pounds Act of 1892 remained in force as the pound regulations of the borough. Under the 124th section of the Act 27 of 1905, the Borough Council had the power to establish one or more pounds within the borough, and to provide for the erection of pounds, the appointment of pound-masters, and for making such other regulations as may seem necessary or expedient. In point of fact, when this action was brought, or, at all events, when the cow trespassed, no such regulations had yet been made. Accordingly the question arose whether the Act of 1892 was still in force. The 122nd section of the Act 27, 1905, is as follows: "The existing rules and regulations of the borough of King William's Town, in so far as the same are not contrary to law, and not repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the true intent and meaning of this Act shall remain in force as legal, valid, and effectual, as if the same had been word for word, inserted in this Act, until such time as the same shall have been altered by the Council in due form of law." Now, I am certainly inclined to the view that this section is wide enough to embrace within the terms "rules and regulations" rules and regulations established by the Act of 1892, but I do not wish to found my decision upon this point, because I am clearly of opinion that, upon other grounds, the seizure of the cow for the purpose of taking her to the pound was perfectly legal. In the first place there was still a pound in existence within the borough, and there is nothing in the Borough Act of 1905 to make that an illegal pound. But then, assuming that it was an illegal pound, the defendant was entitled to impound the cow in the nearest legal pound. The 25th section of the Pounds Act is as follows: "Any proprietor upon whose land any animals are found trespassing may send such animals to that pound which is the nearest, by a practicable road or thoroughfare, to the land trespassed upon, and to no other pound." This is a general law applicable to the whole of the Colony, and, therefore, it is not necessary to inquire into the question as to whether the learned Judge correctly stated the common law of the Colony. I found my decision upon this section as to the right of a proprietor of any land to send the animals found trespassing upon it to the nearest pound. If, therefore, there is a trespass upon land within the Municipality, the cattle must be sent to the nearest pound within that Municipality. But supposing there is no pound at all? In my opinion, in such a case, the owner of the land upon which there has been a trespass, is entitled to send the cattle to the nearest pound even if it is not within the Municipality. It is true that until the passing of the Borough Act of 1905, the borough was under the Municipal Act of 1882, and that by the 81st section of the Pounds Act, 1892, the provisions of such Pounds Act are made to apply to every pound in any municipality constituted under the Act of 1882, that until the passing of the Borough Act of 1905, there was not, as the plaintiff contends, any pound in this municipality, then there would be no pound to which the 81st section of the Pounds Act of 1892 could apply; but it does not follow that the inhabitants are deprived of the general right to impound given by the 25th section. The owner of the land upon which there has been a trespass would still be entitled to this general right given by law, and if there is not a pound within that municipality, he is entitled, under the 25th section, to impound in the nearest pound. In the present case the defendant had not yet carried out his intention. He had seized the cow, and we may assume that he had seized her for the purpose of sending her to the nearest legal pound, and, therefore, in my opinion, the learned Judge in the Court below was wrong in holding that the plaintiff was entitled to recover any sum from the defendant for the defendant's illegal seizure of the cow. The cow was legally seized. On these grounds, I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court below cannot be supported, and that the decision of the Magistrate must be restored. Judgment will be for the appellant, respondent to pay costs.

Mr. Benjamin said that the appeal was being supported by the Council of King William's Town, and it was in the nature of a test. If there had been any misunderstanding, it had been due to the fact that the Municipality itself was neglectful.

De Villiers, C.J.: We have nothing to do in this matter with the Council. The Council is not before the Court. As I said before, I am strongly inclined to the view that until the Council makes its own regulations, the provisions of the Pounds Act are the regulations that are applicable. But, as between the parties before the Court, the appellant is successful, and I think he ought to have his costs. The appeal will be allowed, with costs in this court, and in the court below, and the judgment of the Magistrate's Court will be restored.

GREYVENSTEIN V. THOMPSON.

Landlord and tenant—Damage to property leased—Estoppel by conduct.

G. had leased certain premises to T. from November 1st, 1904, till October 31st, 1905. T., however, held over till February 26th, 1906, on which date he tendered delivery of the premises. This G. refused to accept until he should have put them in the same good order and condition as they were in when handed over to him. T. remained in occupation for some weeks, and executed certain small repairs. G. now sued T. for rent for the whole time of his occupancy, for ejectment and for damages.

Held, that G. should have accepted delivery of the premises at the date of expiration of T.'s lease and sued him for damages.

Held further, that T., by consenting to remain, was estopped from claiming his right to vacate the premises and was liable for rent during the time he had remained in possession for half the cost of repairs and for damages.

This was an action brought by Hester Jacoba Greyvenstein, wife of Johannes P. J. Greyvenstein, of Barkly East, against James Thompson, barber, Barkly East, for rent and damages.

The declaration set out that the plaintiff was the owner of a certain erf No. 40, with buildings thereon, situate at Barkly East. On July 29, 1904, plaintiff, by a written lease, let to the defendant the said premises at a rent of £84, for one year, beginning the 1st November, 1904, and ending 31st October, 1905. Defendant had, since the expiration of the said period, remained in possession of the premises and had had, and still has (15th March), use and occupation thereof. Plaintiff claimed payment of 5s. per diem in respect of such occupation by virtue of an agreement entered into between the parties on or about November 8, 1905, or, failing proof of such agreement, he said that 5s. per diem was a fair and reasonable charge for such occupation. By the lease defendant agreed to keep in good repair during his tenancy all buildings and outhouses, fences, and gates, and deliver the same in such good order and cleanliness as he had received the premises in. Defendant, in breach of the agreement, had allowed the premises, etc., to fall into a state of dirtiness, disrepair, and dilapidation and had refused to deliver the same in a state of good order and cleanliness. Plaintiff said that she had suffered £5 damages in consequence thereof. She claimed (1) an order for delivery of possession; (2) payment of the sum of 5s. per diem from the 1st November to date of delivery of possession, and (3) the sum of £50 as damages.

Defendant, in his plea, admitted that he remained in possession of the said premises until February 22, 1906, on which date he tendered delivery thereof and payment of £28 10s. for use and occupation of the premises from October 31, 1905, to the 22nd February, 1906, and tendered costs to date of tender. Subsequent to the date of tender as aforesaid he had at all times been ready and willing to deliver the said premises, but plaintiff neglected and refused to accept delivery. Defendant now repeated his tender. He denied that he agreed to pay the 5s. per diem for any period beyond the lease. He said that plaintiff undertook to keep the roofing, guttering, and downpipes of the said premises in repair. He denied that he had unlawfully and in breach of the agreement allowed the buildings, outhouses, etc., to fall into a state of dirtiness and disrepair, but said that the premises were in the same state of cleanliness, order and repair as they were in when he entered into the lease, making due allowance for reasonable wear and tear. He denied that plaintiff had suffered damages for which he was liable.

Plaintiff, in her replication, admitted the tender, but said the tender was conditional on the acceptance thereof by the plaintiff in full and final settlement of her claims. She said that the tender was altogether insufficient and unsatisfactory in view of the dilapidated condition of the premises as set forth in the declaration. She had since received delivery of the premises, except the stable without prejudice to her claim for damages.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones was for plaintiff; Mr. Roux was for defendant.

Hendrick A. Meitjes, attorney, Barkly East, at some length described the condition of the premises about the time the defendant tendered delivery, and said that the state of things was so bad that the plaintiff could not possibly accept the premises. The defendant had sub-let a portion of the premises. One Mr. Potgieter afterwards hired the premises, but when he first came to Barkly East he would not take the house. Potgieter had spent eight guineas in putting the house in a suitable condition. Witness gave evidence as to certain repairs, which should be carried out, his estimate being about £35.

Other evidence was called for plaintiff and Mr. Jones closed his case.

Evidence was led for defendant to the effect that he delivered possession as soon as he was able to get out his sub-tenants, and that the premises had been placed by him (defendant) in a condition substantially equal to that in which they were received. The property was very old.

Counsel, having been heard in argument on the facts.

Maasdorp, J.: In this case the plaintiff claims from the defendant payment of rent from the first of February to such time as the defendant shall be declared to have delivered possession of the house, which was on 11th April. The plaintiff also claims a sum as damages suffered by her in respect of negligence on the part of the defendant to keep the place in proper repair. The defendant has expressed his willingness, and has tendered in his plea the payment of rent up to the 22nd February, when he vacated the place. The plaintiff contends that she is entitled to rent subsequently to the 22nd February, because the defendant was not then prepared to give up possession. It appeared that at that time the plaintiff took up the position that she was not obliged to accept the premises from the defendant until the defendant had put the place in a proper state of repair. I think the plaintiff was legally wrong. When the lease expired, and the defendant was prepared to deliver up the house, the plaintiff was obliged to accept her pro-party, but was entitled to claim from the defendant any such damage as she might prove herself entitled to in respect of the condition in which the defendant had left the place. However, upon the plaintiff refusing to accept delivery and handing back the keys to the defendant, the defendant, instead of insisting upon vacating the premises, and giving possession to the plaintiff, accepted the keys, and set about effecting some repairs upon the premises. He, therefore accepted the position of retaining possession after the 22nd February. The question the Court has now to decide is whether the defendant was liable to effect repairs, and whether there were repairs, which it was his duty to perform, and which he had neglected to perform. The conclusion I come to from the description given by Mr. Meitjes is that the paper on the walls was in a dilapidated condition, through the ill-usage received at the hands of the tenant, and that the doors also were in want of paint, and had been neglected during the tenancy. Upon the evidence, I am prepared to find that the painting and papering together would cost something between £25 and £30. But when these repairs have been effected, such improvements will have been effected as will be for the benefit of the plaintiff herself, and she cannot to that extent be enriched at the expense of the defendant. It seems to me that more than half of the expense which will have to be incurred to place the premises in a proper state of repair will be improvements for the benefit of the plaintiff. That would reduce the amount to something like £12. As to rent, I think if I allow an extra month as the period during which the plaintiff was kept out of possession through the fault of the defendant, that would be ample. Judgment will be given for plaintiff in respect of rent for £35, instead of £28 10s., as tendered, and in respect of the damages £12 will be awarded. Judgment for plaintiff for £47, with costs, including costs of application made by plaintiff to have the evidence of witnesses taken on commission. Defendant would have been very wise if he had saved costs by consenting to that application.

On the application of Mr. Jones, Maasdorp, J., certified the plaintiff as a necessary witness.

PENNY V. BARNA.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones applied for leave to mention this matter, which was an application to set aside a certain attachment obtained, ex parte, by the present respondent (Ferenz Barna). The matter came on for hearing before Mr.

Justice Buchanan on Monday, but, there being no affidavit of service and no appearance for respondent, it was ordered to stand over. Counsel now produced an affidavit of service upon respondent, who, however, did not appear.

On the petition of Barna an order was granted on the 1st June by the Chief Justice attaching a certain chronophone, of which Albert Penny is the proprietor ad fundandum jurisdictionem in an action to be brought by petitioner for damages for breach of contract, attachment to be discharged upon respondent giving security to the satisfaction of the Registrar for £50 to abide judgment for damages and costs. The action in question related to the employment of Barna as operator and electrician for certain singing and living pictures which were exhibited at the Good Hope Hall. Petitioner said that he had been summarily dismissed from his post, and he proposed to institute an action for £100 damages for breach of contract and unlawful dismissal. He described respondent as a "travelling showman" and "bird of passage."

Mr. Jones said that the petitioner (Barna) had taken no steps in the matter since the attachment and interdict were granted. No summons had been issued, and Penny now applied to have the attachment and interdict set aside, with costs. He read an affidavit by Penny, who said that he resided at the Belvedere Hotel, Cape Town, and was the proprietor of the Singing and Living Pictures Company. He admitted that an agreement was entered into between himself and Barna, but he said that on the 29th May he dismissed the latter for incompetency and insobriety. Barna had been specially engaged in England as an electrician and operator. Under clause 7 of the agreement he was empowered to dismiss the petitioner in the event of insobriety, or, if he had not the knowledge or experience necessary to enable him to perform his duties. On Wednesday, the 16th May, deponent engaged the Good Hope Hall for six days, commencing from Monday, the 21st May, and the same Wednesday the applicant commenced working the chronophone, and continued working daily until Monday, the 21st May, the opening night, when Barna informed deponent that the performance could not be started, as he could not get the machine right. The performance was therefore postponed until the following evening. On Tuesday night deponent again asked Barna if he was ready, and he replied, "Open the doors and we will chance it." The chronophone was worked by Barna that evening, but he had no control over it, the pictures being put on at racing speed, so that the performance, which should have lasted two hours, was over in an hour and ten minutes. The audience were very dissatisfied, and complained that the show was a fraud. In consequence deponent instructed Barna to appear at the theatre next morning at nine o'clock, but he did not appear until twelve, and then in a half-drunken condition. The show was opened again that evening, but it was as bad as ever, and the audience clamoured for their money back. The applicant was still under the influence of liquor, and was unable to perform his duties. The performance continued in the same unsatisfactory way. The pictures were sometimes upside down, with occasional stoppages of the machine, the light continually going out and leaving the machine in the dark. The show closed on the Saturday, and deponent instructed the applicant to pack up the machine, and he dismissed him. He showed Barna a letter which appeared in the "Cape Times" of May 25 from the City Electrical Engineer, denying that the opening of the show was deferred owing to the failure of the electric current, and stating that the failure was due to a wrong connection in the consumer's electrical apparatus. Barna, when asked if this was correct, said he did not know, and did not care. Certain supporting affidavits were attached to Penny's affidavit, but Maasdorp, J., said he did not think it was necessary to read these.

Mr. Jones said it appeared, from Barna's attitude to-day, that he was not prepared to substantiate his case.

The order of the 1st June was discharged, with costs.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

THOMAS V. KOTZEE. { 1906.
June 19th.

This was an action in which Henry Thomas, a contractor, sought to recover £1,000 damages from Frederick Jacobus Kotzee, a farmer, residing at Parow, for breach of contract.

The plaintiff's declaration stated that he entered into a contract with the defendant to take from him 2,000,000 bundles (more or less) of wood at 9d. per 100 bundles. The agreement further provided that the plaintiff should cut, collect, and make into bundles, according to a certain sample, all such work at his own expense, and pay every Friday for all wood or bundles cut during the week. The plaintiff cut and collected 69,000 bundles of wood, and paid for them. On or about January, 1905, the defendant, in breach of his contract, refused to allow the defendant to enter on his land, and continued to do so, wherefore plaintiff claimed damages amounting to £1,000.

The plaintiff, in his plea, denied that he had refused to allow the plaintiff to gather wood on the farm. He had always been ready and willing that the plaintiff should carry out all the terms of the agreement.

Dr. Greer appeared for the plaintiff, and Mr. Upington appeared for the defendant.

Henry Thomas, the plaintiff, stated he entered into an agreement to purchase from the defendant two million bundles (more or less) of wood at 9d. per 100 bundles. To carry out this contract witness engaged men to make up the bundles at 1s. per 100. Work was done every day except on rainy days, and payments for the week's delivery was made every Friday. 69,000 bundles were cut and paid for. Witness did not take any active part in the cutting of the wood, but occasionally superintended it. In October, 1904, defendant's manager complained that unless 2,000 bundles were cut each week, independent of what his boy Adam cut, the cutting by the latter would be sold to defray current expenses.

[Hopley, J.: Was anything about an average number said in the agreement?]

Dr. Greer: No, my lord, nor a limited time.

Witness, continuing, said he told Mr. Kotzee he would put all the men he could get on the work, but that labour was very scarce. The manager wrote later stating that the defendant had instructed him to stop the cutting of the wood, witness had lost that letter. Witness went round next morning, and found that all his men had been stopped. Witness then interviewed the manager, and told him he had a contract to cut the wood, and he replied that he could not help it; he could only carry out instructions. Witness saw the defendant the next day, and drew his attention to the fact that he had been stopped. The defendant replied, "Do you think I will let you cut wood at 9d. per 100, while I am losing all my valuable cattle. Two million bundles (more or less) means that I can give you as much or as little as I please." He then locked the gate and rode away. Witness often saw the manager, and told him that as soon as he was financially able to do so, he would take the matter into court. A letter of demand was sent to defendant last March. Witness did not take legal proceedings before because he could not pay the costs of doing so. No reply was received to the letter of demand for £1,000, and subsequently the summons was served. The bundles cost witness 1s. 9d. per hundred, and he sold them at from 2s. 6d. to 3s. per 100. The wood was good, and the farm was close to the village of Parow. The wood was known as "Rooi Krantz." After witness was driven from defendant's place he bought a bush from another man for £20, but the wood was not nearly so good. Witness had a ready market for wood at the time he made the contract with defendant. He could sell the wood as fast as he could cut it. Although witness was claiming £1,000, he did not expect to get that amount. He claimed he was entitled to 1s. per hundred bundles.

[Hopley, J.: Why don't you go on with your contract?—The place was locked, and we would not be allowed into the camp.

But in his plea defendant says you can go on?—I wouldn't risk it.

Witness, continuing, said that since he was turned away from the farm Kotzee had been dealing with the wood.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: Witness cut wood enough to bring in a profit of £5 per month. He could not get labour, or he would have cut more. He did not dismiss men because he had not sufficient money to pay them. Witness used to do speculation work besides selling wood. Witness always had about £5 in his pocket, and there was a constant stream of money coming in from the wood. Witness had a ready market for his wood.

When you purchased this wood, how long did you think you were entitled to cut it?—About two years.

Where is that letter you received from the manager of the farm stopping you cutting wood?—I have lost it.

Did you show it to anybody?—I did not.

You did not show it to the defendant?—No; I did not.

Continuing witness said he had purchased rails to run a light railway to the edge of the farm to convey the wood down. He did not know what he paid for them.

Do you keep books?—Not for these little things.

Then, what for?—For big deals. I am dealing in bricks now, and keep books.

And what profits do you make?—About £5 a month.

Witness (continuing under cross-examination) said his financial position had not improved since January last, but he put a small amount aside each week to get £50 together for the present action.

Are you prepared to go on the farm now and cut wood?—I don't want to have anything more to do with Mr. Kotzee.

Then you don't want to go on?—No. I want something better now.

Several witnesses were examined on behalf of plaintiff, all of whom corroborated the evidence he gave.

Dr. Greer closed his case.

Fredk. Jacobus Kotzee, uncle to the defendant, stated he arranged the contract and supervised the counting of the bundles, receiving the money and giving the necessary receipts. From time to time witness had to complain of the quantity of wood that was being dealt with. In October witness wrote on one of the receipts complaining of the amount of wood cut, and in January wrote plaintiff a letter on the subject. Witness kept a record of the work done. Plaintiff led witness to believe that he would cut about 50,000 bundles a week. Witness, who was only out here on a pleasure trip, was entitled to receive one-third of the purchase price of the timber, and moved his residence down near where the wood was being cut to superintend it, but witness was not going to waste his time counting a couple of hundred bundles a week. Witness wrote plaintiff a very polite note, drawing attention to the fact that he was not keeping his contract. Witness denied that he ever stopped the men from working. In the first place he never had any discussion with the men, but instructed his boy to speak to them when it was necessary.

Cross-examined by Dr. Greer: Do you remember making a statement to Mr. Steer in January last?—I do not.

He took your statement down. It was as follows: "In January, 1905, acting under instruction from the defendant, I wrote the plaintiff ordering him not to enter on the defendant's farm"—I never said that.

Can you say why Mr. Steer took down your statement?—He must have misunderstood me.

It was a very big mistake, an extraordinary mistake?—That may be so. I wish they would produce the letter and that would explain everything.

Did you say subsequently, "The plaintiff saw me, and wanted to know why the said letter had been sent to me, and I informed him that I had been instructed by the defendant to do so?—I cannot remember what Mr. Steer states I said.

Did you say that?—Not so pointedly as that.

What do you mean by "pointedly"?—I said if you call me I will be a hostile witness.

Witness (continuing) said he thought that his conversation with Mr. Steer was only a friendly one.

"What have you been doing since then?" inquired counsel?—I have been prospecting.

Where, at Parow?—At Parow! What can you find at Parow. I indulge in an occupation I am very fond of—prospecting—but not in Parow.

What are you doing now?—I am back again at Skeelpot Vlei.

Where?—At Lonely Hut, the little house hidden away in the forest.

And are you still prospecting?—I like the place very much, but I do not go in for prospecting there.

In further cross-examination, it appeared that the farm had lately been purchased by Messrs. Joyce and McGregor, and witness had obtained from them the right to cut wood on the place in dispute. At the rate they were going on, it would have taken about 16 years to cut the wood.

In re-examination, witness stated that no statement was submitted to him by Mr. Steer for signature.

Frederick Jacobus Kotzee, jun., the defendant in the case, stated he left the whole subject of the contract and the supervision of the work in the hands of his uncle, the last witness. His uncle showed him the letter written in January drawing his attention to the fact that he had broken his contract. The letter did not tell him that he was not to go back to the farm. Witness never authorised his uncle to order the men off the farm. He denied having had a discussion with the plaintiff.

In cross-examination, the witness said that if Thomas had had any complaints, he could have gone to witness.

Dr. Greer: But he says he did?—He's a liar.

In further cross-examination, the witness said the plaintiff led him to believe that he would cut 20, 30, 50, and even 100,000 bundles a week. The portion of the farm sold to Joyce and McGregor was not the portion worked by Thomas.

Witnesses were called for the defence to show that Thomas stopped the work himself, as it was alleged he could not pay the wages' bill.

Counsel were then heard in argument, on the facts, after which Hopley, J., said this was one of those cases in which the whole matter turned on a question of evidence, pure and simple, and it was one of those cases which he regretted to say were not unfrequent in this country, and in which the evidence was so contradictory that either one side or other must be committing perjury. Under these circumstances, one had to examine all the circumstances to see where the probabilities of the case lay, or, at all events, to say whether all the surrounding circumstances lent themselves to the view that the plaintiff had made out his case, because the plaintiff came into court knowing that the burden lay on him of proving his case. The judges had got more or less skilled in the art of weighing evidence and trying to find where the probabilities lay, and yet very frequently there were cases that troubled the most experienced, and one felt the limitations of human fallibility at all events. In this case the plaintiff told the Court that he entered into a contract, a copy of which he produced. It was an agreement by which he had a right to take 2,000,000 bundles of wood from this farm, and for which he had to pay a sum stipulated in the contract. There was direct evidence that this, although it looked a big contract, was not sufficient to make the Court believe that the customers were falling over one another to get the wood. At the beginning of the contract there was a big output, but that gradually came down, and this was explained by witnesses for the defence, who said they were told there was not work for them in cutting the wood, owing to competition, and that they would have to go. All the figures showed that the demand could not be as great as the plaintiff wanted to make out, as the weekly cutting got less and less, and the defendant saw that the contract, which was to have lasted for two years, looked like lasting for sixteen years, and plaintiff was remonstrated with repeatedly. The plaintiff said he had five men a week permanently engaged, but admitted that they cut 200 bundles a day each, which meant 6,000 bundles a week, and the returns put in did not show these figures, or anything like them. The plaintiff accounted for his stopping the work by stating he was peremptorily ordered off the ground. This was denied by the defendant, who stated that he only wrote advising the plaintiff to get on with the work. It was quite possible that the plaintiff came to the conclusion that he could make more money with less labour outside, and therefore decided to abandon the contract, for he stated that he only made £5 a month out of the work. He could not see that the plaintiff had established his case, but if he found the letter which he stated he had lost, he would have good grounds for a further action. Therefore, there would be absolution from the instance, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

GREEF V. KELLER AND { 1906.
OTHERS. { June 20th

Riparian proprietors — Public stream—Irrigation—Right of passage—Act 40 of 1882.

The applicant, a riparian proprietor of land along the banks of a public stream, being desirous of diverting his share of water for irrigation purposes from a higher level than his own land and of leading it over the land of the respondent, an upper riparian proprietor, applied for an order permitting him and his surveyor to enter upon the respondents' land, in order to determine the line of passage to be claimed under Act 40 of 1882.

Held, dismissing an appeal from a Divisional Court, that as the appellant had established no legal right to divert the water before it reached his land, he could not claim a right of passage under the Act 40 of 1882 over the respondents' land.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice Buchanan, in an application by Andries Johannes Albertus Greeff, of Stolsvlakte, division of Oudtshoorn, for an order upon Josephus Johannes Antonie Keller and others, also of Oudtshoorn, for facilities to enable applicant to determine a line of passage for the conveyance of water to his farm. The matter came before the Divisional Court of the Supreme Court upon notice for an order to authorise applicant and a surveyor to enter upon the lands of the respondents on the farm Van Wyk's Kraal, in order to determine a line of passage for the conveyance of water from the Oliphant's River to applicant's farm, Bakenskloof, and the amount of compensation to be offered in respect thereof, in order to enable applicant to give notice to respondents in terms of section 3 of Act No. 26, 1882, and to take further proceedings in terms of the said Act, and, if necessary, of Act No. 40, 1899, with a view to the acquisition by applicant of a right of passage of water across respondents' lands. Applicant and respondents are riparian proprietors of land on the Oliphant's River, a perennial stream, the farm of the applicant being situated below that of the respondents.

The learned Judge in the court below refused the application (15 C.T.R., 958). His Lordship's judgment was as follows:

Applicant and respondents are riparian proprietors of land on the Oliphant's River, a perennial stream, the farm of the applicant being situated below that of the respondents.

The application is a novel one, and renders it necessary to ascertain how far the common law has been altered by the various Acts of Parliament relating to the right of passage of water. In the first place there is not at common law any such right of entry as is here claimed, nor does the Act in terms give any such right. But as the object of the Statute, as stated in the title is "to afford greater facilities to persons having a right to water to convey the same across the lands of other persons," where a right of water exists, I think it may be assumed that the possessor thereof should have such facilities given him as are necessary to make the right of passage, accorded by the Act effective and operative. The right of entry seems to me a necessary incident to the right of passage, and I would not dismiss the application on this ground alone.

But the 10th section provides that no proceedings authorised by the Act shall be taken in any case where the right to the water for which a passage is claimed is in dispute, until such dispute shall have been settled by the Court. The respondents here deny the right claimed by the applicant. Water rights have been the subject of considerable litigation in this Colony, and from the volume of decisions there may be deducted the general proposition that at common law water may be classed either as private or as public or common.

Under the latter class falls water flowing in perennial streams capable of common use, and under the former class, water in streams not public or common, water from springs arising on and kept within private property, water obtained from wells or collected on private property, and such like. To private water there can be an absolute right of ownership just as there may be to any other tangible property. Water in a public stream stands on a different footing. From the very nature of things, there can be no ownership of public water while it is still flowing in the stream and before it has been appropriated. A riparian proprietor may have a right of user, but it is controlled by the right of others. All who can get to a public stream are entitled to take water for what has been called a primary user, such as for drinking purposes and the sustenance of life. A riparian proprietor has also the right to take water for what has been called secondary purposes, such as irrigation and the like, but the user of the water for such purposes must not be to the detriment of the rights of others. Water taken from a public stream can only be used for secondary purposes on the riparian property, and after such user must be returned to the stream for the benefit of the public and of the lower proprietors with no other loss than that which irrigation or similar user has caused. If a lower proprietor was to go higher up a public stream and take thence past an intermediate proprietor's land, water which he was entitled to use only on his own land, he would be interfering with the rights of such intermediate proprietors. At common law the right to take water for irrigation and the like is a right attaching to the ownership of the riparian property and consequently cannot be exercised until the water of a public stream has reached the property.

What rights, then, have been conferred on riparian proprietors by Statute? The first enactment on the subject was Act No. 24, 1876; Section 1 of which provides that "every person shall be bound to give a passage across his land to water derived from springs, dams, reservoirs or any other sources." Section 4 enacts that whoever desires to carry water across "the lands of another shall be bound to prove that the quantity of water whereof he is the proprietor is sufficient for the purpose of which it is destined." Reading these sections together and having regard to the sources named from which the water to be conveyed is obtained, I think it is clear that the right of passage given by this Act was confined to what are called private waters, in which there might be a proprietorship. There is no direct reference to the water of a public stream and no attempt has ever been made at law to extend this Statute to any other water. These provisions were repealed by Act No. 26 1882 upon which the applicant now mainly relies for the right claimed. Section 2 of this Act provides that "every person having a legal right to any water in any stream or river, or derived from any spring, dam, or reservoir, and wishing to employ it in irrigation, etc., shall have the right to convey such water "from and over" any land belonging to any other person. Here again the legislature has refrained from any express mention of public streams, and though the words "any stream or river" are used, they must, I think, be read in conjunction with the words "legal right to water" therein. All the sources of water here mentioned could be sources of private waters, in which there could be a right of ownership as against the world. In Sir Henry Juta's selection of "leading cases on water rights," I am reminded that when the Act of 1882 was under discussion in Parliament clauses were proposed which would have made it clear that it was intended to give a riparian proprietor who had a right to take water, a legal right to such water, but the clauses were withdrawn. If this was an indication of the desire of the legislature to limit the right of passage to what was recognised as private waters it would point against the intention to establish such a right as the applicant now sets up. The jealousy with which upper and lower riparian proprietors guard their respective rights is matter of common knowledge and may account for the rejection of the clauses referred to. But whatever the cause, the words adopted by the Legislature must govern the intention and meaning of the Act. Much stress has, in argument, been placed upon the words in the second section giving a person a right to convey water "from" as well as "over" the land of another person. But I cannot overlook the difference in position between the person having a "legal right to water" and one who has only the right to take water. If the words of the section are confined to water to which a person may have a legal proprietary right, there is no departure from the common law. But to read these words changing the common law, and as giving to a person who has only a right to take water, to which water he had no proprietary right, until he has appropriated it, a legal right to water still flowing in a public stream, would, in my opinion, be an interpretation not justified by the context. If it is desired to deprive upper proprietors of their rights, apt and clear words should be used in the Statute.

It should not left to deduce such an interference with private rights from words capable of bearing a different interpretation and which are applicable to other conditions. As the applicant has not, in my opinion, established a right to the water for which the passage is claimed, this application must be refused with costs.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. (lose), for the appellant. Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Searle, K.C.), for the respondent.

Mr. Schreiner: We claim the right as upper proprietors to go on the respondent's land and take water. Potgieter is a proprietor on the opposite side of the river, and he has given us the right to take water. We do not claim a right of abutment on the left bank of the river. Respondents say that our furrow would cause great damage to their land, but an arbitrator might direct that this water should be conveyed by pipes. It is impossible for anybody to comply with the provisions of Act 26 of 1882. Sections 3 and 4, unless he can first inspect the land. The question is, have we a right to water under Acts 26 of 1882 and 40 of 1889?

In the Court below his lordship held (1) that "right to water" meant "legal right" and (2) that the streams spoken of in Act 26 of 1882 do not include public perennial streams.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Is not the question as to public perennial streams settled by De Wet v. Hicock (1 E.D.C., 249) and Nel v. Kleinhaus (15 C.T.R., 120)?]

The Act of 1882 speaks of any stream or river. See Juta Leading Cases (p. 466). The rights of non-riparian proprietors are covered by the words "from or over" (Act 26 of 1882, Section 2). What was said in debate in the "House" on this Act cannot affect its construction.

[De Villiers, C.J.: No man has a right to take water until it either comes on his land or becomes contiguous to it.]

We do not claim absolute dominium of the water but we say that under Act 26 of 1882 we have a right to take water from the respondent's land, and that the common law was altered by this Statute. The Act was defective inasmuch as it did not prescribe the mode of the division of water. See also Act 40 of 1899, Section 10. Section 8 of Act 26 of 1882 is not repealed by Act 40 of 1899. Any superior Court can fix the place of diversion. Section 10 must not be overruled. See Stewart v. Uniondale Municipality (7 S.C.R., 110). Section 10 of Act 40 of 1899 throws an important light on Act 26 of 1882, and is a definite declaration of the law. Mr. Mulder could not go on the land and, therefore, could not make an accurate survey. In Oudtshoorn nearly every one has to take water from above his property. There water rights have been divided and sub-divided almost in infinitum. Sections 8 and 10 of Act 40 of 1899 protect all rights to water. In the absence of a servitude the right of abutment is clearly recognised. We only ask for a reasonable share of the water; we do not just now say what that share is.

Sir H. Juta (for respondent): This case raises two points: (1) May a lower proprietor go on to the land of an upper proprietor and take out water? (2) May the appellants come on to our land, make their survey, and then decide on their course of action? As far as I can understand, the original rights given to lower proprietors were given by Act 26 of 1882; Act 40 of 1899 was supposed to be merely declaratory of the Common Law. Until this Act was passed no lower proprietary claimed the right to go on the land of an upper proprietor and take water. No doubt there are cases in which a lower proprietor will have to take water from another person's land. If a riparian farm be sub-divided and one portion is on the river bank and the other is not, the owner of the latter has a right to a share of the water and the only way he can get it is by taking it from the neighbouring property. In such a case a lower proprietor might say: "One or other of you may have a share of the water, but you cannot both get it." The decision in Stewart v. Uniondale Municipality (7 S.C.R., 110) has always been held to be law. By Act 26 of 1882 a man may lead off such water as he has a legal right to use. But unless he be a riparian proprietor he has no legal right to a single drop. A man has no legal right to water till it comes on his land; a man can have no dominium in flowing water, he can only have a right of user. If by Section 10 of the Act of 1899 it had been intended to extend these rights the Act would surely have been more clearly drawn. Section 10 is particularly involved, but see Section 6. Section 10 speaks of "the water assigned to him" (the riparian proprietor); but assigned by whom? Section 10 does not authorise a man to go on the land of an upper proprietor.

[Maaadorp, J.: Section 6 refers to matters which are not the subject of litigation; Section 10 to matters litigated.]

But Sections 6 and 7 provide for an appeal and therefore clearly contemplate litigation. If Act 40 of 1899 had been intended to give a lower proprietor the right to take out a furrow on an upper proprietor's land surely that would have been clearly expressed, but Section 10 does not give even to the Supreme Court power to order this to be done: Section 10 creates no new right. It seems to me that the appellant should have applied to a Water Court for a right of abutment, and has followed a wrong procedure in coming to this Court.

[Maaadorp, J.: If there was no Water Court, what was he to do?]

I do not know. Then again, by what Acts are rights such as are now claimed given? Certainly not by Section 4 of Act 26 of 1882. There is no Act which gives the appellant power to wander all over our land with surveyors, their servants and all their appliances.

[Hopley, J.: How could a furrow be cut without taking levels by means of instruments?]

One of the witnesses says he could judge the levels from the road.

Mr. Schreiner in reply.

De Villiers, C.J.: This is an appeal against a judgment of a Divisional Court dismissing an application for an order to permit the applicant and his surveyor to enter upon the respondent's land in order to determine a line of passage for the conveyance of water from the Oliphant's River to the applicant's farm, Bakenskloof. The respondent is an upper riparian proprietor, and for the purposes of this case it may be assumed that the river is a public one and that the applicant, through whose property it flows, is entitled to a reasonable share of the water for the purpose of irrigation. In the absence, however, of a right acquired by prescription or convention, or in some other lawful manner he is not entitled to take the water out of the river until it reaches his farm. This is a principle underlying all the decisions of this Court in regard to the rights of riparian proprietors. It is a principle which has also been recognised by the English Courts especially in the case of Williams v. Harland, which was cited with approval by my predecessor, Sir Sydney Bell in Relief v. Louw (Buch., 1874). In the former case it was said by Holroyd, J.: "Running water is not in its nature private property. At least, it is private property no longer than it remains on the soil of the person claiming it. Before it came there it clearly was not his property. It may, perhaps, become quasi the property of another before it comes upon his premises, by reason of his having appropriated to himself the use of the water accustomed to flow through his lands before any other persons had acquired a prior right to it."

In this country the Courts have recognised the right of a person on whose land water rises which does not form part of a public stream to use such water as his own without regard to the claims of lower proprietors. In regard, however, to public streams the riparian proprietor, in the absence of rights acquired by contract or by prescription, is entitled to only a reasonable share until the water reaches his land. The question now arises whether a riparian proprietor is entitled under the 2nd section of Act 26 of 1882 to claim a right of passage over the land of upper proprietors for the purpose of leading out his reasonable share from a part of the stream flowing above his own land. This right can be claimed only by a person having a legal right to water. The applicant's counsel contended that a legal right to water embraces the right to lead out water and does not necessarily mean only the right to the ownership of the water. But if the right to lead out the water arises only when such water reaches his land it is impossible to hold that the Act was intended to enable a lower proprietor to anticipate that right by exercising it before the water reached his land. If this had been intended nothing would have been easier than to use appropriate language for the purpose, such in fact as appears to have been proposed, but not carried, in Committee of the House of Assembly when the Bill was passing through Parliament. Much stress has been laid on behalf of the applicant on the use of the words "convey such water from or over land belonging to another person," and it was contended that the employment of the term "from" supports the applicant's case. The use of this word certainly raises some doubt as to the true meaning of the section; but in order to deprive persons of undoubted rights a great deal more is required. The draftsman may have intended to benefit the lower proprietor at the expense of the upper proprietor, but the intention of the Legislature must be gathered from the language construed as a whole and according to the ordinary rules of interpretation. In support of his contention as to the true intent and meaning of the Act of 1882 the learned counsel for the applicant has referred to the 10th section of Act 40 of 1899. That section certainly confers very wide powers on the Court in certain cases of dispute between riparian proprietors, but it does not apply to a case like the present. The only dispute between the parties is as to the applicant's right of entry for the purpose of finding a suitable passage over the respondent's land for the water which the applicant is entitled to lead out of the public stream. If the applicant is not entitled, as of right, to lead out this water above his own land he cannot claim such right of passage either under the 2nd section of the Act of 1882, or under the 10th section of the Act of 1899, or under both combined. It may well be that it is for the public interest that such a right should exist, but it should be conferred in unequivocal terms by the Legislature. I understand that an irrigation bill is now passing through Parliament, and an opportunity will thus be offered of giving clear effect to the intentions of the Legislature. As the law stands, however, I am of opinion that the learned Judge was right in refusing the application; and the appeal must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

MULLER V. JEAREY. { 1906.
{ June 20th.

This was an action instituted by F. Muller, merchant, Cape Town, against Thomas Daniel Jearey, who resides in Cape Town, but trades in German South-West Africa, for the recovery of the sum of £34 10s. 9d., the balance of an account for goods sold and delivered.

Mr. McGregor, who appeared for the defendant, applied for the adjournment of the case on the ground that his client was unable to attend owing to his having an attack of enteric fever. His client only arrived from Damaraland on Tuesday, and was too ill to have a consultation with his attorney.

Mr. Burton (for plaintiff) said he could not very well oppose the application, but he thought his client was entitled to the costs of the day. This was the second occasion on which the case had been adjourned, and the plaintiff, who was ready to proceed to trial, had had no notification of the present application.

The application was granted, and the case adjourned for trial on or before August 21, the defendant to pay the costs of the day.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

MARRIOTT V. MORES KAISER { 1906.
AND JACOB KAISER (TRAD- { June 21st.
ING AS KAISER BROTHERS). }

Mr. Douglas Buchanan was for plaintiff; Mr. W. Porter Buchanan was for defendants.

Mr. D. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £1,000 and for the property to be declared executable.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan opposed the application on a deed of assignment which he said set out that in consideration of the applicants ceding all their property to the assignees they were released from all their debts and the estate passed away as completely as if it were in an insolvency to the assignees.

Hopley, J said he did not think this was a case in which he could grant provisional sentence, and the application would be refused with costs.

MARAIS V. ADAMSTEIN.

Dr. Rainsford said that in this matter leave was granted to sue by edictal citation, and he moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £6,500 and £32 11s. insurance premiums, for the property hypothecated to be declared executable, and for an order attaching the rents.

Order granted.

POHL V. ROBINSON.

Mr. Pohl was for the plaintiff, and Mr. Douglas Buchanan was for the defendant.

This was an application for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £70.

Mr. Buchanan urged that the matter was not one for provisional sentence, but that plaintiff should be ordered to go into the principal case.

Hopley, J: In this case defendant is sued on a promissory note for £70 6s. 8d. made by him on the 20th April last. That promissory note was made to pay balances which then alleged to be due to his attorney on an attorney's bill of costs, fees and disbursements in divorce proceedings which the attorney had been conducting on behalf of the present defendant, in which he was the plaintiff, and which he seems to have obtained what he wanted, viz., a divorce from his wife. In that bill of costs, which was accepted upon the making of this promissory note, it is clearly set forth that the attorney says he only received £60 on account, and the defendant may be an ignorant man, but he may not be so ignorant as not to have seen that it was only alleged that his attorney had received £60 by cash on account of the various sums which he had disbursed and various fees which were due to him. He could, of course, have had his bill of costs taxed before he paid it, but he did not choose to avail himself of that right, and he there and then signed a promissory note to settle the bill of costs and got a receipt. Now it is said that that note was obtained under duress. I am not satisfied that that has been proved. Provisional sentence will be granted, but I cannot see why this Court has been selected for a matter which might have been settled in the Magistrate's Court at Uitenhage, and, therefore, in giving provisional sentence against him, I will only give Magistrate's Court costs.

AREND V. RIX.

STEYTLER AND CO. V. FLETCHER.

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan moved for the final adjudication of defendant's estate as insolvent.

Defendant applied for an extension of time, and said he thought that in 14 days he would be able to settle matters.

The matter was ordered to stand over for a consultation between the parties.

Later on, Mr. Buchanan said that he could not consent to a postponement.

Defendant, in answer to the Court, said he owed £13,000, and had property which had cost £24,000.

Defendant's son-in-law said that arrangements were being made by which they hoped to meet all liabilities. The defendant owed, apart from bonds, £1,100.

The matter was ordered to stand over for a week.

Postea (June 28th).

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan again made application for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent. The matter had been postponed on Thursday last to enable defendant to take advantage of an offer he said he could obtain. This offer had fallen through. Counsel also applied for the appointment of Mr. W. A. Currey as provisional trustee, his petitioners being eight creditors, representing claims over £9,000. The estate consisted of landed properties in Salt River, Woodstock, Cape Town, and Sea Point.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones, for Messrs. Witt and others, seven creditors, representing claims over £2,600, moved for the appointment of Mr. G. W. Steytler as provisional trustee.

Final adjudication granted, and Mr. Currey appointed provisional trustee, with power to collect rents.

STEYTLER V. THE EASTERN PENINSULA ESTATE AND WATERWORKS SYNDICATE.

Mr. Palmer moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £1,800 with interest, and for £3 16s. premiums of insurance, the bond having become due by reason of the non-payment of interest. Counsel also applied for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable.

Order granted.

TOORT V. DALY.

Mr. Roux moved for a decree of civil imprisonment upon an unsatisfied judgment of this Court for £10 12s. and £87 4s. 7d. costs.

Dr. Greer (for defendant) applied for a suspension of the order, and said that the defendant was without means and out of employment.

Defendant was called, and he said that he was without means. His wife had certain means, which were gradually getting exhausted. He had other creditors representing £300 or £400. Some time ago he offered the plaintiff £10 a month through the agency of a friend, who had, however, now gone away. Witness now offered £2 a month. His health had been bad for some time. He had been living by speculating and racing.

Cross-examined: His wife had shares in the Burger Estates and the Klappmuts Racing Club. The house they occupied cost £4,500. The occupants were his wife and himself and his mother-in-law and three orphans.

Mr. Roux said it was very hard upon the creditors that they should not get paid while defendant resided in a house that had cost £4,500.

[Hopley, J.: You want him to live in a "house" that cost a good deal more, I believe.]

Decree of civil imprisonment granted with costs, to be suspended on payment of £5 per month at the offices of Messrs. Van der Byl and De Villiers on the 1st day of each month, first payment to be made on the 1st July, with leave to plaintiff to apply for an increased order.

ILLGNER V. WINFIELD. { 1906.
June 21st.
„ 25th.

Provisional sentence—Conditional acknowledgment of debt—Further claims—Procedure.

Plaintiff sued defendant for provisional sentence on a letter in which defendant tendered to pay some £81 on condition of receiving a discharge in full; plaintiff in his summons also claimed a further sum said to be due, or alternatively that defendant should be ordered to render and debate an account.

Held, that as plaintiff should have either sued on the letter for the £81 tendered, or have gone into the principal case, provisional sentence must be refused, with costs.

Mr. Burton moved for provisional sentence for £87 18s. 2d., on an acknowledgment of debt contained in a letter dated April 25, 1906, written by defendant. The summons, counsel stated, also claimed £63 19s. 4d., being further balance due to which defendant wrongfully and unlawfully withheld moneys collected for the plaintiff from the North German Insurance Company by the de-defendant, or, in the alternative, for an account supported by proper vouchers, the debate and payment of such sum as may be found to be due. At present plaintiff only applied for provisional sentence on the acknowledgment of debt for £87 18s. 2d.

Dr. Greer opposed, and read an affidavit by Frank Winfield, law agent, Claremont, who said that he was instructed by defendant to take steps to recover from the North German Insurance Company certain money upon insurance policies. A power of attorney was given to him by plaintiff. He recovered certain sums for loss to plaintiff's building and furniture. He received from the company only £175 in respect of the furniture loss; the other amount, in respect of the building, was paid direct to the bond-holders' attorneys. Deponent had tendered £87 18s. 2d., being the balance due to plaintiff, after deducting his charge in accordance with the agreement. He was put to considerable trouble about the claim. The company disputed the claim on the ground of fraud. The agreement was that deponent was to be allowed in respect of his services 5 per cent. upon the amount paid by the company, in addition to his usual fees. From the correspondence appended to the affidavit, it appeared that the plaintiff objected to the defendant's charges as excessive, and that he had refused to accept the tender as a full discharge. Counsel also read an affidavit by Mr. C. Brady, defendant's attorney.

Dr. Greer submitted that the plaintiff was not suing upon an acknowledgment of debt. He contended that the whole amount of £175 must be treated, together, and that plaintiff could not sue piecemeal in this way. If there must be a debate of account, then it must be a debate of the whole account.

Mr. Burton submitted that plaintiff was entitled to judgment as claimed. The amount was admitted by defendant to be owing and plaintiff was entitled to apply for judgment for that amount, and to take such steps as he might choose afterwards as to the balance. Counsel was not aware of any reason why the claim should not be brought in this form.

Dr. Greer, in reply, submitted that plaintiff must elect to take his course in the first instance, and that he could not split up his claim in this way. There was no precedent for this application.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (June 25th).

Hopley, J: This is a case in which one Winfield is summoned for provisional sentence on an alleged acknowledgment of debt, on a balance of account for £87 odd. The summons, however, goes on further to summon him to show cause why he should not pay the sum of £63 19s. 4d., being a further balance due to the plaintiff, which defendant, it is said, wrongfully and unlawfully withholds, or alternatively, an account and debate. These sums appear to arise from a series of transactions which have arisen out of the fact that the defendant was employed by the plaintiff to recover certain sums of money from an insurance company. He recovered certain sums, and he made certain charges, and eventually he wrote a letter to the plaintiff, which is the liquid document relied upon in this case. In this letter defendant tenders to pay to the plaintiff the sum of £81 odd, on giving him a full discharge. It is now contended that the plaintiff can sue provisionally on this letter, and still retain the further right to go on with the summons for any other amount which he may say is due. I do not think that was the right course to pursue, and one that the Court could sanction. It seems to be a contradictory course for the plaintiff to adopt—in the first portion of the summons to say that he sued on this as an admitted balance of account, and then to say that it is only a portion of the balance of account on which he took judgment—and that he could go still further into the account, and say there was more due to him. This is not an out-and-out acknowledgment of debt; it is a conditional acknowledgment of debt. They ought to have elected to take one course; they cannot do both, and provisional sentence must be refused, with costs. Of course, such portion of the summons as relates to this claim for provisional sentence can stand as summons in the principal case, if plaintiff elects to go into the principal case.

PAARL BOARD OF EXECUTORS V. GINSBERG.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for provisional sentence on two mortgage bonds for £1,700, with interest, bonds having become due by reason of the non-payment of interest. Counsel also asked for judgment for £12 premium of insurance and for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable, and for rents due to be attached.

LEZARD V. DRUMMOND.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved, under Rule 330, for leave to sign judgment against the defendant for not proceeding with an action instituted by him against applicant for £1,500 damages for breach of faith.

Defendant appeared in person, and read an answering affidavit. He submitted that the application was out of order, because it was served upon him before the notice had expired. There had been negotiations for a settlement of the action, hence he had taken no further steps to file a fresh declaration after the original declaration had been thrown out.

Hopley, J.: It seems to me that this application must be acceded to. As long ago as November last a summons was issued, and thereafter in due course, I presume, a declaration was filed. Upon that, appearance was entered, and exception was taken to the declaration that it disclosed no cause of action. After argument, his Lordship the Chief Justice had held that there was no cause of action disclosed in the declaration. He, therefore, threw out the declaration, but, as a matter of indulgence, he gave leave to the plaintiff to amend the declaration if he could find facts, or he could find that he could say that he had a good cause of action on the declaration. I do not exactly know how the declaration would have been shaped, but, at all events, what I do know is that the Chief Justice, as a matter of indulgence, gave him time, without putting him upon special terms to amend his declaration. Under the rules of Court that means that he had 14 days from the date of the order to amend the declaration. The rule 334 (b) is very stringent, because it says, upon the expiration of such limited period as aforesaid, or of such 14 days the leave to amend shall become ipso facto void, unless the time is extended by a Court or a Judge. Now, after the expiration of the 14 days, had the plaintiff come with good cause shown, and told the Court why he had not filed within 14 days, on showing merits and good cause, the Court would undoubtedly, as was done in the case of Pfitzer v. Klette (6 E.D.C., 196), have allowed him further time. He has done nothing of the sort, and since the 17th February he has not taken a single step in the way of putting his pleadings right in this matter. He now comes, and says that that was due to the fact that he had been trying to negotiate a settlement not only in this case, but also in one against the defendant, Lezard's brother, which seems to have nothing to do with this case. I cannot look to that case nor say how it is shaped, but it is clearly denied by the attorneys for the present applicant that they on their side ever entertained anything in the way of proposals for a settlement, or gave the present respondent any cause for thinking that they would accede to any settlement in that matter. Their bill of costs was taxed, but those costs have not been paid to this day. Respondent seems to have gone up to them one or twice, and made proposals which they describe as audacious. I do not mind them describing the proposals as audacious, but I think it was wrong in the affidavit of the attorney to speak of the respondent as an habitually audacious man, and that that is a statement which ought not to have appeared on the affidavit. However, this affidavit is to the effect that such proposals were at least not entertained by them, and it seems to me that even to-day he does not show that he has shown good cause or some substantial way in which he could amend his declaration so as to have a good cause of action. It seems to me that Mr. Jones, in applying as he does to-day, will not debar him from prosecuting his action in the proper way. It seems to me that respondent has not done what he ought to have done within the time allowed by the rules of Court, and the application must be given against him, with costs.

Mr. Roux applied for a fresh direction in regard to this matter, which was a petition to have applicant's father declared insane and incapable of managing his affairs. Counsel said that a curator ad litem had been appointed, and the summons was returnable for that day, but, owing to the great cost of bringing witnesses from Tumbuland, where the parties lived, he asked leave to have the matter decided upon affidavit.

It was ordered that the matter be removed to the next Circuit Court at Cala, and that applicant be appointed curator bonis of the alleged lunatic, this order to be served upon the curator ad litem (Mr. De La Court).

ARNDT AND COHN V. DEUTCH-AUSTRALISCHES DAMP-
SCHIFFS GESELLSCHAFT. { 1906.
June 22nd.

This was an action to recover £44, in respect of damages caused to certain plate-glass, which the defendants undertook to deliver at Cape Town in the same good condition in which it was put aboard.

The declaration set out that the plaintiffs carried on business in partnership at Hamburg; the defendants traded in Cape Town through their agents, William Spilhaus and Co., who were sued in their capacity as agents for the defendants. On the 15th October there were shipped on board the S.S. Altona certain four cases of plate-glass in good order and condition, and the company agreed, in consideration of freight prepaid by the plaintiffs, to deliver the glass in like good order and condition. The S.S. Altona arrived in Cape Town on or about 14th November, 1906, and about the same day the cases were delivered to the plaintiffs' agents. One of the cases was not delivered in like good order and condition in which it was shipped and the contents were broken. By reason of the breach of contract plaintiff claimed £44.

The plea admitted the formal allegation, but denied that any damage was caused on board. When the cases were delivered the contents were not broken.

Mr. Uppington (with him Mr. Long) was for the plaintiffs, and Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. M. Bisset), was for the defendants.

Stephen Philt, managing clerk of Messrs. Govey and Co., who were acting for the plaintiffs in Hamburg, stated that in October one Jacobs, carrying on business in Cape Town, ordered a certain amount of plate-glass. Upon the arrival of the cases his firm received certain information from the Harbour Board, and in consequence of that went down to the Docks. The cases were stored at Jacob's store. Witness's firm, on information from Jacobs, communicated with Messrs. Spilhaus and Co., defendants' agents, and offered them inspection of the case. They were notified that the case was going to be opened.

Michael Wolfe, storeman at the shed where the vessel was berthed, said he remembered the discharging of the case in question. It was his duty to examine the case to say if there were any traces of damage. He had the case put on the "discrepancy list," because he noticed two of the corners were chipped and a bolt was missing in the centre. The case was carefully put on the Harbour Board lorry. Shortly afterwards Jacobs came down and examined the case.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: There was nothing in the landing to show that the glass was damaged. Very often the glass was in a good condition when the cases were chipped. He always tried to protect the Harbour Board in putting down slight damages.

Herbert George Reynolds, a clerk in the employ of the Harbour Board, said three of the four cases discharged from the Altona were marked damaged.

Alfred Ernest Jacobs, glass merchant, carrying on business at Cape Town, stated that in October, 1905, he gave an indent order on Govey and Co. for certain plate-glass from the plaintiffs. He examined the case, and found the batons chipped, and a bolt missing. He saw the damaged glass after it had been unpacked.

Frank William Freeman, shipping clerk to Wm. Spilhaus, recollected the cases being put on the wagon. The Harbour Board officials pointed out the damages, which were a missing bolt and chipped batons. There was no splintered place underneath the case. Witness refused to sign the discrepancy list as far as this case was concerned. Jacobs examined the case, and seemed quite satisfied with it. Witness knew nothing more until asked to sign the order, which he refused to do. Witness invariably accompanied consignments of glass to their destination. In this case, witness refused to have anything to do with this consignment, as the liability ceased at the ship's side. It was not correct to say that witness promised Jacobs to accompany the wagon. The side of the case could have been taken off at the Docks, and the contents examined. Some days after, witness received a message to go to Jacobs to examine the case, but he refused to do so, as Jacobs had taken the liability on himself by ordering the removal of the case from the ship's side. The case was eventually opened, and witness saw the broken glass, with which a mark on the case corresponded, and which was not there when the case left the Docks.

In cross-examination, witness said that once the plaintiff took possession of the case at the Docks the liability of the ship ceased. Witness was satisfied when the case was put on the trolley that there was no mark on the case. If there had been, it would have been pointed out to him by Jacobs or some of the Harbour Board officials.

Is the dent you speak about large?—I have not seen it.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Then how do you know you would have seen it at the Docks?—I was told where it was.

In further cross-examination, the witness said that after the receipt of the message to witness the opening of the case, he immediately repudiated all liability. Witness had no knowledge that the case was being taken to the store to convenience the inspection of the contents. It was the invariable practice, if the ship's agent consented, to send cases of plate-glass to the consignee's store to be examined. It could be examined at the Docks. Witness did not remember any cases of plate-glass going to Mr. Beardmore's store with a damaged receipt, unless he accompanied them.

I put it to you that, with your approval, this case was sent to Jacob's store to be examined?—No.

Witness (continuing) said that at the Docks he took up the position that the cases were examined, and that the ship's liability then ceased. Witness declined to accept the cases as damaged cases, and refused to sign the discrepancy.

In re-examination, witness said that many ships insisted on the cargo being inspected before it left the side of the ship.

Mr. Spilhaus stated he recollected receiving a letter from Jacobs stating that his representative had consented to the case being taken to the store. Witness mentioned the matter to the last witness, who denied doing so. Witness interviewed Mr. Govey on the matter, and Mr. Govey expressed himself satisfied with the result of the examination.

Thos. Hoban, stevedore, stated he superintended the discharging of the Altona. He recollected the case in question, and examined it in the hold. The bolt was missing, but in witness's opinion that did not cause any harm. The batons were slightly chipped. Witness did not see the dent in the case. If he had seen it he would not have moved it without permission. The case was put on a Harbour Board wagon. It paid witness to be careful in handling cargo, because on two occasions he had had to pay for oversights.

In cross-examination, witness admitted that the firm he worked for were engaged by Spilhaus and Co.

I see you "break" the cargo for them?—I do not break any cargo.

You know fully well the meaning of the term "break"?—I do not.

It is a term generally used amongst stevedores?—I have not heard it before.

Captain Burmester testified to inspecting the case on behalf of defendants when it was in Jacob's possession, and seeing the dent in the bottom of the case. In his opinion the case must have dropped on something blunt.

This concluded the evidence, and counsel were heard in argument on the facts.

De Villiers, C.J., said that in this case the plaintiff claimed damages against the defendant company for damage done to goods which were shipped from abroad. The damage consisted of the breakage of plate glass, which was said to have been in this case shipped in good order and condition. The bill of lading was executed at Antwerp, and contained the usual clauses. In his opinion the words shipped in good order only applied to the external portion of the case. This clause was taken as admitting that the package was shipped to all appearance in good condition, and the shipper should give prima facie evidence to that effect. In the present case no evidence has been given as to the internal condition of the contents of the case, but the plaintiff's counsel relied on the fact that in the declaration the cases were alleged to have been shipped in good order and condition. Now the question is, what was the meaning of those words in the declaration. Was it such that the defendant must be taken to admit that internally the goods were all right. It was clearly shown that the good order and condition referred to by the plaintiff in his plea was the good order and condition referred to in the bill of lading. If the plaintiff wished to aver that the plate-glass was shipped in good order and condition, then the defendant to win his case would have to prove that that was not so. It lay with the plaintiff to prove that the glass in the case was unbroken at the time it was handed into the possession of the defendant. He did not wish to found his judgment on that point, only as it was a technical point that should have been attended to in the drafting of the pleadings it had been clearly proved in the present case, that Jacob removed the case, and he was satisfied that Jacob in so doing acted as the agent of the plaintiff. The shipment of goods was really consigned to him, and as having chief interest acting on behalf of the plaintiffs he consented to the removal of the goods to his own store. He (his lordship) was not satisfied from his evidence that there was any arrangement with the defendant's agent, Freeman, that there should be a further examination. Jacobs might have been misled, because there was a general practice that the agents should visit such goods at the store of the consignee, and he might have assumed that Freeman would go to the store and examine the goods, but the Court is not satisfied that there was any arrangement for the removal of these goods, and, therefore, the removal of the case to the store throws on the plaintiff the burden of proving that this case had been injured before it left the ship's side. It is impossible to know everything that occurred to that case after it left the ship's side, but they had had the driver of the wagon and his evidence certainly was in favour of the view that the glass was injured after it reached the store. He was a most important witness, and one who had no interest in the case. According to his evidence, immediately after the case had been removed from the wagon it came with a jerk on to the ground. Unfortunately the Court has not sufficient evidence as to the height which it must have fallen, but it does not require a fall from a very great height to cause a serious injury to plate-glass. If the owners proved that the damage was done to the glass while it was in the ship's custody, then they would have grounds to proceed, but as that had not been proved there would be absolution from the instance, with costs.

FRYER V. WELCH.

Mr. Upington moved as a matter of urgency for an order interdicting the respondent, C. S. Welch, from holding an auction on the Grand Parade on Saturday morning.

The affidavit of Henry Francis Montague Fryer, the applicant, stated that in January last an agreement was entered into between him and the respondent, by which it was agreed that the respondent was to conduct auction sales on the parade for the partnership. In consequence of grave and continued breaches of duty, and misconduct, on the part of the respondent, applicant consulted his attorney, and placed the matter in his hands. An advertisement appeared in the "Cape Times," and applicant had been informed by customers of his firm that respondent intended holding an auction on the Parade on Saturday morning in his own name and for his own benefit, notwithstanding that the agreement had been cancelled, and as a result the business of the respondent's firm would be seriously injured.

A rule nisi was granted, calling on the respondent to show cause why he should not be restrained as prayed, with costs, returnable on Thursday next. The rule nisi to operate as a temporary interdict.

This was an action brought by Willem David Myburgh, of Prieska, against his wife, Mrs. Myburgh (born De Jager) for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce.

Plaintiff's declaration was in the following terms:

1. The plaintiff resides at Prieska and the defendant at Hope Town in this colony.
2. They were married to each other in community of property at Kimberley on April 24, 1902, and the marriage still subsists.
3. Prior to April, 1905, plaintiff lived with defendant at Hope Town.
4. On or about April 19, 1905, the plaintiff having no occupation, left Hope Town for De Aar in search of employment, and on about May 13, 1905, left De Aar for Prieska, where he succeeded in obtaining employment, and where he is earning sufficient to maintain the defendant, and although he has repeatedly asked defendant to come and live with him she has failed and neglected to do so.

Wherefore the plaintiff claims:

- (a) A decree of restitution of conjugal rights.
- (b) Failing compliance with which a decree dissolving the said marriage.
- (c) Forfeiture of all marriage benefits.
- (d) Alternative relief.
- (e) Costs of suit.

Mr. Pohl for plaintiff. Defendant in default.

Evidence having been given, A decree of restitution was granted, defendant to return to or receive the plaintiff on or before the 15th July, failing which, to show cause on the 1st August why a decree of divorce should not be granted, with costs, and why she should not be declared to have forfeited the benefits accruing from the marriage.

PHILLIPS, AUNE AND CO. { 1906.
V. WHEELER. { June 22nd.
 " 25th.
 " 26th.

This was an action brought by Phillips, Aune and Co., surveyors and engineers, Cape Town, against Thomas H. Wheeler, of Maitland, to recover two sums of £52 10s. and £200.

Plaintiffs, in their declaration, said that in December, 1904, they supplied to defendant, at his special instance and request, certain blue prints showing sections of the Maitland-Paarl-Wellington Divisional Council road, with properties abutting thereon between Salt River and Bellville (then known as D'Urban-road), for which they were entitled to charge £52 10s. In or about the beginning of February, 1906, the defendant entered into an agreement with the plaintiffs wherein they agreed to draft and prepare for the defendant certain plans and sections of the proposed tramway known as the Salt River-Bellville Tramway, and the defendant agreed to pay to the plaintiffs the sum of £200 for the said plans and sections, and the work and labour to be expended thereon. Defendant also undertook and promised to supply the plaintiffs with all information and data necessary to enable them to draft the said plans and sections. Thereafter, upon instructions from defendant, they set to work upon the said plans and sections, and the said plans and sections had been completed, except in so far as they did not show the tram line and certain limits of deviation, which they said could only be shown when the defendant supplied them with certain data and information. They had tendered, and again tendered, the said plans and sections, but defendant refused and neglected to pay the said sum. Plaintiffs claimed the sums of £52 10s. and £200, in respect of the said blue prints and plans and sections. Alternatively to the second portion of the claim, they said they were entitled to £200 as damages.

Defendant, in his plea, said that the plaintiffs prepared plans of the said road on behalf of the Divisional Council, by whom they were paid. Knowing that defendant was intending to promote a private Bill in Parliament for authority to lay a tram line on the said road, they offered him every assistance in their power, on condition that he would eventually give them the work of preparing Parliamentary plans for the private bill. Thereafter, during plaintiff's absence in Europe, he was lent the blue prints in question gratuitously by a clerk in plaintiffs' office in order that he might annex it to an application that he was making to the Divisional Council. He had only now received the said blue prints back from the Council, and he tendered them to the plaintiffs. As to the other part of the claim, he said that plaintiffs specially agreed to complete and deliver the said plans and sections in such a state and at such time as would enable him to deposit the same with the clerk of the House of Assembly on the last day of February in accordance with the rules of the House, and it was also agreed that he should pay £100 on delivery of the said plans and sections, £50 within thirty days thereof, and £50 upon the approval of the said plans by the Parliamentary examiner of plans for private bills. While denying that he undertook to supply any details or information, he said that he duly supplied all such information and data. He said that wrongfully and unlawfully, and in breach of agreement, plaintiffs failed to deliver the plans and sections within such time as was agreed. In re-convention defendant claimed £250 as damages by reason of having been delayed for a year in the promotion of the said Bill.

To this plaintiffs filed a replication denying the allegations of defendant and a plea in reconvention denying liability for the damages claimed.

Mr. Roux was for plaintiffs; Dr. Greer was for defendants.

H. van der Westhuisen, secretary of the Divisional Council, having been called.

William White Phillips (one of the plaintiffs) gave evidence as to the steps which he took in the preparation of plans of the tramway with a view to depositing them with the Clerk of the House of Assembly. He said that he was constantly delayed by reason of the failure of the defendant to supply him with the necessary information. Mr. Wheeler told him that he had an agreement with all the owners on each side of the projected tramway. Witness made a search at the Deeds Office. He turned up every diagram, and he found that in only one case had an arrangement been made, and that was in the Goodwood Estate. They had deducted a piece of ground to give him sufficient width, but no arrangement had been made in the case of the Kensington Estate, Boston township, and Edendale township, but if witness had laid down the limits of deviation he should have had to cut through small allotments. Witness wanted Mr. Wheeler to come to a decision one way or another as to the limits of deviation, but he never would. The time for depositing plans with the Clerk of the House of Assembly was the 28th February, and it was getting desperately near.

[Maasdorp, J.: This work has been done. This session of Parliament has been lost, but there is another session. What is supposed to be going on now as to the tramway?]

Mr. Roux: I am not instructed.

Dr. Greer: Perhaps I may say, my lord, that we tender to accept these plans, and pay for them, when completed, when they are satisfactory Parliamentary plans. As far as we are concerned, we are going on. On the pleadings, plaintiffs are not entitled to payment of any sum whatever until the plans have been delivered to the defendant in a condition proper for depositing with the Clerk of the House of Assembly. We are still prepared to take the plans.

Mr. Roux (to witness): You are prepared to complete the plans if you get the information?

Witness: Oh, certainly. Continuing his evidence, witness said that Wheeler and he afterwards went to the Divisional Council offices, but the secretary declined to let them look at the agreement, though he read out a few clauses. From the clauses read out, witness would not have had sufficient information to proceed. When the clause as to the Brooklyn line was read, Mr. Wheeler seemed to be disheartened, and said it was no use going on. The only information that witness now wanted in order to complete the plans was the blue prints showing the original position of the tramline and the line of deviation. With this information, witness thought that, working hard, they would be able to complete the plans in 12 hours. Witness was cross-examined at some length by Dr. Greer.

By the Court: Witness had not, until to-day, heard that the idea of acquiring rights over private property had been abandoned. He had understood all along that the width was to be 65 feet.

Einer Aune (a member of the plaintiff firm) said that he was one of the surveyors engaged on the survey of the Maitland-road to Bellville on behalf of the Divisional Council. He went to Europe later on, and on his return he found that Mr. Wheeler had obtained certain blue prints of the survey from their office. Witness asked Mr. Wheeler if he had made any arrangement about the prints. Wheeler said that he had not, but he (witness) must make the charge as low as possible. Had witness been at the office, he would not have let Mr. Wheeler have the plan unless he had first got the permission of the Divisional Council. In further evidence, witness said that Wheeler promised to supply them with the lines of deviation, but he did not do so. They were working outside, taking the levels for the plans, for about a fortnight. If Mr. Wheeler had supplied him with proper information, they would have had the plans ready in sufficient time for Parliament. Witness did not know even to-day what the contents of the agreement with the Divisional Council were.

Cross-examined: They had not entered the item of 50 guineas in their books, because the whole matter was irregular. He regarded it as a serious breach of etiquette that Wheeler should have been allowed to take away the blue prints before the consent of the Divisional Council had been obtained. At the same time witness considered that they were entitled to sell copies of the survey to whomsoever they thought fit. They could not put down the deviation, because they did not know upon which side of the road the crossings were to be laid. The plans produced were not sufficient for a Parliamentary Bill; there were still several features which should be included. Witness admitted that there were certain details which could have been filled in by his firm, as required by Parliament, and which had not been done. He was not aware that it had been arranged when they took the plans in hand that the line should go between the cemeteries. He meant that he was not certain whether the line was going round or between the cemeteries. Mr. Wheeler told them that his Parliamentary agents would not go on until he had got the agreement signed.

By the Court: Witness thought that the tram line would be about 4 ft. wide, and that the condition was that there should be 20 ft. of road on each side.

[Maasdorp, J.: The condition is that the tramway shall not be taken upon any road that is less than 65 ft. wide, and that where the road is not 65 ft. it must be widened.]

Henry Herbert Evans, civil engineer, said that he had surveyed the road in question for an opposition scheme. He was occupied upon the work for five months; they were working at high pressure. They did not quite finish the Parliamentary plans, as they were awaiting the Divisional Council's decision as to the width of the road. Their application to the Divisional Council was refused, as another scheme was, the Council said, already before them. He should think that by ordinary working the plaintiffs' plans could be taken from their present stage and completed for Parliamentary purposes in about two days. He estimated the value of the plans from £250 to £300. It was a necessary preliminary in the preparation of plans to have the consent of owners all along the line.

Thomas Roberts, Government land surveyor, valued the levelling of the plan, assuming it was the road and nothing very difficult in the running, at £3 a mile. Assuming all the information was to hand, it would require 20 guineas to make the plan, and £30 to get the further information for the owners' reference book and searches. If he had to survey and make a proper plan of the whole line, he would charge about £900.

Mr. Roux closed his case.

Thomas H. Wheeler, defendant, stated he had been engaged in large works before this undertaking. In 1903 he began work in connection with the tram line by making application to the Divisional Council for leave to lay lines over their road. A plan was sent in with the application. The Council deputed seven of the members to meet witness on the road. They considered it was necessary to have a survey of the whole road, and the plaintiffs were the successful tenderers. In 1905 he got a concession from the Divisional Council. In 1904 the plaintiffs made overtures to witness wanting him to bind himself to give them all the work. They offered to give witness every assistance. Witness would not bind himself, but said he would consider the matter. The blue from the copy of a plan was nothing; it was one of the little accommodations they got from offices. The Divisional Council ultimately said they would keep him on the main road, instead of the deviation round the back of the Jewish Cemetery. There was never a figure mentioned about the price of the plans. Mr. Phillips subsequently said in conversation about the blue that to charge for it must have been a mistake, and that he would speak to his partner.

By His Lordship: The plan of the road, which was a blue from the original held by the Divisional Council, had absolutely nothing to do with him. Pritchard's plan was absolutely correct, and witness could have gone on with that. That plan, however, although accepted by the Divisional Council, was not sufficient for Parliament. After spending a deal of money on the scheme, he submitted a plan to run round the back of the Jewish Cemetery. The Divisional Council, about March, 1905, decided to keep witness back on the main road. The road was all right until he reached the point between the cemeteries.

Theodore de Villiers, Government land surveyor, stated he had considerable experience in preparing plans. The plan drawn in this case by the plaintiffs was by no means a Parliamentary plan; it was purely a survey. Where the levels were taken, the line must run, so that the levels would be useless either to the left or the right of the road, if it was decided the line was to run there. To do everything in connection with the plan, he would ask for £1,000.

Vincent Alex. van der Byl, partner in the firm of Van der Byl and De Villiers, stated, if he had got the plans and the book of reference in time, he would have been able to put the Bill before Parliament. It was absolutely unnecessary to obtain the consent of the owners before lodging the Bill.

Dr. Greer closed his case.

Postea (June 26th).

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

Maasdorp, J.: The first claim of the plaintiffs in this case is for the payment of £52 10s., for the preparation of certain plans or blue prints by them, at the request of the defendant. It seems that these plans were made under the following circumstances: In December, 1904, the defendant intended to introduce a private Bill into Parliament for legislative powers to construct a tramway from Salt River to Bellville. It was the object of the defendant to lay this line as far as possible upon the public road under the jurisdiction of the Divisional Council. He set about getting arrangements made with the Divisional Council as to the terms upon which they would consent to the provisions proposed in the Bill, or the terms upon which they would abstain from raising any objection to the Bill. The difficulty at the time that stood in the way of the Divisional Council and the defendant was this: While the Divisional Council was perfectly willing that the tramway should be laid upon the public road, it appeared that in certain portions of the road there was not sufficient width for the purpose, and that provision would have to be made to widen the road, in order to grant the necessary facilities for laying the tramway. In due course the defendant, who was anxious to press his business, thought it advisable to lay plans before the Divisional Council, pointing out to them that the tramway could take a certain route at such portions of the road where the difficulties existed. He consequently went to the plaintiffs, who had been busy for some time in preparing the plans for the Divisional Council, and had surveyed the whole of that road, and who, therefore, had facilities to help him in the matter. They had promised that they would assist him so far as lay in their power with the information they then possessed, knowing that under the circumstances they would be able to grant the necessary assistance at a more reasonable rate than anyone else, who had to obtain the necessary information. In the absence of the plaintiffs, their clerk, in the ordinary course of his employment, supplied the defendant with a plan, or with blue prints, upon which he marked the route of the tramway, as proposed by the defendant. Armed with this document, the defendant proceeded to the office of the Divisional Council and laid before them a plan which he had formed for overcoming the difficulties as to the narrowness of the road. He no sooner commenced to state his wishes than he was informed that such a scheme as he proposed would be no longer necessary, because the Divisional Council had made up their minds to allow him to lay the line along the whole length of their road, with certain provisions as to certain spots where the necessary width could not be obtained. After that, these plans were no longer of any use to any of the parties. But it was quite clear, when they were prepared, the defendant thought that they were necessary, and would be useful, and whatever the result may have been, the plaintiffs must be paid for the work they did at his request, in the ordinary course of business. The defence set up is that the work was done gratuitously, that the plaintiffs had offered to assist him in the business which he was then carrying through. But there is nothing in the whole of the evidence given by the defendant himself which proved that the plaintiffs had undertaken to make this plan gratuitously for the defendant. And the defendant himself says no price was mentioned; it was the ordinary accommodation which parties granted one another. That may have been the impression he was under. The plaintiffs are supported by the circumstances that as soon as they discovered what work had been done by their clerk, they intimated to the plaintiff that they expected remuneration for the work, and a letter of demand was sent. There is no document put in on the part of the defendant repudiating the claim. Under the circumstances, I think the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed upon that part of the case, and it certainly appears upon the evidence that the charge is an extremely reasonable one, and if the defendant had obtained the same services from anyone else, the charge would have been an extremely heavy one. The second claim of the plaintiffs is for the preparation of work done in respect of certain plans required by the defendant, to be laid before Parliament when his private Bill was introduced. Upon that point, there is a special arrangement as to remuneration. The plaintiffs undertook that work for the payment of £200; £100 to be paid upon the delivery of the plans, £50 within thirty days, and £50 upon the approval of the plans by the Parliamentary examiners. It would appear, from all the circumstances which were in the contemplation of the parties that it was fully necessary that these plans should be lodged with the examiners before the end of February. Time was, therefore, the essence of the contract, and the work had to be performed before the 28th February. The question arises as to what it was exactly that was expected from the defendant in the preparation of their plans. We have the evidence of what I may call experts in the case as to what was absolutely necessary and considered sufficient by the examiners when these plans were laid before them. It is said that nothing more would be required than to lay down deviations upon a plan according to a certain scale, to mark the route of line, and to give the elevations. These are the main requirements, and I need not mention the minor ones. It is said, upon these requirements being observed, the plan would be considered. I am quite prepared to accept the position that, upon certain formalities being observed, and the plans being framed in a certain form, that the examiners would pass them as meeting the rules of Parliament. But it is quite clear that no one would dream of going to Parliament with plans which merely satisfied the necessary requirements of the rules as to formalities in the framing of that plan. They will consider the best form in which it would be likely to promote the passage of the Bill, and wisely, in this case, the defendant, before preparing his plan, consulted these parties who were interested in the matter, and who would have had a right to object in case their rights were interfered with in any way by the proposed construction of the tramway. The first body of men whom it was necessary to consult was in this case the Divisional Council. The defendant set about making the best arrangements he could with the Divisional Council as to the terms upon which they would be satisfied to sanction the construction of the work. These arrangements are embodied in a long agreement, and amongst the provisions contained in the agreement is the following: "The defendant is not to commence any operations on the said road unless and until he shall have secured so much land from the eastern boundary of the Maitland Municipality to the terminus at Bellville as would enable the Council at any time hereafter to widen the road inclusive of side walks to 65 ft." Here one of the conditions arranged is that the Municipality would consent to the terms of the Bill, which he intended to introduce into Parliament, and that the road should be throughout all its length—with the exception of some small portions of the width of 65 ft. In order to obtain the necessary width the next step the defendant took was to ascertain whether he could expropriate land for the required purpose from each of the owners along the road. He entered into communication with the owners to obtain consent in the same way as the consent of the Divisional Council. The plaintiffs were fully aware that they would have to lay down the lines of deviation in accordance with arrangements. It is quite true it is not necessary to obtain the consent of property owners before introducing the matter into Parliament, but there would be slight hopes of success if the defendant had gone to Parliament without consulting the Divisional Council, though his Bill might be formally correct. Judgment will be for the plaintiffs for £52 10s. for the blue prints, and £150 for work done upon this plan, with costs. It seems to me even at this stage it would be wise of the parties to proceed with their agreements, because on the one hand the plaintiffs would be entitled to the payment of another £50, tion of Act 25 of 1892. The opposing creditors, however, make a suggestion which under the circumstances seems to be reasonable, and that is before the goodwill of the company is sold a meeting of the creditors be held and the goodwill be sold on such terms as the majority of the creditors in number and value should decide. If there be no majority both in number and value, the liquidator himself may decide. As this modification is made at the suggestion of the opposing creditors, I think the costs may well come out of the estate.

MACREADY V. GIRDWOOD.

Medical attendant—Contract.

A person's ordinary medical attendant is not by the fact of previous attendances bound by an implied contract to continue his attendance in case of subsequent illness.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Kentani in an action in which the present appellant (William Brown Macready, trader, Kentani) sued the respondent, who is the District Surgeon, for damages in two sums of £50.

The matter was intimately connected with a recent libel action heard in this court, in which Dr. Girdwood obtained damages against a young man named Todd, who is employed by Mr. Macready at his store, for alleged defamation contained in a letter signed "An Onlooker," which had appeared in the "Transkeian Gazette." In that case, Macready was the principal witness for the defence.

The present appeal arose out of an action brought by Mr. Macready against Dr. Girdwood for £50 damages for breach of contract, in that defendant had, on February 1 last, refused to render medical services and assistance without just and reasonable cause, and £50 damages, in that defendant had wrongfully and unlawfully intimidated and coerced a certain native (Alfred Dubase) from dealing with plaintiff, whereby plaintiff had suffered loss of profits as a trader and had been injured in his business and reputation as a trader.

From the evidence given in the Court below it appeared that in the course of last year plaintiff saw Dr. Ward at Butterworth professionally, and when he came back defendant seemed annoyed. He said that he did not object to him (Macready) seeing another doctor if through him. On the 1st February defendant refused to attend plaintiff unless he took a solemn oath that he had nothing to do with a letter which had appeared in a paper at Butterworth, written by a young man in his (plaintiff's) employ. Plaintiff declined to take such an oath. He was ill for three days, and was not attended by Dr. Girdwood. The native Dubase was employed by Dr. Girdwood, and when called by plaintiff he said that he had not been coerced by defendant, although he admitted that he had previously sworn an affidavit in somewhat different terms.

The Magistrate gave judgment for the defendant, with costs, on both claims.

Mr. Benjamin for appellant. Mr. Burton for respondent.

Mr. Benjamin argued that there was an implied contract between plaintiff and defendant as to the latter's services, but he acknowledged that he could not carry the case any further.

Without hearing Mr. Burton, De Villiers, C. J.: If the plaintiff was seriously ill at the time he sent for the doctor it is certainly to be regretted that defendant did not attend the plaintiff. At the same time defendant had received very great provocation. A very serious libel had been published, apparently against the defendant, and plaintiff had told the defendant that it was one of his own household who had written that libel. Defendant had asked plaintiff to give him his assurance that he had not aided and abetted the writer, which assurance plaintiff had refused to give. Upon that the defendant gave his whole position in writing, which was as follows: "You asked me this afternoon to define my position in writing. I do so now. As the writer of the defamatory libel is a member of your family and lives under your roof, I require your assurance in writing, on your word of honour as a gentleman, that you neither aided nor abetted him throughout the whole of the proceedings. On receipt of this assurance, I am prepared once more to open up medical relations with you personally. As for Mrs. Macready, I have already intimated my willingness to treat her as before, provided you do not make this impossible." The question is, is this a breach of contract? To construe it as a breach, there must be clear proof of contract. To my mind, there is no clear proof of contract, either express or implied. It was open to the plaintiff to employ the services of another doctor, and it was open to the defendant, if his humanity would allow him, to refuse to attend the plaintiff when he was ill. There was no legal obligation upon him to attend, whatever the moral obligation might have been. Therefore, I am satisfied that the Magistrate was quite correct upon the first part of the case. As to the second part of the case, I do not see what possible case the plaintiff could have had. It is said that defendant had induced Dubase (his servant) not to deal with plaintiff at his store. I won't go into the question now as to whether the Magistrate rightly construed the law on the matter. Assuming that this was actionable on the part of the defendant, there was no clear proof whatever of damages sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the defendant telling his servant not to deal with plaintiff. We have no evidence as to what the custom was before, or what it was afterwards, not a tittle of evidence as to damages. Therefore, the Magistrate was right in dismissing the case altogether. The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

BOTHA V. NAUDE.

Ord. 6 of 1843, Sec. 126.

The 126th Sec. of Ord. 6 of 1843 refers to the confirmation of the first account in an insolvent's estate.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Assistant Resident Magistrate of Aliwal North, sitting at Lady Grey, in an action brought by the appellant against the respondent to recover £22 10s., reduced to £20, so as to bring the matter within jurisdiction, as damages for breach of agreement in connection with the alleged failure of defendant to deliver to plaintiff in February last certain fifty lambs, which he had sold to plaintiff in August last.

In the Court below, exception was taken to the summons on the ground that plaintiff had no locus standi in judicio, being an unrehabilitated insolvent, without leave to trade. The exception was upheld, with costs, by the Magistrate, who founded his decision on the 49th section of the Insolvent Ordinance, and who added that, from the 71st section, it seemed to him that the plaintiff must have written authority from the trustee. The Magistrate also quoted the case of Brown and Another v. Green (8 Juta, 193).

Mr. Upington was for appellant; Mr. W. Porter Buchanan was for respondent.

Mr. Upington submitted that the Magistrate had overlooked a very important section of the Ordinance, viz., 126, by which plaintiff was clearly entitled to sue, seeing that the first account and plan of distribution in his estate had been confirmed by order of the Supreme Court.

Mr. Buchanan said he was bound to admit that the Magistrate had gone wrong in this case, but it was upon a point which was by no means clear from the authorities.

De Villiers, C. J.: It is quite clear in this case that the Magistrate overlooked the clear and express terms of the 126th section of the Ordinance, which says that from and after the making of a decree, and confirming the account and plan of distribution, the insolvent shall be entitled to acquire property, and in the case that was cited, the Court has held that the confirmation of the first account is such a confirmation of account as was contemplated by the 126th section. Counsel for the respondent has called the attention of the Court to the head-note in the case of Warner's Assignees v. Warner's Trustees (4 Juta, 227), where it speaks of the "final account," but there is nothing I can find in the facts, as stated in the report, or in the judgment, which justified the use of the word "final." It might be as well to call attention specially to this mistake in the head-note, as it might possibly have misled the Magistrate in the Court below, and might mislead others. The appeal must be allowed, with costs in this Court and the Court below, and the case remitted back to the Magistrate to be tried on the merits.

Mr. Buchanan urged that the costs in the Court below should be ordered to abide the result of the trial.

De Villiers, C. J.: I do not think the Court should encourage the taking of such an exception, which was wholly untenable. The appeal will be allowed, with costs in this Court and the Court below, except costs of summons and service thereof, and the case remitted to the Magistrate to be tried on the merits.

Hopley, J concurred.

JANSEN V. FOURIE.

Ejectment—Magistrate's jurisdiction—Act 20 of 1856, Sec. 10.

Sec. 10 of Act 20 of 1856 gives a Magistrate no jurisdiction to try an action for ejectment brought at the suit of a trustee in an insolvent estate.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Assistant Resident Magistrate of Graaff-Reinet in an action for ejectment brought by the present appellant (Roelof Andries Jansen) against respondent (Christian W. F. Fourie), in respect of a certain piece of land situate at Adendorp.

It appeared that plaintiff is sole trustee in respondent's insolvent estate, and as such trustee some time ago sold to one Tilbrook certain landed property. He said that this property carried with it a right of use and occupation of certain adjoining property, which respondent was now occupying, and which he refused to vacate. He desired to secure for Mr. Tilbrook the right of occupation of the property that Fourie refused to vacate.

In the Court below exception was taken to the summons on several grounds, and the Magistrate held that under section 10, Act 20 of 1856, he had no jurisdiction to try the case, and therefore upheld the second exception which had been taken by defendant to this effect.

Mr. M. Bisset was for appellant; Mr. Benjamin was for respondent.

Mr. Bisset submitted that the Magistrate's decision was wrong. What the appellant claimed in the Court below was an ejectment order against the defendant from the use and occupation of the land. He did not claim any right or title to the land.

Mr. Benjamin submitted that the only section that could possibly apply to the matter was the 10th section, and the only person, therefore, who could have sued was the owner of the land, and not the trustee. The great difficulty in this case was to know what the claim was about. Clearly, it was a very vague occupation right that plaintiff was seeking to establish.

De Villiers, C.J.: This is an action for ejectment brought into the Magistrate's Court. Several exceptions to the jurisdiction were taken. It is only necessary now, for the purposes of the appeal, to consider the second exception—that the Court has no jurisdiction under the 10th section of Act 20 of 1856. That section mentions the cases in which an action of ejectment can be brought against an occupier of land "at the suit of any person (or his lawful attorney, administrator, or executor), under whom such occupier has holden or has occupied the same in virtue of any lease, contract, or agreement." There is no proof in this case, no allegation, of lease. It is said that the plaintiff is the lawful attorney, administrator, or executor of the purchaser of this property. Even if he were, it would not bring the case within this section. In point of fact, there is no evidence whatever that the plaintiff is the lawful attorney, administrator, or executor of the person in whose name the land now stands registered. Another case in which an action of ejectment may be brought is "at the suit of any person (or his lawful attorney, administrator, or executor) whose name is en-registered in the Land Registry of the Colony, as the proprietor of any such lands, tenements or premises, against the tenant or occupier thereof." Well, the plaintiff is not registered in the Land Registry as the proprietor. The land has been sold; it has gone entirely from the plaintiff, and, further, he cannot sue under this section. The next case is "at the suit of any tenant (or his lawful attorney, administrator, or executor) holding a subsisting written lease of such lands, tenements, or premises, under the person whose name is enregistered in the Land Registry of the Colony as the proprietor thereof, against any occupier of such lands, tenements, or premises, whose right or alleged right of occupation is not derived from the person whose name is enregistered as aforesaid as the proprietor thereof." There is no case of tenancy here; the trustee has no tenancy at all. "Provided always that the title to the ownership of any of the lands, tenements, or premises aforesaid shall not in any such action be in question, but only the right of occupation." It is clear that the case does not fall within the 10th section, and, as far as I can judge, there is really a title to land in dispute, but it is not necessary to go into that. This is not one of those cases of ejectment which are provided for under the 10th section, and, therefore, exception to the jurisdiction was properly taken. The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN
and the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

MCDONALD V. AFRICAN { 1906.
BANKING CORPORATION. } June 25th.

Bill of exchange—Bank—Sale of goods—Negligence.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of East London in an action brought by the present respondents against the appellant to recover £24 2s. 11d. on certain bills of exchange.

From the record, it appeared that in the Court below appellant was sued for £13 6s. 11d. on a bill of exchange, dated July 13, 1903, drawn by Carson and Evans on McDonald and Co., and payable on 6th September, with interest and 17s. 6d. noting expenses, and for £9 1s., balance of account on a second bill of exchange for £64 3s. 3d. between the same parties, with interest and 17s. 6d. noting expenses. Defendant denied liability, and for a counter-claim said that the goods in respect of which the bills were accepted arrived at East London in or about August, 1903. In pursuance of plaintiff's request, in August he gave written authority to them to clear and dispose of the goods, to satisfy the amount of the bills. The bank took possession of the goods, but instead of selling them forthwith, as was the custom, they unlawfully and negligently kept the said goods for some months, and then sold them too late for the goods to realise the amount of the bills, to the prejudice of plaintiff in reconvention. He therefore claimed £24 2s. 11d. as damages. The goods in question were aerated waters, stationery, and lard, and defendant at the time was engaged at Stutterheim.

The Magistrate, in his reason for judgment, said that the transaction in this case was one of documents against payment and not of documents against acceptance as alleged by defendant. He was satisfied that defendant was unable to meet the bills at the due date, and that he did not then concern himself about the goods, and he made no such arrangement with the bank as alleged. The bank seemed to have acted with perfect bona fides throughout. Defendant having accepted the bills, was liable for any deficiency there might be. Judgment would be given for plaintiff as prayed, with costs, and the claim in reconvention would, therefore, fall to the ground.

Mr. Burton was for appellant (Duncan McDonald); Mr. Benjamin was for respondents (the African Banking Corporation, East London Branch).

Mr. Burton argued that the fact that Newman, an auctioneer, had instructions on August 31 to sell the goods was corroboration of the case set up by defendant. It was clear that Newman was the bank's agent. There was no explanation given in the Court below why the goods were not sold at once. Counsel commented on the fact that on the documents there was not a single communication between the parties from September, 1903, to March, 1906. The bank knew full well when the goods arrived that defendant's account was largely overdrawn. In March, 1904, Newman sold the goods by auction and then they realised a substantial sum less than their value on the bill of lading, viz., £24 0s. 11d. Then the bank communicated with the drawers, and accepted from them £34 1s. 4d. in full settlement of drawers' liability. The history of the case showed that defendant's version was the more probable one. It was singular that plaintiffs did not produce the instructions they gave to Newman their agent at the end of August, 1903.

The Court pointed out that in the copy of the record before them Newman was stated to have said he received instructions on the 31st December.

Mr. Burton said that his copy said the 31st August, but even then the bank had not produced their instructions to Newman.

Mr. Benjamin submitted that the position taken up by the bank was the strictly legal one. There was no evidence of negligence on the part of the bank in regard to selling the goods. There was no proof of damages whatever. Furthermore, the bank had no authority in this case to sell. McDonald had actually been trying to sell the goods previously, but had failed. The only persons who could have disposed of the goods were the drawers. Mr. Burton having been heard in reply, Buchanan, J.: Messrs Carson and Evans of London drew upon the defendant two bills of exchange for £64 3s. 3d. and £13 6s. 11d. These bills were sent to the respondent bank at East London together with the "shipping documents" i. e. bills of lading made "to order" and other documents necessary to obtain possession of the goods. The bills of exchange were presented to the defendant who accepted them. He was unable on the due date to pay the amounts and, consequently, the shipping documents were not given up. At his request, however, the goods were cleared by Messrs Newman and Company and placed in their store. Defendant continuing to be unable to pay the bills of exchange, instructions were given to Newman's, as far as one can gather from the evidence, both by defendant and the bank, to try to dispose of the goods so as to liquidate the bills of exchange. Newman says that attempts were made to sell them with defendant's knowledge and upon his instructions. A sale could not be effected until some time afterwards, not in fact until Newman received positive instructions to sell the goods and then they were sold by public auction. A sum of £24 was received for the goods and £31 was received from Carson and Evans. These two amounts left £9 1s. still due on the first bill of exchange. The second bill is still unpaid and there is an item of 17s. 6d. for noting of protest. The total amount of £24 2s. 11d. was sued for in the Magistrate's Court.

To the plaintiff's claim the defendant pleaded a denial of liability, but all through the evidence there is nothing whatever to show that the defendant is not liable on these bills. There is no defence of any kind set up against the claim and against the credits given to him, and judgment certainly ought to have been given against the defendant given on the claim in convention. But the defendant sets up a claim in reconvention for an equal amount to that due to the bank on the bills of exchange for damages alleged to be suffered on account of the negligence of the bank, in not effecting earlier sales. The Magistrate has found that there was no negligence on the part of the bank, and the evidence given in the Court below amply supports this finding of the Magistrate. It was always open to the defendant at the time, when he thought the bank was negligent to have paid the bills of exchange and received possession of the goods and to have sold them, but he was unable to do so. The agent he appointed to sell the goods tried to do so, but without success. The only question in dispute is as to whether on this claim in reconvention the defendant has succeeded in making out a substantial claim against the bank. He has failed to do so and I think the Magistrate was quite right in the judgment which he gave. The appeal, I think, is unfounded, and must be dismissed with costs.

HILTON V. HAMILTON.

Magistrate's Court case—Default—Bona fide mistake as to time of Court sitting—Costs.

Where, owing to a bona fide mistake as to the time of the sitting of the Court a plaintiff makes default, he should be allowed to re-open the case on payment of wasted costs.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Cape Town in an interpleader action brought by the present appellant against the respondent.

From the Record it appeared that the interpleader arose out of an action between Hamilton and Beesley and Co. Owing to a misunderstanding on the part of the present appellant, Hilton as to the time when the Magistrate's Court sat when the interpleader action was called on, appellant was not in Court. The case was called at 10 o'clock, and he did not appear until half past ten. The Magistrate gave judgment against him by default. The appellant then instituted a second action on the ground that this judgment by default was merely absolute from the instance.

The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, said that the summons was dismissed with costs. The Court held that the plea of res judicata had been established. The case was set down after the summons at applicant's request, and he made default. The A.R.M. then dismissed the summons, and declared the property claimed by him to be executable.

Mr. Benjamin was for appellant (Alfred Hilton); there was no appearance for respondent (James G. Hamilton).

Mr. Benjamin, having briefly addressed the Court in support of the appeal, Buchanan, J.: Through some mistake as to the time of the sitting of the Court, appellant was not present at the time judgment was given. He was there shortly after, and this, I think, was a very good reason for re-opening the case. It was not wilful default or negligence. When he was prepared to re-open the case, he ought certainly to have been allowed to do so on paying costs. The case will be referred back to the Magistrate for hearing on the merits, subject, of course, to the payment of the costs. The appeal will be allowed, with costs, costs in the Magistrate's Court to abide result.

REX V. NQUINI.

Municipal regulations—Ultravires—Act 45 of 1882.

The Municipality of K. had framed a regulation under Act 45 of 1882, whereby every person having grazing rights on the commonage was bound to register such stock as he had there grazing and to make a "solemn declaration" that such stock was his bona fide property.

Held, that inasmuch as the Act gave no power to the Municipality to exact such declaration, the regulation was ultra vires, and the Municipality was ordered to pay costs of appeal.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of King William's Town, sitting at Keiskama Hoek, who had convicted appellant of infringing the Municipal regulations by failing to register by solemn declaration stock on the Commonage, and had fined him 5s.

From the record it appeared that regulation 6 framed by the Keiskama Hoek Municipal Council, under Act 45 of 1882, and gazetted on September 22, 1905, provides for the registration at the Council offices on certain dates of the number of stock for which any person shall have grazing rights on the Commonage, and the owner of such stock shall make a solemn declaration that the stock in his bona fide property. Appellant, Tom Ngini, who is a Government paid headman, was charged with failing to comply with this regulation between the 1st and 21st March. Exception was taken in the Court below that the regulation was ultra vires, and that accused had clear rights by prescription.

The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, said that he did not think the regulation was ultra vires. As regarded prescription, it would be seen that the accused did not have the free and uninterrupted use of the Commonage for more than thirty years. He found accused guilty.

Mr. Benjamin was for appellant; Mr. Upington was for respondent.

Mr. Benjamin submitted that the regulation was unreasonable, and, therefore, ultra vires. The Council already had the records of the stock kept by these people, and it seemed to be a work of supererogation to compel them to come and make a solemn declaration at certain periods. The Council, he submitted, had no power to impose this restriction as to bona fide property. There was no evidence further that defendant had any stock. Counsel also submitted that defendant had a right by prescription. It was highly unreasonable, he contended, to restrict a man's rights of grazing to his own bona fide property.

Mr. Upington, dealing with the question of prescription, said that inasmuch as Keiskama Hoek, before being created a municipality, was in 1881 constituted a Village Management Board, and regulations were thereafter framed which did control and regulate the grazing rights of people, it could by no means be said that appellant had had an undisputed right of grazing his cattle upon the commonage. As to the question of whether the regulation was ultra vires, counsel submitted that the regulation was a perfectly reasonable one. It was a reasonable provision such as it was contemplated the municipality could make under sub-section 23, section 109, Act 45 of 1882. The regulation provided not merely that defendant should register, but that he must also make a solemn declaration, thus imposing two duties upon an inhabitant grazing his stock on the commonage. He contended that the regulation was divisible, and that, even if the second part was ultra vires, the Court may hold that the first portion was intra vires. The Court was not bound to throw out the whole of the regulation: if only a part was ultra vires.

Buchanan, J.: The appellant was prosecuted in the Magistrate's Court held at Keiskama Hoek for contravening Section 6 of the Regulations of the Municipality of Keiskama Hoek.

These regulations provide that every registered owner or occupier of land shall have certain grazing rights over Municipal commonage and the number of cattle which may be grazed by such owner or occupier is fixed by the third regulation. The fifth regulation reads:

"It shall not be lawful for any person having grazing rights to sell, let, or otherwise dispose of such rights to any person whatsoever." Then comes the regulation in question (the sixth): "On the first day of March and September in each year each person shall register at the Council office the number of stock for which he shall have grazing rights on the Commonage and shall make a solemn declaration that the stock is his bona fide property, etc."

The accused is charged with failing to register "the number of stock for which he shall have grazing rights on the commonage, by solemn declaration that the stock is his bona fide property." To this charge the accused pleaded, firstly, that the regulation, as it stands, is ultra vires, and, secondly, that he has a prescriptive right of grazing over the commonage. I may as well dispose of the defence of prescription at once by saying that if he has a prescriptive right he has not properly raised it in the pleadings, and, moreover, such a right has not been proved, and, consequently, this second defence need not be further taken into consideration. The objection to the regulation as to its being ultra vires is one which, I think, should be held good. The Municipality has the right, under the general Municipal Act, No. 45 of 1882, to provide for the management and protection of all common pasture or municipal lands, and to fix the number and description of the live-stock any inhabitants shall be allowed to keep thereon. But nowhere in that Act or elsewhere is any power given to any municipality by regulation to require a solemn declaration from any person as to the quantity of stock which he has, or on any other fact. Now, a solemn declaration has acquired to some extent a technical meaning in the different statutes of this Colony, especially by Act 18 of 1891 and by the previous Act of 1883. Solemn declarations are allowed now to be substituted where the law previously required an oath to be taken, and it is clear that in this sense a solemn declaration can only be made in the cases provided for by law, where there is a judicial proceeding either before a Court or arbitrators, or under the Insolvent Ordinance, or some inquiry of that kind, and in proof of certain allegations which are required by law to be made, such as declaration of purchase and sale, wills, etc. This solemn declaration takes the place of the oath previously required, and any person guilty of making such a solemn declaration falsely is liable to be prosecuted for perjury: but no person could be prosecuted for making a false solemn declaration such as is required by this regulation. I think it unreasonable also for a municipality, after fixing the number of stock which each owner or occupier of land is entitled to graze upon the commonage to say that he shall make a solemn declaration that his stock is his bona fide property. There are many reasons why this is unreasonable, which I need not go into now. I think the charge against the accused is not merely that he failed to register his stock, but that he failed to register by making a solemn declaration. The Town Clerk in this evidence said, "The offence against the accused is now—registration of stock as per charge sheet." It is clear that the not making a solemn declaration is part of the charge laid against the accused, and I think under all principles of law he ought not to be required to make this solemn declaration in this manner, and that the bye-law, in requiring this solemn declaration to be made, is ultra vires of the municipality of Keiskama Hoek. The conviction will be quashed, and it is only fair that the municipality should pay the costs. The appeal will be allowed, with costs of appeal against the municipality.

Will—Construction—"Heirs."

This was an application for leave to petitioner (who is executor) to transfer certain landed property at Makobeni, Lady Grey, to himself, as the sole heir under the will of his parents. Mr. Benjamin was for petitioner; Mr. Douglas Buchanan appeared as curator ad litem to certain minors.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts.

Cur. Adu. Vult.

Postea (July 9th).

Buchanan, J.: The testators bequeathed their farm to their three sons, Stephen, Isaac, and Enoch, "their heirs and assigns." They then gave certain movable property to their daughters. They instituted as residuary heirs their sons and daughters and their respective heirs, administrators, and assigns for their absolute benefit as tenants in common. They prohibited any of their sons from leasing or otherwise disposing of his share in the farm without previously obtaining the consent in writing of his brothers, "or in case of the death of one or both of them the legal representative of such deceased son or sons," according to the law of succession, as settled by the

Glen Grey Act. Two of the sons, Isaac and Enoch, predeceased the testators, leaving issue. The survivor, Stephen, now claimed to be sole legatee of the farm, to the exclusion of the issue of his brothers. The true test for construing a will is the intention of the testator, but such intention must be gathered from the will itself, and the language used must be construed in its ordinary meaning, unless other parts of the will clearly show that a different meaning is to be followed. The construction which our law, placed on the institution of a person and his heirs is that it is a grant to the legatee personally, and that the words "his heirs" may be treated as surplusage, or as words of description. It is contended in this case, however, that the testators intended their will to provide for all their descendants, and by using the words "their heirs and assigns" they intended that the provision for the predeceased sons should pass over to their children. In some cases the institution of children has been held to be wide enough to include grandchildren. But if the word sons in this case is to be read as including grandsons, then only one of the predeceased sons left male descendants, and the claims of the female descendants would be rejected, which would be equally opposed to the argument founded on natural equity as would be rejecting the claims of all the grandchildren. The question really is, can the addition of the words "their heirs and assigns" be read, not as words of institution, but as words of substitution. After consideration of the various decisions of the Court, I am unable to come to that conclusion. Nor do I think the clause restraining alienation aids the minors. That clause only comes into operation after the beneficiaries have come into possession of the bequest. The residuary clause also does not affect the bequest unless there has been a lapse. But in this case it cannot be said that there is a failure under the will. The bequest is of the whole farm to the three sons specifically named. It is not a bequest in equal shares or as joint owners of undivided shares. The farm is bequeathed as a whole, and, if any one of the intended legatees fail, the bequest still operates, and the remainder take by virtue of the jus accrescendi. There is nothing else in the will to indicate the intention of the testators, and, failing any other expression qualifying their meaning, the Court must take the words used by the testators in their ordinary acceptation. Possibly the testators did not at the time of making their will consider the contingency of the predecease of any of their sons, but whether they did or not they made no provision for such an event. The words used by them would not ordinarily confer any estate on the grandchildren, they cannot now be construed as amounting to a substituted institution of the grandchildren in the event of a predecease of any of the sons. The applicant is, therefore, entitled to an order authorising the transfer to himself of the whole farm. The costs will come out of the estate.

Leave was granted to petitioner to resign as prayed, and, subject to such resignation, the rule granted on the application of Mr. Hilton was made absolute, and the remaining trustee was authorised to administer the estate.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

BONN V. WATSON. { 1906.
 { June 26th.

Pleading — Architect — Artistic decorations.

This was an action brought by Adalbert Louis Mouni Bonn, architect, Cape Town, against Herbert Gordon Watson, of Kenilworth, to recover the balance of charges for professional services.

Plaintiff, in his declaration, said that in or about August, 1904, defendant engaged his services as architect in connection with the building of certain premises at Kenilworth, and plaintiff thereafter duly performed all such labour and professional duties as he was bound to do in connection with the said building. There had become due to him £143 16s. 6d., as shown in the account annexed to the declaration. Defendant had paid £20, but he neglected and refused to pay the balance, viz., £123 16s. 6d., which amount plaintiff claimed, with interest and costs.

Defendant, in his plea, denied that the account annexed to the declaration was an accurate account, or correctly framed, and more particularly disputed the items of £5 5s., tracings and builders' schedules in duplicate prepared for the Wynberg Council; and £23 2s. 9d., for supervision. Defendant, at the time of the said engagement, agreed to pay the plaintiff, in respect of the said services referred to, the customary and usual remuneration of an architect, according to the custom of architects in Cape Town, and no more. By the custom in Cape Town, the remuneration in respect of such services as aforesaid, including the furnishing of quantities and schedules, was 7½ per cent. on the cost of the said building, viz., £1,542, and there thus became due as such remuneration £115 8s. 9d., and no more. Whereof he had paid £20, and before issue of summons had tendered, and again tendered, the balance of £95 8s. 9d.

Plaintiff, in his replication, admitted the tender, but said that the same was wholly inadequate, and he admitted payment of £20, as stated in the declaration. As to paragraph 2 of the plea, he said that the item of £5 5s. was a fair, usual, and proper charge, and that the item of £23 2s. 9d. represented a fair remuneration for certain special and detailed work of supervision performed by the plaintiff outside the ordinary routine of his duties at the special instance and request of the defendant.

Mr. Burton (with him Mr. Lewis) was for plaintiff; Mr. Uppington was for defendant.

Mr. Burton said that the plaintiff had given notice to the defendant of an amendment of the replication to add after "supervision" the words, "as well as certain extra work."

Mr. Uppington opposed the proposed amendment, and contended that it raised a fresh cause of action.

After hearing counsel on certain facts.

Hopley, J.: The only application before me is one by Mr. Burton to amend the replication by adding after "supervision" the words, "as well as certain extra work." That seems to me to be opening up a cause of action in the replication, which is not fairly imported in the declaration, and, as such, it seems to me to be an application to allow an irregularity in pleading, which I do not know that this Court has yet allowed, and I do not think that this application ought to be acceded to.

If, at a later stage, application is made to me to amend the declaration so as to give the real cause of dispute between the parties, I might, or might not, allow it at that stage, but at present the application being for amendment of replication, I must refuse it.

Mr. Burton said that he was placed in an awkward position, as he did not know whether he would be entitled to lead evidence bearing on one of the principal causes of dispute. He might, perhaps, state what the "extra work" was. Plaintiff, in addition to being an architect, was also an artist. The parties had been great friends, but their friendship had been broken. Defendant, who was very anxious to have a pretty house, asked the plaintiff to specially design for him certain stained glass windows, which was done. He also specially designed paintings, ingle-nooks, panels, etc.

Mr. Upington said that he had no objection to the real points in dispute coming before the Court, but if any substantial change was made in the pleadings there might be some prejudice to his client.

[Hopley, J.: If plaintiff can frame a proper amendment to his declaration, he may do so. Defendant will have the power to frame a paragraph in his plea in order to meet that. If it is only a matter of whether his paintings are worth £23, and whether he should charge the sum of £5 5s., it seems a pity to have this lawsuit. However, I cannot tell people to be sensible, and go to arbitration about these little things.]

The Court was eventually adjourned for a quarter of an hour to enable the declaration to be amended, in accordance with the wishes of the plaintiff.

On the resumption of the Court, Mr. Burton handed in an amendment of the declaration, so as to bring the whole of the points in dispute before the Court.

Evidence was given by the plaintiff and Wm. Hawke, architect, of the firm of Hawke and McKinlay, and Mr. Burton closed his case.

Mr. Upington called Frederick Cherry, architect, and Charles Henry Smith, architect, and closed his case.

At the conclusion of the evidence, a point was raised as to the value of the landscape painting in three panels over the mantelpiece of defendant's house, executed by the plaintiff.

Mr. Upington said that, owing to the alteration of the pleadings, he was not prepared to lead evidence on the question of the value of the painting. He would suggest that that part of the case should be referred to somebody, to be agreed upon between the parties, to assess what would be a fair remuneration. That amount so assessed, his client would be prepared to pay. The only other course that he could suggest was that he should now apply for a postponement of the case to enable defendant to obtain expert witnesses, who would have to go out for the purpose of examining the work.

[Hopley, J.: All I can say to the parties is that probably that would make it a very expensive picture one way or another. The difficulty would be to know your expert. How do I know who is a recognised arbiter in fine arts here?]

After further argument by counsel,

Hopley, J., suggested that, in order to make an end of this matter, 10 or 12 guineas would be a fair price to pay. He did not say that that was a fair value of the work done by plaintiff, but it might be the basis of a compromise.

Mr. Burton, after consulting his client, said that he thought the plaintiff would not object to the sum of ten guineas. He added that the plaintiff said he had been put to considerable pains, and that the painting was worth the money put down for it.

Mr. Upington said that his client would be prepared to pay 10 guineas for the painting.

Counsel having been heard on the other branches of the case,

Hopley, J.: A case like this makes one feel how very frequently people allow their tempers to run away with them and bring cases into court which ought never to be heard of anywhere near the precincts of the court. This is peculiarly a case of that sort where plaintiff and defendant started as very good friends; apparently, from the correspondence, they were constantly together, and entered into a contract for work which was to give one of them a nice artistic little house, and was possibly one of the stepping-stones to fame for the other. Yet here are these two people, who up to a certain point carry on amicably, thrown entirely off their balance of common-sense—I don't say both of them, but, at all events, one of them—and behaving in such a way as to make ultimate recourse to a law court almost the only way of settling their difficulties. Well, I am not here to preach morality or common-sense or anything else, but at the same time I must look to the conduct of the parties when I come to that portion of the case which has to deal with the costs of this action. After all, the whole thing before me is as to whether two small sums of £23 odd and £5 5s., altogether about £28, claimed by the plaintiff, should be allowed or not. I cannot help remembering, in regard to this that a very reasonable proposal was made by the attorneys of the defendant—that as this small sum of less than £30 was in dispute between the parties, they should refer it to some practical man to see whether it was owing or not. The answer of the plain-

Defendant, in an amended plea, said that the moneys due from defendant to plaintiff in respect of the said wages up to and including the 10th December, 1904, were duly paid to the plaintiff. On or about the 10th December, 1904, in consideration of the payment of £50 by the plaintiff, the defendant admitted the plaintiff as a partner in his bakery business. The said partnership was terminated by mutual consent, on or about the 14th January, 1905. Thereafter, accounts were debated and settled between the parties, and plaintiff had received from the said estate all that he was legally entitled to under the said partnership. On the 14th January, 1905, the defendant again engaged the plaintiff to assist him in the said business at a weekly wage of £4 5s. Plaintiff remained in the defendant's employ as aforesaid until the 14th March, 1905, and duly received from defendant the whole amount of wages due to him in respect of the said period of service. Defendant admitted that he had refused to pay the sum claimed by defendant, and said that, by reason of the premises, he was under no liability to the plaintiff in respect of the said sum or any other sum.

Mr. Alexander was for plaintiff; Mr. Lewis was for defendant.

Morris Eliason (the plaintiff), who gave his evidence in Yiddish, was called. He stated that he had instituted criminal proceedings against the defendant in the Magistrate's Court, under the Master and Servants' Act, for this sum of £35 5s., which was alleged to have been withheld by plaintiff. Defendant asked him many a time to become a partner, but witness always refused.

Cross-examined: Witness did not know whether the Magistrate said the defendant was not guilty. He did not get his wages awarded to him by the Magistrate. He remembered on the day when the remains of President Kruger were brought to Cape Town defendant took him for a walk, and they went to the office of a Mr. Schultz. Witness did not speak, and he took no part in the negotiations. The conversation was carried on in Dutch between defendant and Mr. Schultz. Some days afterwards defendant said that he had made an agreement, and he must go to Mr. Schultz's office to sign it. Witness had never told Mr. Schultz that he had gone into partnership with Katz, and that he (witness) had put £50 into the business, and Katz had put in £100. About the end of February he saw a packet of 1,000 account forms, headed "Katz and Eliason." Witness asked Katz why his name was on the bills. Katz's bookkeeper said that it did not matter, and he put the bills in the drawer. Katz said that he would erase witness's name from the forms.

Mr. Alexander closed his case.

John Henry Cecil van Breda, clerk in the Resident Magistrate's Court, who put in the record in the case of Re. v. Katz.

Morris Katz, defendant, stated that the plaintiff was in his employ in a bakery business in Sir Lowry-road. In the beginning of December the plaintiff paid £21 for a half share in the goodwill of the business. An agreement was subsequently drawn up, but was not signed, although it was agreed they should be in partnership. At this time they were losing over the business. In January, the plaintiff said he did not wish to be any longer partner in the business, which he left without any notice. It was agreed that witness should pay him £29, balance of the goodwill, in instalments. The bookkeeper paid the plaintiff his salary for the seven weeks.

E. J. Schultz, attorney, gave evidence as to Katz and Eliason calling upon him in December for the purpose of having a deed of partnership drawn up. The deed was drawn up but not signed.

Maasdorp, J., said to his mind the position was that at one time a certain sum of money was due, and the question was whether it had been paid. The onus of proof, however, was on the defendant.

Having heard Mr. Lewis in arguments on the facts,

Maasdorp, J., said the evidence of the defendant was that £50 was paid in cash, and the question was whether the £50 owing to plaintiff at the end of the year had been taken out of the capital account. If not there was documentary evidence to account for it. The partnership had not been proved, and that being so, the £50, according to the only book produced, was still owing to plaintiff. Judgment would be for the plaintiff as prayed, with costs.

ELLIOT V. DRUMMOND. { 1906.
BROWN V. DRUMMOND. { June 28th.

Rule of Court 330—Bar.

The time within which by Rule 330 a plaintiff may be barred for not proceeding with his action runs from the date of the issue of the summons.

Mr. Howel Jones (for plaintiff in each case) said that these matters were standing over for production of some authority to be cited for Rule 330. The application was for leave to sign judgment against the plaintiff in both cases for not proceeding with his action, having been duly barred. The question raised was as to the construction of Rule 330. Counsel said that he had been unable to find any direct authority in this court, and he must rely upon the practice of the Court. He also referred to the practice of the English Courts, in reference to which some question was raised by the defendant at the last hearing.

Defendant said that both summonses in this case were issued on the 21st February. The one intended for Brown was addressed to "John William Wood," of Vryburg, and the Deputy Sheriff returned it, saying that the name was unknown. The name "Wood" was a clerical error, and should have been Brown. The summons was amended, and it was not served on Brown until the 15th March. He submitted that, so far as that case was concerned, the summons was not issued until the 13th March, so that he was, he contended, still within the two terms in Brown's case.

Buchanan, J.: The only point arising in this case is the construction of the 330th Rule of Court, which says that any person may be barred if he does not proceed with his action in a certain time after which the action was commenced. According to the English authorities from which this rule was taken, the action commences from the issue of summons. The time since the issue of summons has elapsed, and plaintiff is entitled under the Rules of Court to have judgment signed against defendant for not proceeding with his action. The practice of this Court is in accordance with the practice of the English Courts. The application will be granted, with costs.

Later, proof of service was produced, and an order was granted for transfer within one month.

SCHEEPERS V. FOSTER.

Will—Assumption of executor—Appointment as co-executor —Letters of administration—Procedure.

A.S., the widow of G.S. (with whom she had made a joint will under which she was appointed executrix), after the death of G.S. took out letters of administration and assumed F. as co-executor, who, however, omitted to take out his appointment in that capacity. A.S. thereafter revoked the deed of assumption. On the death of A.S., F. claimed to be executor of the joint estate, and the heirs now demanded that he should be ordered to return the notarial deed under which he claimed to act.

Held, that the heirs should have called upon the Master to call a meeting of next of kin to A.S. to appoint an executor. The Court directed the Master to call such meeting with authority to appoint an executor dative.

This was an application on notice of motion calling on the respondent to show cause why an order should not be granted, declaring a certain act of assumption, purporting to have been passed in favour of the respondent, cancelled, and of no force and effect.

Mr. Benjamin was for the applicant, and Mr. W. P. Buchanan was for the respondent.

Counsel having been heard in argument,

Buchanan, J.: The late Mr. Gideon Scheepers, and his wife, Anna Scheepers, made a joint will, in which they appointed each other executors of the estate of the first dying. After Mr. Scheepers' death, Mrs. Scheepers took out letters of administration, and she placed the management of the estate in the hands of Mr. Foster, an attorney of Oudtshoorn, as her agent. Mr. Foster administered for some time, and he also obtained from Mrs. Scheepers a notarial document assuming him as executor with her in the estate of her late husband. Disputes arose between them, and Mrs. Scheepers wished to terminate Foster's agency, and demanded back the papers of the estate which she had given him, but he refused to return them. Foster saying that he held them as a lien for advances made. The matter came before the Court in August last year, when Foster was called upon to deliver up the papers, and particularly the title deeds belonging to the estate (15. C.T.R., 708). Foster set up his lien, but the Court decided against him, and he was ordered to give up the title deeds held by him forthwith. In his affidavit Foster stated the fact that Mrs. Scheepers had executed a notarial deed of assumption, but that he had not acted upon it or taken out letters of assumption from the Master, and Foster handed in the notarial document which he filed with the papers connected with the motion. There seems thus to have been a clear revocation by Mrs. Scheepers of her authority to Foster to take out letters of assumption. When Mrs. Scheepers died, the Master called a meeting of next of kin to appoint an executor dative to the estate of Gideon Scheepers. At that meeting the next of kin wished to appoint one of the heirs, Gideon Scheepers, jun., but Mr. Foster's agent produced the protocol of the attorney who had drawn up the original deed of assumption, and upon that protocol claimed that Foster still represented the estate, and that consequently no other executor could be appointed. This claim the Magistrate, acting for the Master, sustained, and refused to take steps to appoint an executor dative. Here, in my opinion, the Magistrate erred. It is true that Foster had at one time possession of a deed of assumption, but he never acted upon it, and when he was called upon to give up the papers of the estate, he surrendered the deed. I do not think that he has any right now to claim after the death of the widow, who in her lifetime, in effect, had revoked the assumption, to be appointed as assumed executor. This application has not assumed the proper form. The proper course would be to authorise the Master to call a meeting of the next of kin to appoint an executor dative in this unrepresented estate. No order can be made on the application. The Master is directed independently of the application to call a meeting of next of kin, with authority to appoint an executor dative to the estate of the late Gideon Scheepers. There will be no order as to costs.

FOURIE V. INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

Articled clerk—Break of service
—Matriculation examination.

The Court refused leave to an articled clerk to break his service for the purpose of pursuing his studies for the matriculation examination.

Mr. Roux moved, on the petition of Karl Hendrik Fourie, for leave of absence from service of articles of clerkship at Aliwal North until after matriculation examination in December next. He asked for leave of absence for five months and ten days in connection with his studies.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan appeared on behalf of the Incorporated Law Society and produced a letter addressed to the petitioner by the secretary of the society, in which he stated that his Council disapproved of breaks in the service of articles such as petitioner proposed to make, as being contrary to law, and also to the purpose of the articles. The Council also considered that the period of three months would be sufficient to take for the matriculation examination. Mr. Buchanan said that the letter described the position taken up by the society, and he also pointed out that there was no affidavit by Mr. Smuts, the petitioner's principal.

Mr. Roux drew the Court's attention to several decisions already given in applications for breaks of service for the purpose of pursuing studies, and said that the petitioner was in the hands of the Court as to how much time should be allowed.

Mr. Buchanan said that the matriculation examination was an examination that ought to have been taken before petitioner entered into his articles.

Buchanan, J.: Under the old practice every articled clerk was required to serve for a period of five years, and as that was a considerable period of time, occasionally, by indulgence, the Court allowed interruptions in the service. Eventually this term of five years was reduced to three years. The Rules of Court require that during the whole of that time the articled clerk is to be instructor in his profession as an attorney. In this case the articled clerk wishes to break his service, not for the purpose of being instructed in the theoretical part of his profession, but, in fact, to go back to school for a period from June to December, so that he may pass the matriculation examination. That is certainly contrary to the intention as well as to the letter of the Rules. There has occasionally been leave given to a clerk to break his service for the purpose of passing the law examination, as that is studying the theoretical part of his profession, provided that when he resumes he serves for a period of three years, but that is very different from this case. There will be no objection to save entering into fresh articles to give the applicant leave to break his service, but on his return he will have to serve three years consecutively.

ENGELS V. ENGELS.

Mr. De Waal moved for an order upon respondent, as executrix testamentary of the estate of the late Maria Engels (born Alexander) to sign liquidation and distribution account, or for leave to the Master to confirm the same without her signature. Petitioner was one of the children of the late Maria Engels, and her surviving spouse, Wm. Engels. The survivor had waived his life interest. Counsel applied for an order in terms of the alternative prayer. [Buchanan, J.: Why not remove her from her office and allow the Master to appoint an executor dative, who can sign the account?]

Mr. De Waal said that the estate was very small, and there had already been certain applications to the Court.

SUPREME COURT

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

LOUW V. LOUW. { 1906.
 } July 29th.

This was an action for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce. The defendant had not appeared, but had taken out a summons for divorce, or in the alternative, for judicial separation, against the plaintiff.

The declaration set out that the plaintiff, Jacob Petrus Louw, resided at Mowbray, and the defendant at present resided at Malmesbury. The parties were married in 1888, and there were four children of the marriage. In April, 1905, the defendant deserted the plaintiff and had not since returned to him. He claimed restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce and custody of the children.

Mr. Russell was for the plaintiff, and the defendant was in default.

The plaintiff, in his evidence, said that after fifteen years, he entered into a deed of separation, paying the defendant £15 a month for maintenance of herself and a child. In April, 1905, the deed of separation was cancelled, the plaintiff paying defendant £60. The defendant went to Malmesbury to see her mother, but failed to return to plaintiff. In a letter the defendant said for the sake of their future lives she would never return to him. She further stated that plaintiff had accused her of wasting his money, whereas he had been wasting money on other women, and also £150 on detectives to watch her. His wife, witness said, run him in for £700.

[Hopley, J.: How?]

In a case I took against her.

[Hopley, J.: It cost you £700?]

Yes, I can put it down in black and white.

[Hopley, J.: I did not think divorce were so expensive. You wasted £150 on detectives, and she say now you have been trying Osberg. I suppose that is the way a great deal of your £700 went?]

Oh, rather.

[Hopley, J.: She says you have been making a fool of yourself in this way. I suppose you would not dispute that?]

The plaintiff further stated that if his wife returned to him he would be willing to receive her. The defendant, in a letter, alleged that plaintiff committed adultery with several women in 1903, and this he denied.

Hopley, J., said it was impossible at the present stage to inquire into the truth of the allegations contained in the defendant's letter.

A decree of restitution of conjugal rights would be granted, the defendant to return by the 1st August, failing which, to show cause by the 31st August why a decree of divorce should not be granted, the plaintiff to have custody of the children.

VILJOEN V. VILJOEN.

This was an action for restitution of conjugal rights by reason of the defendant's desertion. The parties were married at Sea Point in 1894. The plaintiff at present resided at Caledon, and the defendant at Sea Point. In January this year the defendant left Caledon on a visit to Sea Point, and failed to return. A letter was read from the defendant to the plaintiff as follows: "The day before I left you I told you of my intention of not returning, and that my uncles would support me. It is best to part good friends than otherwise, although it is hard to you. As we cannot agree, I will return to my people. Willem, may God bless you, whatever you may undertake in future."

Mr. Van Zyl was for the plaintiff and the defendant was in default.

Willem Daniel Viljoen, plaintiff, stated that the defendant lived happily with him. In January this year she came from Caledon to Sea Point, and failed to return.

[Hopley, J.: You have given up custody of the children?]

Yes.

Hopley, J.: This looks like a matter of arrangement. There will be an order of restitution of conjugal rights by the 1st August, failing which, the defendant to show cause on the 31st August why a decree of divorce should not be granted, and why she should not have custody of the children, with the plaintiff having reasonable access.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C. K.C.M.G., LL.D.), the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN, and the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

RHODESIA CONSOLIDATED, { 1906.
LTD. V. RIXON. { June 30th.
{ July 2nd.

Principal and agent—Excess of authority — Ratification of part of contract.

Where an agent enters into a contract with a third person in excess of his authority; the principal is not entitled, as against such third person, to claim the benefit of part of the contract while rejecting the rest.

The manager of the plaintiff Company entered into a written contract with the defendant, whereby the latter undertook to supply to the Company a certain quantity of corn at a fixed price and within a given time, whilst it was orally agreed that the manager should advance to the defendant the sum of £200, for which amount the latter was to sign his promissory note in favour of the manager to be kept in his safe as a security for such advances. The manager deposited the note with his banker as security for his over-draft and at the due date of the note, the defendant was obliged to pay part of the amount to the banker. The manager had no authority from the Company to take the defendant's note in his own favour for the advance, and there was no evidence of collusion between the defendant and the manager.

Held on appeal from the High Court of S. Rhodesia, that the plaintiff Company was not entitled to claim from the defendant more than the balance of the advance after deduction of the amount which he had been compelled to pay to the banker.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the senior judge of the High Court, Southern Rhodesia, in an action brought by the appellants, the Rhodesia Consolidated, Ltd., against the respondent, to recover a sum of £200 in respect of an advance made under a contract to supply mealies and Kafir corn to the Nellie Mine.

The plaintiffs' declaration was as follows:—

1. The plaintiffs are a Joint Stock Company duly incorporated and registered under the British South Africa Company's Companies Act of 1895, and having an office at Salisbury, and carrying on business in Southern Rhodesia. The defendant is a farmer, residing at Fort Rixon, in the district of Bulawayo.

2. On the 3rd July, 1905, the plaintiffs advanced to the defendant the sum of £200 in consideration whereof the defendant undertook and agreed to deliver 220 bags of mealies and 80 bags of Kafir corn at the Nellie Mine, in the district of Bulawayo, on or before the 31st December, 1905.

3. The defendant failed and refused to deliver the said mealies and Kafir corn, or any part thereof, in terms of the said agreement, and has refused, and still refuses, to repay the said advance of £200 or any part thereof.

4. All times have elapsed and all things have happened entitling the plaintiffs to claim payment of the said sum of £200.

Wherefore the plaintiffs claim:

- (a) Payment of the sum of £200.
- (b) Interest from the 3rd July, 1905.
- (c) General relief.
- (d) Costs of suit.

To this declaration the defendant pleaded as follows:

1. The defendant admits paragraph 1 of the declaration.

2. As to paragraphs 2 and 3 thereof the defendant says that previous to the said 3rd July, 1905, he had had similar contracts with the plaintiff company, and in consideration of his depositing with the plaintiff company promissory notes to cover all advances made by the plaintiff company in connection with such contracts the plaintiff company from time to time made him advance as aforesaid.

3. It was a condition of all such agreements that the plaintiff company would hold the said promissory notes as security only in case the defendant died or was otherwise unable to fulfil such contracts, and that under no circumstances would the plaintiff company negotiate or discount the said notes.

4. Shortly before the said date mentioned in paragraph 2 of the declaration, one Walter Howard, who was then the local representative, manager and secretary of the plaintiff company, which had then its head office at Bulawayo, approached the defendant, and requested the defendant to enter into another contract with the plaintiff company to supply mealies and Kafir corn at the said mine, such grain to be delivered during the period from 1st October to 31st December, 1905, as the plaintiff company should require it.

5. The Defendant at first refused to enter into such contract on account of the time he would have to hold such grain and be without his money, whereupon the plaintiff company's said representative offered, on behalf of the plaintiff company, that if the defendant would enter into such a contract the plaintiff company would, as before, advance him the sum of £200 on account of such contract, provided defendant would, as on the said previous occasions deposit as security with the plaintiff company his promissory note for that amount on the same terms and conditions as before.

6. The defendant thereupon entered into the said contract, and the plaintiff's said representative made out a promissory note for the said amount, which the defendant signed and left with the said representative on behalf of the plaintiff company as agreed, subsequently the plaintiff company's said representative paid the defendant £200, in accordance with the said contract.

7. In or about the month of September, 1905, the defendant learnt that contrary to the terms and conditions of the said contract, and in breach of the same, the said promissory note, which the defendant had deposited with the plaintiff company as security aforesaid, had been negotiated and discounted at the African Banking Corporation, Ltd., Bulawayo.

8. The defendant thereupon wrote to the plaintiff company's, then representative, and informed him that unless the plaintiff company recovered possession of the said note and held it as agreed, he would retire the said note at maturity, and consider the said contract as terminated by the said breach, and the defendant also called and saw the said representative to the same effect.

9. The plaintiff company failed to recover possession of the said note, and the defendant was obliged to retire the same at maturity, viz.: 31st December, 1905, and paid the said Bank the said amount of £200, less the sum of £16 18s. 10d., which amount he has tendered the plaintiff company.

10. The defendant was always willing and ready to deliver the said grain at the said mine in accordance with the terms of the said contract and otherwise perform the same provided the plaintiff company had fulfilled their part of the said contract.

11. Save as aforesaid the defendant denies the allegations in paragraphs 2 and 3 of the declaration and the defendant also denies those in paragraph 4 thereof.

12. Alternatively (should this honourable Court hold that notwithstanding the breach as aforesaid by the plaintiff company the defendant was bound to carry out the said contract to deliver the said grain if called upon the plaintiff company to do so and not otherwise) the defendant says that the contract was to deliver the said grain between the period from the 1st October, 1905, to the 31st December, 1905, when the plaintiff company should require same and up to and including the 31st December, 1905, the plaintiff company never called on the defendant for delivery of the said grain and on the said date defendant had to retire the said note as aforesaid less the said sum of £16 18s. 10d. which he again tenders the plaintiff company.

Wherefore the defendant prays that the plaintiff's claim may be dismissed with costs.

The plaintiff's replication was general.

The Court below gave judgment for plaintiff for £16 18s. 10d. amount tendered with costs to date of tender. All costs after such tender to be paid by plaintiff—defendant expenses as witness allowed.

The Judge's reasons for judgment were as follows:—

In this case the first question to be determined was what was the actual nature of the transactions which took place between Howard and Rixon with regard to the promissory note of £200. The position taken up by the plaintiff company was that as the note was made payable to Walter Howard or order and not to the company and with no indication on the note itself showing it was for the company or someone acting for them the transaction was a private one. Howard in evidence stated that the note had no relation to the company's business, his version to my mind was inconsistent, for at one time he said that the note was given to him by way of a private security as he had no authority from his company to make cash advances on their behalf and that he wished to secure himself in case the company repudiated the advance. He later stated that the note was given to him as an act of friendship for his private purposes and had no connection whatever with the advance made by him on behalf of the company to Rixon. To my mind the evidence of Rixon was clear and straight forward and I accepted without hesitation his version as to what occurred between him and Howard with regard to above matter. The conduct of Rixon on discovery of the fact that Howard had negotiated the note prior to the date it fell due seemed to me to strongly corroborate Rixon's version. I found as a fact that Rixon signed the note drawn up by Howard on the distinct understanding that it should only be negotiated in the event of his failing to carry out the terms of the contract for the supply of grain. In other words that it was given to the company as security for the repayment of the advance of £200 in the event of a breach of the contract. I believe Rixon's statement that he did not notice when signing the note that it was made out payable to Walter Howard or order.

It was argued by the plaintiff company that inasmuch as the note was made payable to Walter Howard or order the onus of proving that Howard had authority to act in the way he did was thrown on Rixon. I was of opinion that as the company sued upon an arrangement entered into between Rixon and their own agent Howard it was not within their power to say that Howard had no authority to make this advance. And in these circumstances I was of opinion that Howard must be considered to have had power to take on behalf of the company, security for repayment of the advance in the event of Rixon's failure to carry out the terms of his contract. This seemed to me nothing more than an ordinary business-like proceeding and the company might well, had Howard failed to take security, have had very serious cause for complaint against him. I consider that the fact of the note being made payable to Howard or order did not absolve the company from liability, it seemed to me the form of security was a matter entirely in the discretion of Howard, and that even if he acted in a foolish or fraudulent manner my view was that the company and not Rixon should be the sufferer. In the above circumstances I held that the defendants' contention was good and I accordingly gave judgment for plaintiffs to the amount of the tender with costs up to date of such tender. All costs subsequent to the date of tender to be paid by plaintiff.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (for appellant): The declaration shows that it is common cause that certain advances were in pursuance of the following contract:—

Bulawayo, June 23rd, 1905.

Walter Howard, Esq., Rhodesia Consolidated Limited, Bulawayo.

Dear Sir,—I beg to confirm our conversation this morning, by which in consideration of an advance of £200, to be paid in ten days from date, I undertake to deliver to the Nelly Mine, 220 bags of mealies at 18s. and 80 bags of kafir corn at 15s. delivery not to be before the 1st September and not later than the 31st December.—Yours faithfully.

(Sd.) T. M. RIXON.

In May, 1904, the defendant gave a promissory note to Howard, and had received an advance from the company of £225. Howard took this note, indorsed it, and placed it to his own credit. The company had nothing to do with it. In June, 1905, a second promissory note for £200 was given to Howard. Paragraph 5 of the plea implies that this note was payable to the company, but it was payable to Howard. This is not denied in the plea, but the inference is that it was not so. On November 20th defendant repudiated the contract until his promissory note should be handed back to him, but the company had nothing to do with that.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Had Howard authority to deal with Rixon?]

Yes, but he had no authority to make advances and take a promissory note in his own name.

[Buchanan, J.: But do you not adopt the advance?]

Yes, because it is our money. Howard had no right to advance it, but it is ours. Rixon's case is that the note was made payable to Howard per incuriam. If it had been made payable to the company that would have been a different matter.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Was it not the fault of the company that Howard was in a position to commit a fraud? He was their manager.]

He had no express authority to hand the money over to Rixon. It is only a question of implied authority. If the company had discharged him they could still have sued Rixon for the money.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You cannot follow up money. The moment Rixon got it it was his property.]

Howard wanted to get hold of Rixon's paper for his own accommodation and not for the company. The note was given on the 23rd of June, but post-dated the 30th.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Was Rixon bound to ascertain Howard's relations with the company?]

Certainly; and if Rixon was negligent it is for him and not for the company to bear the loss.

[De Villiers, C.J.: If the company were so negligent as to employ a dishonest agent, why should they not bear the loss? The whole question is whether Howard had authority to take the promissory note?]

Exactly, and the case must be decided on the same grounds as if Rixon were suing the company for money paid to Howard.

[Buchanan, J.: If Howard had authority to advance the money he had authority to take a promissory note for it.]

The note ought to have been made payable to the company. In his evidence Rixon says that "he was astonished by the letter of the Bank Manager; still he takes no steps in the matter. After the second letter he sees Derry, the then manager. He says:

"I then went to see Derry, and said I would not fulfil contract until they obtained possession of my promissory note. He said that Howard had not accounted for several matters and moneys. Derry said he must do the best for his company, and said did not think I was right. I said I would not fulfil contract until bill was returned. My solicitor then wrote letter (put in) to plaintiff. Bill was not met at maturity, and I had to provide for it. I had to pay £180 odd." If this had been an ordinary contract transaction he would have refused to sign the note, and would not have acted as he did when he found that he could not get back his note from Howard.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What is the drift of your argument?]

I want to separate the question of the contract from Rixon's action.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You, by your action, admit that Howard had authority to make advances. If he made advances, we must assume both that he had authority to do so, and that he had authority to take what security he pleased.]

But see Hogarth v. Wheley (32 L.T. 800, and 10 L. Rep., C.P., 630).

[De Villiers, C.J.: Was it not held that a promissory note payable to an agent as security was binding on the principal?]

Not unless the principal has by his previous course of dealing led the debtor to believe that the agent had authority to accept such note.

[De Villiers, C.J.: If Howard had been an honest man he would have put that note to the credit of the company. Did not the company hold him out as an honest man?]

The note was no security. The company had Rixon's receipt of July 3, 1905, for the £200. The note was given ten days before this advance was made. The company could not have negotiated the note, so it did not secure them. Rixon ought to have seen that Howard was using that note for his own benefit. It was understood that the company were not to negotiate it. What use then was it to the company? In point of fact the company knew nothing about it. In Hogarth v. Wheley authority was given to an agent to take a bill in favour of his principal. The bill was given in blank: the agent filled in his own name, and the payment was held to be bad. In the letter of June 23, nothing is said as to promissory notes. A collateral agreement between an agent and a third person cannot bind a principal, who has no knowledge of it. See also Bowstead on Agency (p. 65, 2nd Edit.), and cases there brought up, also pages 70 and 75 where, see illustration 4), citing Edmonds v. Bushell (Law Rep. Vol. I. of 1897).

[De Villiers, C.J.: The defendant's case is that the company did not fulfil their part of the contract. He did not get his advance of £200, and had to retire his own bill?]

If Rixon had retired the bill, Howard could not have refused to repay the £200.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I am not sure of that.]

Then he would have enriched himself at the loss of the company.

[Maasdorp, J.: Rixon says, "I will give you the mealies when you give me the £200. Is not that a good defence?"]

The re-delivery of the promissory note was not a condition precedent to the delivery of the mealies. They were to be delivered in November, and the note did not fall due till December. He should have delivered the grain and then sued for the return of the note. Bowstead (p. 76), citing Davis v. Stauden. Also Faure v. Louw (1 Juta, 3), *Standard Bank v. Having intimated that it would not now be necessary to hear Mr. Searle for respondent.

De Villiers, C.J.: This is an appeal from the High Court of Southern Rhodesia in an action whereby the plaintiff company claimed from the defendant the repayment of an advance of £200 alleged to have been made by the company in consideration of the defendant undertaking to deliver 220 bags of mealies and 80 bags of Kafir corn at the Nellie Mine on or before the 1st of December, 1905. The defendant having failed to deliver the articles within the specified time, the company claimed repayment of the money advanced. The defendant, by his plea, admitted the undertaking and failure to deliver the articles, but he alleged that such undertaking formed part of a wider contract, one of the terms of which was that he should deposit as security with the company his promissory note for £200, which the company should not, however, be at liberty to negotiate or discount. The plea further alleged that the defendant did give such a promissory note, which was discounted with the African Banking Corporation, but not met at maturity, and that he, as the maker, was compelled to pay the sum of £183 ls. 2d., and he accordingly tendered the sum of £16 18s. 10d. in full discharge of the company's claim. The evidence showed that on the 23rd of June, 1905, the following letter was sent by the defendant to one Howard, who was then the manager of the plaintiff company: "Dear Sir,—I beg to confirm the conversation of this morning, by which, in consideration of an advance of £200, to be paid in ten days from this date, I undertake to deliver to the Nellie Mine 220 bags of mealies at 18s. and 80 bags of Kafir corn at 15s., delivery not to be before the 1st September, and not later than the 31st December." The defendant's evidence, which was accepted by the Court below as correct, and which this Court has no reason to doubt, further showed that while the defendant was signing the letter, which had been written at Howard's dictation, Howard handed him a promissory note in his (Howard's) favour, and requested him to sign it. The defendant said, "I did not know I had to sign note." Howard said, "Oh, yes; in same way as you signed last year to secure fulfilment of the contract." The defendant said, "Where is that note." Howard said, "When you fulfilled your contract I tore it up." The defendant said, "If I sign note, it will, I suppose be held by the company as security against contract and advance of £200." Howard said, "Of course, it will be the same as one you gave last year. It will be held and kept in safe as the last one was, and will be held simply as security for fulfilment of contract and against advance, and, of course, will only be used if you die or break contract." Thereupon defendant agreed to the terms, and signed the note. The evidence of the manager of the bank showed that Howard had an overdraft in the bank, and that in the previous year he had given the bank as security against such overdraft the defendant's promissory note in favour of Howard personally for £225. This was the promissory note to which the parties referred in the conversation just mentioned. In June, 1905, the bank pressed Howard for settlement, whereupon he lodged with the Bank the promissory note of the defendant in his favour for £200. On the 6th September the bank called upon the defendant for payment of Howard's then overdraft, which the defendant duly paid. His defence accordingly at the trial was in substance that as the advance to him had been reduced by the payment thus made by him he was not liable for more than the balance. The Court below, by its judgment, sustained that defence, and against that judgment the company now appeals. The plaintiff's replication to the plea did not raise any question as to Howard's authority to take the defendant's note in his (Howard's) favour as security, but in the Court below and in this Court the contention of the plaintiff company's counsel was that the defendant could not derive any benefit from the payment made by him to the bank, inasmuch as Howard had no authority from the company to take a promissory note in his own favour. I must say at once that I quite concur in the view that, as the company is not proved to have known that its manager had on a previous occasion taken the defendant's note in favour of the manager personally, the company cannot be held to have given the manager any authority to take such notes again from the defendant. But the importance of the evidence relating to the previous note transaction lies in this, that it fixed the exact terms on which the contract of June, 1905, purported to be entered into. I am satisfied that those terms have been correctly stated by the defendant, and I am also satisfied that Howard had no authority from the company to enter into any contract with those terms annexed. The company would accordingly have been perfectly justified in repudiating the contract. If there was collusion between Howard and the defendant the company could, after repudiating the contract, claim repayment of the money as having been advanced in fraud of the company. But the company has not repudiated the contract. The case for the company is that it has ratified the contract so far as it is in writing, and that so far as it rests upon an oral agreement between the parties, the company is not bound, because its agent had no authority to take a promissory note made in his own favour. But the contract must stand or fall as a whole. There is no inconsistency between the written and the oral part of the contract, for the latter is only supplementary of the former. The oral part of the contract was that the note for £200 should be the same as the one given in the previous year, and, therefore, the giving of a note by the defendant in favour of Howard was a compliance with the oral part of the contract. Howard may have had no authority to take such a note as security, but the company cannot ratify a transaction of this kind in part, and repudiate it as to the rest. It may not have been bound by the contract, but having elected to take the benefit of a part it must be held to have ratified the whole of the contract. The bringing of this very action was a ratification by the company of the contract made by its manager with the defendant. The company, by its replication, denied that the terms of such contract were as alleged by the defendant, but when once the truth of the allegation was established, the plaintiff company's right to recover more than the balance tendered by the defendant failed altogether. The action is founded upon a failure of consideration for such advance, and as that advance was really reduced by the sum of £183 1s. 2d., which the defendant was compelled to pay contrary to the terms of the contract, he was properly held liable only for the balance. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed, with costs.

Buchanan, J.: I concur on the ground of ratification.

Maasdorp, J.: I concur.

APPENDIX.

Judgment of the Lords of the Judicial Committee of Privy Council on the Consolidated Appeal and Cross-Appeal of the Commissioner of Public Works, and, as such, representing the Colonial Government v. Hills; and of Hills v. The Commissioner of Public Works, and, as such, representing the Colonial Government, from the Supreme Court of the Colony of the Cape of Good Hope; delivered the 24th May, 1906.

Present at the hearing: The Lord Chancellor, Lord Davey, Lord Dunedin, Lord Atkinson, Sir Arthur Wilson.

(Delivered by Lord Dunedin.)

The present appeals arise out of three contracts which were made between the Government of the Cape of Good Hope and the Thames Ironworks and Shipbuilding Company, Limited. Arnold Frank Hills, the respondent in the principal appeal and appellant in the cross-appeal, has been assigned into the rights of the said company.

These three contracts were all made on the same day, 4th July, 1900, and were subsequently confirmed by Act of Parliament of the Cape of Good Hope, where they appear as Schedules G, H, and I of Act 19 of 1900. They had to do with the construction of three railways, viz.: No. 1, Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat; No. 2, Somerset East-King William's Town; and No. 3, Mossel Bay-Oudtshoorn. The first two were contracts for the construction of the lines of the company and the handing over of them to the Government. They were constructed and handed over, and no question, in one sense, arises on them. But moneys payable under them are partly the subject of this litigation, for the following reason. In each of them there was a clause providing that 10 per cent. should be retained by the Government from the payments falling due as the lines were constructed, and each of them contained clauses dealing with the ultimate fate of the 10 per cent. so retained. By these clauses the 10 per cent. retained from each instalment was to form a guarantee fund, which fund was to be primarily applied to making good any defects of construction, and then "the guarantee fund or the balance thereof shall be dealt with in terms of the agreement entered in to for the construction of the Mossel Bay-Oudtshoorn line."

Under these clauses sums amounting in cumulo to £61,233 16s. 2d. have been retained.

The third contract, which related to the Mossel Bay line, was rather different. This line was to remain the property of the contractors, but in respect of their engaging to construct the line the Government was to pay them a subsidy at the rate of £2,000 per mile of completed railway, not to exceed £150,000 in all. Provision was made for the payment of this subsidy as the work went on, but subject to the retention of 10 per cent. of it by the Government.

A sum of £50,000 had been lodged as security by the company in the hands of the Cape Agent-General, and Section 15 of Schedule 1 provides that this sum and the sums retained by way of 10 per cent. of the instalments out of the payments on lines (1) and (2) should be handed over to the company as follows, viz., one-third when the Mossel Bay line had been completed to a certain geographical point, one-third when to a certain further point, and one-third on final completion.

Then comes Section 17 on which the controversies in these appeals directly turn. It is in the following terms:

"17. The concessionary undertakes to push forward the construction of the line with all possible speed and to complete the same within two years of the date of the approval of this agreement by Parliament. In the event of the non-completion of the line within the time hereinbefore mentioned, unless the delay is proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Public Works to have been caused by the Act of God, war, insurrection, rebellion, strikes, lock-outs, or combinations of workmen, or other extraordinary or unforeseen circumstances beyond the control of the concessionary, or from or on the part of the Railway Department, the security referred to in this agreement to wit:

"The ten per cent. (10%) retention money under this agreement, together with the ten per cent. retention money under the agreements for the construction of the Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat and the Somerset East-King William's Town Lines, dated 4th July, 1900, and the security lodged with the Cape Agent-General shall be forfeited to the Colonial Government as and for liquidated damages sustained by the said line, and thereupon the agreement between the Government and the said concessionary shall cease and determine, and it shall be lawful for the Government to enter upon and take possession of such incomplete line of railway as has been constructed by the said concessionary, and the Government shall thereafter as soon as the amount of the actual cost of such incomplete line shall have been ascertained to pay to the said concessionary the amount as shall have been paid on account of subsidy and less the amount of retention money and security hereinbefore referred to."

The company failed to complete the line within two years, or within a period to which the two years had been by mutual consent extended. They did not even advance with it so far as to be able to claim any of the partial payments under Section 15. Accordingly, on 15th June, 1903, the Government applied to the Court to get a declaration of the failure of the Company to complete the line, and for leave to enter upon and take possession of the line in terms of Section 17. The Court gave judgment accordingly. Against the judgment an appeal was taken, but subsequently abandoned, and the judgment now stands as final between the parties.

The company, who by this time were represented by the present appellant Hills, then brought the present action against the Government, asking for payment of the value of their line, and the handing over of the sums retained and of the sum of £50,000 above mentioned, as also of a sum of £4,913 2s. 5d., being 10 per cent. of the instalments of the subsidy retained on railway No. 3. The Court gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff for a sum of £73,500 12s. 7d., being the actual cost of the works as found by referees to whom it had remitted the question (but with no allowance for interest on capital), under deduction of the said sum of £4,913 2s. 5d., and also gave judgment for the plaintiff for the sums of £66,146 18s. 7d. (made up of the said sums of £4,913 2s. 5d. and £61,233 16s. 2d.) and £50,000.

The parties in the principal appeal do not raise any question as to the sum of £73,500 12s. 7d. but in the cross-appeal the appellant Hill prays for a further addition in name of interest on capital. On this point their Lordships entirely agree with the remarks of the learned Chief Justice. To add interest would seem to them to disregard the plain meaning of the word "actual" as applied to cost. The referees have here, as practical men, found the cost of the works—in other words, they have said that so much money was expended to make them. To add something more in the name of interest would be to add something which never could be actual cost, for it would either be a sum calculated on an assumed general rate of interest, or it would be a sum which varied according to the financial position of the particular contractor. That "actual cost" in this contract is used in no such fanciful sense is clearly shown by the use of the words in Section 7 of Schedule 1, where provision is made for its ascertainment as regards each instalment by the certificate of an engineer.

This disposes of the cross-appeal. In the principal appeal the Government has complained of the judgment in so far as it gives the respondent Hills the sums of £66,146 18s. 7d. and £50,000, and claims these interms of Section 17 as being theirs in name of liquidated damages for non-completion of the line within the specified time.

Their Lordships have no doubt that the case of the non-completion of a railway would be a natural and proper case in which to make such a stipulation. But the question arises in each particular case whether such a stipulation has been made, and it is well settled law that the mere form of expression "penalty" or "liquidated damages" does not conclude the matter. Indeed the form of expression here "forfeited as and for liquidated damages," if literally taken, may be said to be self contradictory, the word "forfeited" being particularly appropriate to penalty and not to liquidated damages.

The House of Lords had occasion to review the law in the matter in the recent case of The Clydebank Engineering and Shipbuilding Company v. Don Jose Ramos Ysquierdo y Castaneda (1905 A.C., p. 6). It is perhaps worthy of remark, in view of certain observations of the learned Chief Justice in the Court below, that that was a Scotch case, that is to say, decided according to the rules of a system of law where contract law is based directly on the Civil Law and where no complications in the matter of pleading had ever been introduced by the separation of Common Law and Equity.

The general principle to be deduced from that judgment seems to be this, that the criterion of whether a sum—be it called penalty or damages—is truly liquidated damages, and as such not to be interfered with by the Court, or is truly a penalty which covers the damage if proved, but does not assess it, is to be found in whether the sum stipulated for can or can not be regarded as a "genuine pre-estimate of the creditor's probable or possible interest in the due performance of the principal obligation." The indicia of this question will vary according to circumstances. Enormous disparity of the sum to any conceivable loss will point one way, while the fact of the payment being in terms proportionate to the loss will point the other. But the circumstances must be taken as a whole, and must be viewed as at the time the bargain was made.

Applying this principle to the present case their Lordships are unable to come to the conclusion that the sum here can be taken as a genuine pre-estimate of loss. The determining factor is that the sum is not a definite sum, but is liable to great fluctuation in amount dependent on events not connected with the fulfilment of this contract. It is obvious that the amount of retained money under Contracts 1 and 2 depended entirely on the progress of those contracts, and that, further, as those moneys are primarily liable to make good deficiencies in these contract works, the eventual sum available to be dealt with under the provisions of Section 17 of this contract could not in any way be estimated as a fixed sum.

Their Lordships therefore hold that the sums are not liquidated damages under Section 17.

So far as a claim is made under Section 16 for £10,000, there seems no ground for argument that the sum is liquidated damages, as the expression used points to forfeiture pure and simple.

Their Lordships are not, however, satisfied that the Government has been given a proper opportunity to prove such damages, not exceeding the sums in the penalties, as they can make out. In the Court below the whole contention seems to have turned upon the question of liquidated damages, yea or nay. The judgment of the learned Chief Justice which decides—as their Lordships think, rightly—that the damages are not liquidated, does not directly deal with the question of damages, unless certain remarks are held to lay down the proposition that in such a contract the Government, as a Government, could suffer no damage. Their Lordships do not take that view. That the Government had a true and valuable interest in getting a line constructed, even although when constructed it was not to be their property, seems to be sufficiently established by the fact that they were content to pay a subsidy of £2,000 a mile. They have not got that line completed, but, on the contrary, have got on their hands an incomplete line, incapable of yielding profit in its present state, but for which they have been obliged to pay a considerable sum of money. It seems to their Lordships that there are obvious elements of damage in such a position, and that the Government should be given the opportunity of proving such damage and evaluating it in money.

Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise His Majesty to declare that before the plaintiff (the respondent in the principal appeal) obtains judgment for the sums of £66,146 18s. 7d., and £50,000 awarded to him by the judgment of the Supreme Court, dated the 29th February, 1904, the defendant (the principal appellant) is entitled to prove such damage as he may have actually suffered through the plaintiff's breach of contract, and to obtain judgment in reconvention for such amount to be deducted from the sums awarded to him by the judgment of the Supreme Court, and that subject to such declaration the defendant's appeal ought to be dismissed, and, further, that the plaintiff's cross-appeal ought to be dismissed.

The parties will pay their own costs of the appeal and cross-appeal respectively.

Land Development Co.—Income
—Act 36 of 1904.

A land development Company had sold for a large amount portion of its land on a system of deferred payments running over a term of ten years, upon agreements of purchase and sale, which it was optional to the purchasers to carry out or to suffer them to become void by making default, under penalty of forfeiting, as liquidated damages, any amounts already paid by them. The company had placed the whole amount received by them on the sales against the cost of the land and had not received sufficient to pay off the capital invested.

Held, that the Company was not liable to be assessed for Income Tax for the current year upon the amount of the deferred payments, as such unpaid portions of the purchase price were not income derived or received by the Company during the current year within the meaning of Act 36 of 1904.

This matter came up on review of certain proceedings of the Court of Review appointed under the Income Tax Act. No. 36, 1904.

It appeared that the applicant company is a land company registered in the Transvaal, and that the transaction in respect of which they have been held liable to pay income tax in this colony for the year ended the 30th June, 1904, are the sales of certain land in an estate known as Mount Pleasant, at Port Elizabeth. The company bought this ground some few years ago, and proceeded to have it surveyed and cut up into lots for the purpose of sale. The company paid £2,000 for the block of ground, and they also incurred survey and other sundry expenses amounting to £2,915 8s. 10d. The terms on which they sold the lots were that the instalments should be extended over ten years of such per year, transfer to be given at the completion of purchase price. Purchasers also had the option, if they so desired, to complete the purchase at a shorter period. In the period in question the company disposed of about four-sevenths of their property. The Income Tax Commissioner made the usual demand for taxation purposes, and certain figures were supplied, which, however, he did not consider satisfactory as a basis of taxation. Eventually he assessed the company at £30,000, taking the total purchase represented by the sales, viz., £32,500, and holding that £30,000 of that sum was profit. The matter was taken before the Court of Review, and the assessment was reduced by that Court to £10,467. The company, however, was still dissatisfied, and accordingly carried the matter to the Supreme Court, on a question as to whether the basis adopted by the Court of Review was correct. The company said that of the sales which were made, about 60 to 75 per cent. lapsed through the failure of buyers to pay the instalments, and of these, about one-third to one-fourth were resold. Their contention was that their income from the estate during the year, upon the figures put in and accepted, was less than £1,000. and that, therefore, they were not liable to pay income tax.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Searle, K.C.), was for the applicants; Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Howel Jones), was for the respondent.

Buchanan, J. asked upon what basis the amount of the Commissioner's assessment was reduced by the Court of Review from £30,000 to £10,467?

Mr. Schreiner said that that information had not been vouchsafed to them.

Buchanan, J. said he supposed the Court of Review had taken into consideration that probably a lot of the sales would not go through.

Mr. Schreiner submitted that the basis of taxation adopted in this case was absolutely untenable. Supposing not another soul paid a single penny more, and threw up their deeds, and it was perfectly lawful for them to do so, could it be said there was any profit? Taxes were put upon gains and profits, and not upon the price. If no profit was made, no tax could be enforced.

Sir H. Juta said he would try and show the difference between a person who bought a thing and simply got his capital back, and between a trading company like this, carrying on business in land. The only appeal to their lordships could be on a question of law, and therefore there could be no discussion as to figures. The question of law was this: What was the taxable income this company received during 1903-4? As was pointed out by the Court of Review, the question really was upon what basis were they to proceed. Were they going to proceed upon an ordinary profit and loss account, or, as was done in other trading businesses, were they going to proceed upon a cash basis on the difference between the revenue and expenditure, or were they going to proceed upon the extraordinary basis put forward by the appellants that you must have a cash basis on the one side and a profit and loss basis on the other?

[Buchanan, J.: What do you say were the profits received during the year?]

Sir H. Juta: It is not "received"; it is "derived." Supposing you had a mercantile firm, its income is accrued and its profit derived. It does not mean actual cash received. The words are "income accrued" and "profit derived." It does not mean money received. Sir H. Juta went on to urge that if the assessment were to be taken on the basis of a cash system, then only a proportionate amount of the expenses and not the whole should be deducted in respect of the lots sold during the year. If they took a profit and loss basis, then they must take the profits of the ten instalments.

Hopley, J. pointed out that a portion of the lots were sold before June, 1903, when the financial year commenced, and said that surely those lots were deducted from the taxable income.

Sir H. Juta: In respect of sales that took place before June, 1903, they cannot have to pay. But at the 1st July, 1903, they must say that they had so many lots, and at the 1st July, 1904 they had so many lots, and they must pay on the profits on the difference between those lots. Their account does not show what their stock was on the 1st July, 1903, and one cannot tell from the account what lots they sold between the time when their returns begin in February, 1903, and July 1, 1903.

Mr. Schreiner, in reply, submitted that they had to apply the same law to a company as they would apply to a private individual. His learned friend's argument that a trading company must be treated on a different footing fell away entirely. Touching on the illustration of an annuity used by Sir Henry Juta, counsel said that an annuity was a much more certain thing than the source of the company's income from this ground. True, they received £3,750 in the period to the 1st July, 1904, but they had expended over £5,000, and it did not appear that any of those purchasers had paid any further instalments. Admittedly, they would have a piece of land, but the company had laid out money in surveys, advertising, etc., for which they might thus get no return, except the sum received on sales which had lapsed. Counsel contended that the high-water mark of the company's profits in the year 1903-4 was the sum of £1,131 5s. 5d., and that, deducting £1,000 for exemption, they had £131 5s. 5d. as taxable income.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (July 9th).

Buchanan, J.: The appellant company, inter alia, carries on business in dealings in land. The only transaction they had in the Colony was the purchase for £2,000 of the estate Mount Pleasant at Port Elizabeth in 1903, before the imposition of the income tax. On the 30th of June, 1903, this property stood in the company's books at £1,618 2s. 6d. During the year following the company spent £2,915 18s. 10d. in developing, survey, and other expenses, making a total outlay on capital account of £4,533 11s. 3d. They wished to add to this amount a charge for interest and for salaries, but these were disallowed, and do not now come under consideration. The company laid out a township, and sold a number of lots, the payment of the purchase price being spread over a period of ten years, transfer not to be given until the full purchase price had been paid. The contract with the purchasers was conditioned that unless the instalments were duly paid the contract was to become null and void, the sale cancelled, and any amounts paid to be retained by the sellers as liquidated damages. The company made sales on these terms during the year ending 30th of June, 1904, to the extent of £32,000. A very large proportion of the purchasers, however, never took up the lots bought, and made no payments thereon. Some of these lots were resold. On the whole, the company received during the year only the sum of £3,750. Upon these figures the company contended that they had not yet made any profits, and were not liable to be assessed for income tax for the year ending 30th of June, 1904. The Commissioner for Taxes, however, made an assessment on the company under section 67 of Act No. 30, 1904, for the sum of £30,000 as the income of the company, arrived at by deducting the original purchase price of £2,000 of the property from the gross amount of the reported sales made during the year, and claimed £1,412 10s. as income tax thereon. The company, under section 72, objected to the assessment, when the Court of Review reduced the assessment to £435 17s., as income tax on £10,467, which the Court held to be a fair estimate of the income during the year. No information is given how these figures were arrived at, but it is submitted that the Court should settle the basis or principle on which the return was to be framed, and then the details could afterwards be settled. The contentions of the parties may be briefly summarised from the special case, and from the arguments of counsel as follows: For the Commissioner it was contended that the profits of a land company should be arrived at in the same way as the profits of any ordinary commercial trading business, and that in such a business the only accurate mode of arriving at income is by an account on a profit and loss, and not on a cash basis; that in such account the total sales should be brought up as a credit irrespective of whether or not the amount is paid in that period or not; and that the Act does not limit the word "income" to receipts. The Commissioner offered to allow a reasonable amount in respect of contracts which might possibly lapse, but claimed the right himself to fix what was reasonable. The applicants on the other hand contend that until they have covered their outlay they could not be said to have made any profits; and if they attempted to distribute to their shareholders any of the money received during the year they would be paying dividends out of capital, which was not allowable. If, however, they apportioned their whole outlay between property sold and that remaining unsold, then the cost of the lots sold would be £3,122, as against £3,750 received, which left a balance of £628, an amount under the taxable limit. The only statutory provisions to which we have been referred as bearing on this case are to be found in sections 42, 50, and 64 of Act No. 36, 1904. The 42nd section, which is the interpretation clause on this part of the Act, defines "income" to mean "any gains or profits derived or received by any company or person in any year, by any means from any source within this colony, and includes profits, gains, rents, interest, salaries, wages, allowances, pensions, stipends, charges, annuities, and all profits derived from mining or quarrying." Section 50, sub-section 5, enacts that "income shall be deemed to have accrued to a person within the meaning of this Act, though the same be not actually paid over to such person, but be credited in account or reinvested, or accumulated, or capitalised, or otherwise dealt with in his name, or on his behalf." Section 64, sub-section 9, provides that no deduction shall be made from the taxable amount in respect of "any debts owed to the taxpayer, except such as shall be proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioner to be bad or doubtful, and deductions for doubtful debts shall be made according to the value at which the Commissioner shall estimate same." Section 50 does not appear to me to bear on this case. It simply means that a person shall be taxed on all the income he makes in any one year, whether or not he receives and spends the whole of such income or reinvests any portion thereof. Section 64 was probably in the first instance intended to apply to traders and such-like, and to require that in making up their accounts they should include book debts or other outstanding claims among their assets. This was evidently the view originally taken by the Commissioner, for his first contention before the Court of Review was that the profits of a land company should be arrived at in the same way as the profits of any ordinary commercial trading business. The Court of Review, however, did not support this contention, but ruled, and in my opinion properly, that the question of the basis on which a return must be framed depends on the particular trade from which the income is derived. At any rate, this ruling is not now disputed on appeal. Taking this to be sound, looking at the special manner in which this company carries on its particular business, I think they are justified in not inserting in their account for 1903-1904 the amounts the payment of which is altogether contingent on the determination of purchasers of the several lots, and which amounts do not, on the contract of sale, appear to be immediately recoverable at law. As to the definition clause, these amounts have certainly not been "received" during the year, and whether or not they ever will be received in full the company cannot ascertain for ten years to come. Nor can I see how it can be said that these contingent amounts can be said to have been "derived" in the year 1903-1904. There may not be another pound paid to the company on these sales at all, and at any rate the total amount cannot be received for years, and it seems to me highly inequitable to assess the company now on the supposition that they have made large profits in this one year on their venture. When those profits are realised, then it will be time enough to assess them. The English Income Tax Statute is much more elaborate than is our Act, and contains more detailed rules for the guidance of the Commissioner; but I cannot find any rule or decision under the English Act which affords any assistance to this Court in deciding the question now raised. In Murray and Carter's carefully prepared treatise—"A Guide to Income Tax Practice"—a work which has reached the fourth edition, most cases have been discussed. The only one that I can find mentioned at all bearing on the subject is the Caledonian Copper Syndicate's case, which was heard in the Scottish Court of Session. There the company had acquired copper-bearing land in California for £24,000. They sold the same to a limited liability company for £300,000 in fully paid up shares. The profit was agreed to be £30,000, but the company contended that they had simply substituted capital in shares for capital in land, and that any benefit was a growth of capital and not of income, and that in any case tax was not payable till the shares had been realised. The company was held liable. We have no means of referring to the report of the case, but it would seem that the basis of the decision was that the company in its inception was formed with the object of making profits from the sale of its property, that it had sold its property, and that a profit had been made. Discussing a company of the same class as the appellant company, the writers of the treatise say: "A difficult question arises as to the liability to tax of a land development company. It is submitted that such a company must, at least, be bound by their own accounts, and if they allocate a portion of the proceeds of sales to profit and loss account, it must be paid upon, even though not distributed. We believe that in some cases nothing is taken to profit and loss account until as much is realised as the entire cost of the land. It is uncertain whether the Crown would consider themselves bound by such an account, but apparently there need not be any objection from their point of view, for, even if they allowed it, they would get tax on all proceeds after that time." In theory, of course, the tax is one levied only for the year, and it does not necessarily follow that it will be reimposed on every succeeding year. But, on the other hand, if that be the case, the tax should be limited to the profits ascertained in that year, and not levied on profits which can only be ascertained and realised in subsequent years. Moreover, the fundamental rule of construction of taxing measures is that in cases of reasonable doubt the construction most beneficial to the subject is to be adopted. A Statute which imposes a tax is always to be construed strictly. To use the words of Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, the subject is not to be taxed unless the language of the Statute clearly imposes the obligation. A construction, for example, which would have the effect of making a person liable to pay the same tax twice in respect of the same subject matter would not be adopted, unless the words were very clear and precise to that effect. That is one of the objections which appellants' counsel take to the method sought to be enforced by the Commissioner. Guided by these considerations, the conclusion I have arrived at is, that our Act does not justify the levying of any income tax upon the dealings of the appellant company, so far as they have gone, up to June, 1904. Land is a commodity which fluctuates in marketable value to an extraordinary extent, and until realisation takes place, it is impossible to arrive at what profits or what losses will result. When the profits are ascertained, if the tax is then still in existence, that will be the period to enforce payment. The Court will declare that the principle upon which the appellants have framed their statement of the 28th January, 1905 (Annexure B to statement of case) is correct, and, therefore, that they are not to be assessed for income tax during the year ending June 30, 1904, upon the amounts set forth in the various contracts of sale not received by the appellants within that year. The appellants will be entitled to their costs of appeal.

His Lordship added that Mr. Justice Maasdorp and Mr. Justice Hopley, who also sat in the appeal, concurred in the judgment.

DAY V. DAY.

Mr. Molteno asked leave to mention the matter of Day v. Day. Leave was granted to sue the defendant by edictal citation, and counsel produced an affidavit of plaintiff's attorney, which set out that the citation had been served. The plaintiff had proceeded to England to meet the defendant to endeavour to arrange the differences between the parties. Counsel applied to have the return day extended until the 1st November. Application granted.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

WOODHEAD, PLANT AND CO. { 1906.
V. CAPE TOWN TOWN { July 3rd.
COUNCIL. " 6th.

New street—Town Council regulations—Acts 26 of 1893 and 25 of 1897—Ultra vires.

The applicants had acquired certain contiguous lots of land within the Municipality of C., abutting on a street 20 feet wide, which had been laid out by the then owner of the property when he divided the land into lots in 1852, but had never been taken over by the Municipality. The applicants now wished to build on certain of these lots, but the respondents refused to sanction the building plans, on the ground that under the Council's regulations framed under Act 26 of 1893 the said street, being a "new street," must be at least 40 feet wide.

Held, that in terms of Act 25 of 1897, Sec. 1, the street was not a "new street," and that in so far as the Council's regulations went beyond the Act in defining a "new street," they were ultra vires, and hence that the Council had no power to insist on the widening of the street to 40 feet as a condition for passing the plans.

This was an application upon notice to the Town Council of Cape Town to show cause why the plan submitted for the erection of a certain store by the applicants on lots 21 and 22 of the original garden, Rustenberg, should not be passed, and why applicants should not be allowed to proceed with the erection of the proposed store, costs of this application to be paid by respondents.

From the affidavits it appeared that applicants had had plans prepared of a store to be erected in the vicinity of Hope-street and Roeland-street. Their ground consisted of a corner block, the road leading to which were about 20 feet wide, the thoroughfare in question being Percy-street and Glyn-street. The plans were submitted to the Town Council, but before this a letter was sent by the City Engineer to Messrs. Parker and Forsyth (the applicant's architects) to the effect that he regretted that he was unable to supply the desired information as to levels of the proposed streets, as no sub-division of the estate had been approved by the Council. Mr. Jeffreys (the Assistant City Engineer), in returning the plans to Messrs. Parker and Forsyth, said that he was unable to approve of the plans, as the only streets shown on the block plans were not in accordance with the municipal regulations as regarded width. Mr. Jeffreys called the architect's attention to regulation No. 4, which states that every new street intended for vehicular traffic shall be laid out, and formed so that the width shall be 40 ft. at least. The Town Clerk, in his affidavit, referred to certain tracings produced by Mr. W. Spivey Woodhead (one of the applicants), when he was a member of the Council, and he (the Town Clerk) denied that there had been any roads laid down, reserved, or set apart on the said estate, and, if the applicants now desired to have and maintain roads there, they must comply with the regulations of the Council. Mr. Woodhead, in an answering affidavit, said that the road shown upon the plan submitted by his firm to the Town Council in connection with the proposed building on lots 21 and 22 was laid out long before the Act of 1893 was passed and the building regulations promulgated pursuant to the powers contained therein. In the affidavits, it was stated that the original grant of the Rustenberg dated back to the seventeenth century, and that after certain deductions had been made, the garden Rustenberg remained.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., was for applicants; Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. McGregor) was for respondents.

Sir H. Juta said that the regulations in question were promulgated in 1896, pursuant to the Act of 1893, and applicant's case was that these streets were laid out as far back as 1852, and then there were other streets which went to show that it was physically impossible for applicants, unless they bought up certain buildings, to make those streets 40 feet wide.

Mr. Schreiner, in argument, said that the application was to force the Council to approve of a street with a width of only twenty feet. The Council said that a 40 ft. street should be shown, and the applicants asked the Court to say that a 20 ft. width would be enough. The applicants wanted the Council to bear the whole expense of making and maintaining the street. The idea never occurred to anyone, as had been suggested, that Woodhead, Plant and Co. should widen the road outside their own property. In 1889 an Act was passed which required that the sanction of the Council should be given to plans before land was sold in plots, but that Act had not been proclaimed in Cape Town. The Town Council was not bound by documents which were not in its own possession. If the Town Council were obliged in any case to follow old documents which were not in its possession, but in the Deeds Office, such a decision would have far-reaching results for the Council. The old road was fenced in by a wall, and there was nothing to show that there was a street except the old document which was in the Deeds Office. Again, it had not been shown that it had been used as a public road. There had never been any dedication of this road as a street. The applicants really wanted to get this order, and then to cause the Council to take over 20 ft. streets, and maintain them for vehicular traffic, and then applicants could drain in what would to them, no doubt, a very convenient way. Why the applicants should be granted a privilege that no one else in the Municipality was allowed and be permitted to override the regulations of the Council, he was unable to discover. He thought the Council were to be commended upon the position they had taken up in this matter.

Sir H. Juta, in reply, said that all the questions raised in the cases cited by his learned friend were dealt with in the recent case of Oranjezicht Estate v. Town Council (16, C.T.R., 388). What was laid down in that case was, he submitted, very sound law, and it was this, that provided your plans in all other respects complied with the Town Council regulations, the Council could not refuse to pass those plans in order to get some advantage which they were not legally entitled to insist upon, in other words, the Council could not refuse to allow the applicants' building plans to pass, because they wanted a 40 ft. road where they were not entitled to get a 40 ft. road. The whole question was whether the applicants were proposing to lay out a new street. They did not propose to lay out any streets; they said that there were streets shown on the sub-divisional plans. The Council's object really was to compel the applicants to pave and sewer these two streets. Take that away, and there was the applicants' offer of 40 ft., provided they were not to make up, pave, and gutter and sewer this street. The mere giving of 20 ft. of their property by the applicants would not satisfy the Council; they wanted Woodhead, Plant, and Co. to do all the kerbing and guttering and sewerage. That was the rock upon which the parties had split. The applicants said that this was an existing road or street. The Town Council could not at present show any subdivision of property put in since 1897, so that they could not fall back upon the Act of 1897 as yet, but the moment they could get a plan showing the streets laid down, and the regulation No. 4 made applicable thereto, then they said that, according to the judgment of the Court, this was a new street, it was not an existing street, and the Court ordered them to make this street 40 feet wide. If it were not an existing street at the present time, then it would only be shown as a street the moment there was some plan put in, and then the Council would fall back upon the Act of 1897, and say, "Now, then, you pave and gutter and sewer this street." That was the mode under which the Town Council wished to act in this case, and that, he submitted, was borne out by the affidavits, because the applicants were willing to give up 20 feet, but they were not willing to pave and sewer the street.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (July 6th).

Maasdorp, J.: It is desirable in this case in the first instance to ascertain what power the Council possess under Act 26 of 1893 and Act 25 of 1897, in respect of the streets in the City, without reference to the regulations made by them in pursuance of those Acts. Under section 110 of the earlier Act, the property in streets to which the inhabitants of the Municipality have a common right is vested in the Council. These streets it is the duty of the Council, under section 129, to keep in good repair, and they are empowered to make such new streets as may be necessary for the public use. For the purpose of making and improving streets certain powers of expropriation are conferred on the Council under section 175. In the first section of Act 25 of 1897, definitions are given of a "new street" and a "private street." The former is declared to mean any street hereafter shown on any plan of sub-division of a property, or any street hereafter sanctioned by the Council. And a "private street" is defined as meaning any street or road which has not been duly paved, and the maintenance of the carriage-way and foot-way whereof had not previously to this date been taken into charge and assumed by the Council. So far we find the Act dealing with public streets and private streets. New streets, laid out by private persons, and private streets, may also vest in the Council under section 6 of the Act, if dealt with under the provisions of sections 2, 3, and 4. We have, therefore, streets which were public streets when the Act was passed. New streets and private streets, which have become public streets by virtue of the Act, and new streets and public streets which are not public streets. Under section 170, sub-section 10, the Council may make rules for regulating the deposit for the Council's approval of plans by persons intending to lay out streets, and under sub-section 2 the Council may regulate the width and direction of new streets made by owners of private property. As the law now stands, no person can sub-divide his property and lay down new streets without the sanction of the Council, but the law does not in this respect interfere with private property, where no sub-division or new road is in contemplation. Under their regulations, however, the Council give a definition of the words "new street" which go far beyond the terms of the Act, and include existing streets. If this definition is only acted upon where the Council make use of their power of expropriation, then perhaps no fault can be found with it, but where it is resorted to for the purpose of extending the powers conferred on them by the law in respect of new streets as defined by the Acts, the action of the Council would be ultra vires. If a "new street" is defined, as is done in the rules, as a street, the maintenance of the footways or roadways which had not previously to the approval of these regulations been taken into charge by the Council, then such definition might include the road in question, but in that case I am of opinion that the definition, unless given in contemplation of expropriation, would be ultra vires. This contention was not raised by counsel on behalf of the respondents, but it seems to me that the point does arise, and requires to be disposed of. The question arises, under what description does the street in question fall? It appears from the affidavits that in the year 1852 the owner of the land in question divided it into lots, abutting upon a street laid out for the use of the purchasers of the lots, and sold the lots to various buyers. Only one or two of these lots were built upon, and after passing through the hands of different persons, all of them were ultimately bought up by the applicant, who now proposes to build upon some of the lots. He has submitted his building plans to the respondents, who refuse to pass them upon the ground that the applicant is contemplating the construction of a new road, and that until he has obtained the approval of the Council to the construction of such road, he cannot proceed. The respondent's claim that under their 4th regulation this road shall be of the width of forty feet. The applicant replies that the street was laid out in 1852, and does not fall under the definition of a "new street" as defined in the Acts, or even in the first portion of the definition as given in the regulations. He says he is not contemplating the sub-division of his property, and laying down a new street, seeing that he merely claims to act as the owner of lots abutting upon a street, to which he makes no claim as owner, and that he has no land to sub-divide. If this is correct, then, in my opinion, the street is not such a new street as is contemplated by the Acts. The respondents, however, contend that it was always within the power of the owners of the lots in question, and of the applicant as the holder of all the lots, to appropriate the street, and so extinguish the right of way over it. It is said on their behalf that the street was never really used as such, and cannot be said now to exist as a street. But it seems to me it must be taken to be a street for the use of the owners of lots, until it is proved they have in some way lost their right. The mere non-user of the street, which has not been proved in this case, without any adverse user by others, cannot deprive the owners of the lots of their rights, and the applicant, who has become the owner of all the lots in common, is now entitled to the use of the street. Nothing has been done since 1852 to deprive the street of its character as a street. The street is not a new street, in my opinion, and the respondents cannot claim, without expropriation, to have it widened to forty feet. It is not necessary for me to decide whether it is an old "public street" or an old "private street," because in either case, if the Council desire to widen it, expropriation would be necessary. I should be inclined to hold that it is the latter rather than the former, but a decision upon that point, which was not directly raised in this case, might involve issues going beyond the present application. It is only necessary to declare that the respondents are not entitled to withhold their consent to the passing of the building plans submitted by the applicant upon the ground that the street is a new street, which they can oblige the applicant to lay out and form so that the width thereof shall be forty feet at the least. Armed with this declaration, the applicant will be in a position to submit his plans to the Council for further consideration. The respondents must pay the costs.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

TRIAL CAUSE.

OHLSOON'S CAPE BREWERIES.) 1906.
LTD. V. VAN SCHOOR.) July 3rd.

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs to recover from the defendant £66 10s. 6d., the cost of a certain amount of beer supplied.

The declaration set that between May and September, 1905, plaintiff supplied quantities of beer, the cost of which amounted to £150 9s. The defendant paid sums of money on account, and, further, he was entitled to be credited with certain discounts. The payments and discounts amounted to £83 19s. 6d., leaving a balance due of £66 10s. The defendant, the plea set out, was a butcher, baker, and general dealer, trading at Malmesbury. He admitted purchasing and receiving beer from the plaintiffs to the value of £8 8s. 6d., but denied that he received the other consignments.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan was for the plaintiffs, and Mr. Burton was for the defendant.

Samuel Helm, hotel-keeper, who formerly kept the Commercial Hotel, but subsequently bought the Central Hotel at Malmesbury, stated that in February, 1904, he went insolvent, and Ohlssons were creditors. In May witness asked defendant to give his name in order that he might get liquors to carry on the business. One of the orders included one to the plaintiffs for beer. The order was signed by the defendant, and witness paid for the first consignment. About a month later the defendant gave witness authority to get more beer, but requested witness to alter the address, so that the letters would be sent to the manager of the Central Hotel, in order that the letters would not reach defendant's house. The defendant was aware that witness was ordering further consignments in his (defendant's) name. The letters were always addressed to Van Schoor, although witness opened the majority of them. The defendant only took up the position that he was not liable when he got the letter of demand.

Samuel Helm, son of the last witness, stated that he remembered the defendant asking his father to have the letters and invoice addressed to the manager of the Central Hotel, as he did not wish his wife to see them. He never heard the defendant say that he was not liable.

Cecil White Harry, manager of Ohlsson's Cape Breweries, stated that the firm had an order from Van Schoor, which, however, he could not trace. The firm never had any intimation from the defendant that he was not liable.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: He took it in the ordinary course of business that Van Schoor was running the hotel.

Mr. Buchanan closed his case.

Melick Jacobus van Schoor, the defendant, stated that, at the request of Helm, he wrote three letters to Ohlssons, White, Ryan and Co., and Bosman, Powis and Co., ordering certain goods. He denied that he requested Helm to have the letters addressed to the Central Hotel. He had his own accounts from White, Ryan and Co. and Bosman, Powis and Co., and he noticed embodied there an account for goods supplied to the Central Hotel, and he wrote telling them not to continue doing so. Witness did not settle these accounts. He did not give Helm any authority to use his name.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: If Helm used witness's name, with the exception of the first order, he did it wrongly. He never saw the first account, nor did he trouble about it.

Having heard Mr. Buchanan on the facts,

Without calling upon Mr. Burton, Hopley, J.: I do not think with the view I take of the facts of the case it is necessary to call upon Mr. Burton to argue for the defendant. Not because I think that the plaintiffs have not proved absolutely their bona fides in the case, for they have proved that they have delivered these goods at the Central Hotel, Malmesbury, and the sum they are now suing for is due by somebody. There is nothing unnatural in the defendant going to Helm and saying he would start him with a batch of supplies. Under the circumstances, and the conflict of evidence between the defendant and Helm, it seems to me the judgment should be one of absolution from the instance, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

SHEPPY V. BARRY BROTHERS. { 1906.
July 4th.

This was an argument upon an exception taken by defendants to plaintiff's declaration. Mr. Benjamin was for ex-pi-cients (defendants in the action); Dr. Greer was for respondent (plaintiff in the action).

The plaintiff (Walter Henry Sheppy) in his declaration said that he was a commercial traveller and agent, residing presently at Cape Town. Defendants were Barry Brothers, carrying on business at Robertson. Plaintiff came to this country from England in or about February, 1905, on account of his health, and to act for certain four English firms in furniture and allied trades. In addition, and while acting as representative of those firms, he was also in the employment of one Fritz Boldt, a waterworks contractor, of Robertson, as his book-keeper and cashier. On December 15, 1905, he received from Boldt £3 14s. 2d., with instructions to pay the same to the defendants in settlement of an account due to them from Boldt. The defendant duly paid the said sum on Decem-br 16, and he received a receipt therefor, which was subsequently mislaid. Defendants thereafter, on January 24, 1906, furnished to Boldt an account containing the item which plaintiff had already paid on behalf of his employers. Although the defendants well knew that their cash register on December 16 showed an almost similar amount, viz., £3 14s. 6d., to have been paid, they declared that it had been paid on December 14. The said Boldt subsequently paid the account in full. In consequence of the defendants' wrongful and malicious denial of receipt of the aforesaid sum, the said Boldt instituted criminal proceedings against plaintiff for theft by means of conversion of the sum of £3 14s. 2d. Plaintiff was placed under arrest, and a preliminary examination was held before the R.M. of the district of Robertson in February, 1906. As a result of the preparatory examination the Attorney-General declined to prosecute. Plaintiff had since found the receipt given to him by defendants or their agents in acknowledgment of the payment of the said sum, to which receipt he craved leave to refer at the trial. He claimed against the defendants damages in the sum of £500.

Defendants excepted to the declaration that it was vague, uncertain, and embarrassing, and disclosed no ground of action.

Mr. Benjamin said he took it that what was meant by the words "wrongful arrest" in the declaration was false imprisonment. To take, first of all, the case of false imprisonment and malicious prosecution. In order to found an action for false imprisonment or malicious prosecution, the person against whom an action was instituted must be the person who put either the executive or judicial functionaries in motion. The mere making a statement to a person who may institute proceedings did not render that person liable. There must be, he submitted, an act on the part of the defendant, whereby he put either the executive or the judicial functionaries in operation. There was a mistake, and, surely, the shopkeepers could not be held liable for having stated that to the best of their knowledge the amount had not been paid. Barry Bros. could not be held liable for damages for false imprisonment or malicious prosecution, but he submitted that they were much less liable under the alternative prayer for damages, for having subjected the plaintiff to prosecution owing to the gross neglect or carelessness of defendants or their servants.

Dr. Greer submitted that the defendants were clearly liable. This prosecution of plaintiff was the direct result of the defendants' denial that the payment had been made to them; it was in consequence of that denial plaintiff was subjected to false imprisonment and malicious prosecution. It did not matter whether they were directly the persons who instituted a prosecution or whether they acted through an agent. It was clear in this case that the employer, Boldt, acted in a perfectly bona fide manner throughout the transaction. There must be a remedy for the injury the plaintiff had sustained, and there were only two parties who could possibly be responsible. The employer, it was clear, was not liable. It was the natural and inevitable outcome of the act of the defendants that this prosecution took place, and they were responsible. Even if the first prayer of the declaration was not a good prayer, counsel contended that the second prayer was sufficiently wide to cover this particular case.

Buchanan, J.: The defendants in this case carry on business at Robertson. One Boldt was a customer of theirs, and bought certain things from the defendants' shop. Boldt gave the plaintiff the sum of £3 14s. 2d. to pay to the defendants in this case. The plaintiff said that he paid this amount, and obtained a receipt for it, which was mislaid. The defendants, however, did not seem to have had in their books any record of this payment, although their cash register showed that an amount nearly similar was paid in on this date. Not finding anything to connect this amount with the actual amount, which was alleged to have been paid, they denied that they had received the money. They sent Boldt an account for these and other items, and Boldt then paid the defendants the full amount of the account. Thereafter, Boldt, not the defendants—without any instigation on the part of the defendants, without any request on the part of the defendants, without any mandate or agency on the part of the defendants—Boldt afterwards went and laid a criminal charge against the plaintiff in this case, and had him arrested and subjected to criminal prosecution for not having paid over this sum of £3 14s. 2d. This prosecution was not persisted in, the case fell through, and the plaintiff now wishes to sue the defendants for damages for wrongful arrest and prosecution. Now, I cannot see how the defendants in this case can possibly be held liable for the wrongful arrest and malicious prosecution by Boldt of the plaintiff in this case. It seems, according to the declaration, to have been quite a spontaneous act by Boldt, not an act instigated in any way by defendants, and, therefore, it is impossible to hold them liable in an action of this kind. But it is said there is an alternative prayer for damages for the plaintiff having been subjected to arrest and criminal prosecution owing to the gross neglect and carelessness of the defendants or their employees. Well, as to the question of neglect, it appears that the plaintiff received the receipt from the defendants' employees for this money, and it is as much neglect on his part to have mislaid the receipt, and not produced it, which would have shown at once that the money had been paid. There is no cause of action disclosed in this case, and the exception must be allowed, with costs.

ESTATE CASTLES V. SOUTHERN LIFE ASSOCIATION.

This was an argument on an exception taken by the defendant company to the plaintiff's declaration. Mr. Upington was for excipiens (defendants in the action); Mr. W. Porter Buchanan was for respondent (plaintiff in the action).

The declaration stated that the plaintiff is the widow and executrix testamentary of the late Joseph William Castles, in his lifetime residing at Montagu, and the defendant company carries on in Cape Town and elsewhere the business of mutual life, sickness, and accident insurance. Deceased was insured with the company against bodily injury by violent, accidental, external, and visible means. It was stipulated in the policy that in case such injury should within three calendar months of injury directly cause death the company would pay to the representative of the insured a sum of £1,000. On the 5th February, 1904, while the policy was of full force and effect, the late J. W. Castles was injured by a bite from a poisonous insect, and died on March 5, 1904, his death being directly caused by the said bite. This being within the meaning of the policy, she claimed payment of £1,000.

To this declaration the defendant company excepted as follows: "Before pleading to the declaration, the defendant company excepts thereto on the ground that the same discloses no cause of action (1) that even assuming the facts alleged in paragraph 5 as to the injury and the death of the insured are correct, the said facts do not constitute a cause within the meaning of the policy as set forth in paragraph 4, so as to render the defendant company liable; (2) furthermore, and even if any cause of action did accrue to the plaintiff, she is now prevented and barred from bringing the same by virtue of the provisions of clauses 7 and 8 of the conditions endorsed on the policy, to which the defendant company crave leave to refer."

Buchanan, J., said that the Court could not possibly hear the second part of the exception. It was not really an exception, but a plea in bar, and the only way in which it could be brought before the Court was by the plaintiff pleading it in bar.

Mr. Upington pointed out that the parties were desirous of saving expense as far as possible, and of having the matter determined in this way.

Buchanan, J., said that it was an irregular mode of procedure on exception.

After hearing counsel further,

Buchanan, J., said that, by consent, the policy would be considered to be annexed to the declaration, but the exception would be limited to the question as to whether the declaration disclosed a cause of action.

Mr. Upington said that in the first place he took the objection that by the terms of the policy the insured was indemnified against any bodily injury caused by violent, accidental, external, and visible means, with certain provisos. The plaintiff's husband was injured by the bite of a poisonous insect. Clearly such an injury was never contemplated in an accident policy of this kind. The main objection, however, that he had to take was that the plaintiff had not complied with the conditions 7 and 8, endorsed on the policy. If appeared from the declaration that the insured had the accident relied upon on the 5th February, 1904, and that he died on the 5th March, 1904. Summons was only issued in May of this year. Under condition No. 8 it was necessary for the plaintiff to either proceed to arbitration, if she made demand within six months, or to proceed to action within twelve months. He submitted that that was the proper construction of the clause in question. Now, it did not appear that plaintiff had made demand for arbitration, and what did appear was that she had not proceeded with her action or taken steps to have a settlement agreed upon or ascertained in terms of condition 8.

Mr. Buchanan submitted that, on the authority of Marsdorf v. the Accident Company (88 Law Times Reports, 330), the cause of death in this case clearly brought the claim within the meaning of the policy.

Buchanan, J., said that counsel need not dwell on that part of the exception.

Mr. Buchanan submitted that the conditions 7 and 8 were by no means clearly drawn, so as to be comprehensible to the ordinary individual. The company did not tell the insured in clear words to make a demand for arbitration, but they made him labour under the impression that if he sent a demand for the claim they could insist upon arbitration if they liked, and oust him from coming to the Court, and then they said if he did not claim an arbitration within six months then they were to go scot free. It was a most unheard of condition. He thought if it were brought to the notice of the public very few people would insure in a company like this. It was unconscionable that a company should hold such a condition in terrorem over the heads of their clients. He submitted that this was a case in which equitable relief should be granted, inasmuch as the defendants were seeking to enforce an unconscionable bargain.

Buchanan, J.: The late Mr. Castles was insured with the Southern Life Insurance Company against injury caused by violent, accidental, external and visible means. While this policy was still in force, the declaration alleges, on the 5th February, 1904, Mr. Castles was injured by the bite of a poisonous insect, the bite caused disease, and from this bite and disease he died on the 5th March, 1904, and this death was practically caused by the bite, and they allege that it is within the meaning of the policy. Defendants took exception to this allegation on the ground that the injury and cause of death are not within the meaning of the policy. On this point, as far as the exception stands, I take it that the exception is bad. Injuries by bite of a poisonous insect, or a poisonous reptile, or a poisonous animal, would all be within the meaning of "violent, accidental, and external injury," and, had the exception rested on the declaration alone, it would have had to be overruled. But the parties have agreed to annex the policy to the declaration so that the conditions on which it was granted should be considered part of the declaration, and could be relied on as supporting the exception that no cause of action was disclosed on the declaration. In effect, the second part of the exception founded on the conditions is that the right of recovery on this policy, by the conditions under which it was issued, expired twelve months from the date of the occurrence of the accident. It is a condition of the policy which I think is a fair and reasonable condition put in an accident policy, that if a person who is injured allows twelve months to go without taking proceedings against the company, then he is supposed to have forfeited his right. It is true the declaration alleges that all things have happened, all conditions have been performed, and all times have elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiff to demand payment of the sum insured, but, in face of the express wording of this condition, there must be something more than a general allegation of that kind to show that the plaintiff is still entitled to take an action against the defendant company. The second part of the exception, founded upon the 7th condition, will, therefore, be sustained, and the declaration, as it stands, will be held not to disclose a cause of action, but leave will be granted to the plaintiff to amend her declaration by adding anything to show why the 7th condition of this policy should not apply to this case. It may be the conduct of the insurance company would be such as to justify the Court in holding that they cannot now rely upon this condition.

Mr. Buchanan: Would it not be possible to put it in the replication?

[Buchanan, J.: I cannot go beyond the declaration. I hold there is nothing in the declaration at present to show why this condition should not apply. What about costs?]

Mr. Upington: I understand that it has been arranged that there should be no order as to costs.

[Buchanan, J.: I think that is only fair, because if the exception had been tried as it stood, without any consent on the part of the respondent, the matter would have been overruled. No order as to costs.]

GENERAL MOTIONS.

BULAWAYO MUNICIPALITY
V. BULAWAYO WATER-WORKS CO., LTD. { 1906.
July 4th.

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan moved, on the petition of both parties, for leave to appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice Vincent in the High Court of Southern Rhodesia. Owing to the length of the record, it had been impossible to get the same ready within the time required by the Rules of Court, and an extension of time was sought.

The time for lodging the appeal was extended to three months from this date, costs of application to be costs in appeal.

AFRICAN HOMES TRUST V. GLASGOW.

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan applied for an extension of the order granted by the Court in this matter on last provisional day. He said that provisional sentence was granted on a mortgage bond, and the property was declared executable, but plaintiff omitted to ask to have the rents accruing attached by the Sheriff.

[Buchanan, J.: You can add to the other order that when the property is attached the rents accruing be attached.]

Ex parte GUSE.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan moved for a certain rule nisi to be made absolute, calling upon Johan Carel Winterbach to show cause why petitioner should not sue him in forma pauperis to recover £115 16s. 2d., with interest, being the amount due to petitioner out of the estate of the late Johanna Guse, held on trust by him.

Mr. Gutsche (for respondent) appeared to show cause, and read an affidavit by respondent, who said that petitioner was one of four minor children, of whom he was tutor testamentary. He did not deny that the money was owing to the petitioner, but he said that he was unable to pay it at present, as certain moneys owing to him by another person were still unpaid. He added that he had made an arrangement with the petitioner as to payment of the money, but that another party had exercised influence over her, with the result that the present proceedings had been commenced.

Buchanan, J.: The rule will be made absolute. There is no defence. On summons being taken out, the respondent ought to allow judgment by default. Leave to sue will be granted Mr. Buchanan to be counsel, and Mr. P. M. Cloete attorney for the plaintiff.

Outspan—Municipality—Prescription—Occupation pro domino —Occupation ex mandato et pro bono publico.

The Municipality of P. claimed to have acquired by prescription a certain piece of land situated within the said Municipality. This land had been in 1817 set apart as a public outspan and grazing ground, and the defendant now claimed to resume control over it under Act 41 of 1902. In 1840 the then village of Paarl was constituted a municipality, and there was evidence that, at all events from 1859, the Municipal Council has exercised control over the said land and made certain profits therefrom by sales of manure and of trees and timber either sown by others, or, in later years, by themselves. In 1882 a certain firm received from the Municipality leave to lay a private railway line across a portion of the land in question.

Held, that (1) the Municipal Council were acting intra vires in assuming control over the said land for municipal purposes; (2) That their conduct did not necessarily shew that they claimed it pro domino and that the presumption was that they were controlling it only pro bono publico; (3) That a duly constituted outspan cannot be alienated by the Crown, and (semble) that it cannot be acquired by prescription; (4) That even if it were capable of prescription, there had been no adverse user for the period of prescription so as to deprive the public of their rights; (5) That the Municipality, having treated the land as an outspan, having acknowledged it as such on more than one occasion, and having acknowledged that the Crown was the owner thereof, they had never possessed it pro domino for the requisite period of prescription.

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs for a declaration of rights with regard to a certain piece of ground falling within the boundary of the municipality.

The plaintiff's declaration was as follows: (1) The plaintiff is the Municipal Council of the Paarl, which was constituted a municipality in 1840, under the provisions of Ordinance 9 of 1836, and is now governed by Act No. 45 of 1892. (2) Within the limits of the said municipality is a piece of land, which is cut into two parts by the main line of railway running from Cape Town to Wellington, and is bounded on the north and west by land originally granted to P. Roux in 1817, part of which is now owned by A. J. Louw and others, and the remainder by the Paarl Spirit Distillery Co., under an amended grant of May, 1901; on the south by the farm De Zoeti Inval, granted to J. R. Louw in 1827, and on the east by land granted to C. H. Paulsen in 1817, and the aforesaid land granted to the said P. Roux. Various parts of the said land have been called and known as the outspan, the pasturage of the outspan, and the race-course.

3. For a period longer than the period of prescription the inhabitants of the said municipality by themselves, and through their duly constituted Municipal Council, have uninterruptedly and as of right enjoyed the use of and occupied the said land as their property and exercised full rights of ownership and control over the said land as against all persons, including the Divisional Council of the Paarl.

4. By virtue of the premises the said land is land the property in which the inhabitants of the Paarl Municipality have, and have acquired, a common right, and is vested in the plaintiff Council, and on the 17th August, 1905, the plaintiff Council applied to the Government of the Cape Colony for formal title to the said land.

5. On the 18th of October, 1905, the said Government, without any previous notice to the plaintiff Council, gave notice to the latter that the Governor in Council had been pleased to sanction, in terms of sub-section 1 of section 3 of Act No. 41 of 1902, the resumption of certain land, which includes the aforesaid piece of land, as outspan ground, as being ground no longer used or required for outspan purposes, and the said Government now refuses to grant the aforesaid title, and claims that the said land is the property of the said Government, and that the plaintiff Council and the inhabitants of the Paarl Municipality have no rights to the said piece of land other than can be claimed by the public generally by virtue of the land being a public outspan, and that the control can be resumed by the said Government, and that the latter can dispose of the same as it pleases under the laws for the time being regulating the disposal of Crown Lands, and the said Government does claim to dispose of it and to exercise acts of ownership thereover.

6. For a period longer than the period of prescription, and for the period as far as the records of the said Paarl Divisional Council go, the said piece of land has never been under the control of the said Divisional Council, but has been under the control of the plaintiff Council, and used and owned as alleged in paragraph 3 hereof, and the plaintiff Council contends that by reason of the premises the alleged resumption under Act 41 of 1902 is ultra vires and illegal, and that the said piece of land is vested in it.

Wherefore the plaintiff Council prays: (a) For a declaration that the said piece of land is vested in it; (b) that it is entitled to have formal title issued to the said land; (c) that the resumption of the said land under Act 41 of 1902 is illegal and of no force or effect; (d) alternate relief; (e) costs of suit.

The defendant's plea was as follows:

1. The defendant admits paragraphs 1, 2, and 5 of the declaration, save that he denies that no notice of intention to resume the land referred to was given to the plaintiff Council previous to the 18th October, 1905.

2. The said land is Crown land, which, prior to the 1st July, 1817, was set apart by the Government as and for a public outspan and grazing-ground in connexion therewith, and was, at the said date and thereafter, until the date of the resumption referred to in paragraph 5 aforesaid, a public outspan-ground, and used as such by those of the public who required the same for that purpose. Save as aforesaid, the defendant denies paragraph 2.

3. He admits that the plaintiff Council applied for a title to the said land on the 17th August, 1905, but otherwise denies paragraph 4.

4. He denies paragraph 6, and says specially that the control of the said land has been vested by statute in the Divisional Council of the Paarl since the 13th August, 1889.

5. On the 29th June, 1905, notice of the intention of the Governor to resume the said outspan-ground in terms of section 3, sub-section 1, of Act 41 of 1902, was published in the "Government Gazette," and on the 30th September, 1905, the provisions of the said section having been duly complied with, the said ground was resumed by the Governor in terms thereof.

Wherefore the defendant prays that the plaintiff's claim may be dismissed, with costs.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Burton), was for the plaintiffs; and Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Howel Jones), was for the defendants.

Mr. Schreiner pointed out at this stage that he would contend that the claim of the Municipality was a bad one, and that the ground could not be claimed legally by prescription.

Sir H. Juta: It is a pity the point was not raised on the pleadings.

[Hopley, J.: Many things come into this Court that are a pity.]

Mr. Schreiner: It is a pity the time of the Court should be wasted in hearing evidence when it may ultimately be found out that in law there is no claim at all. The Government, I contend, has the right of resumption, and the Municipality cannot set up a claim of prescription.

Hopley, J., thought it would be better to go on with the evidence.

For the plaintiffs,

Chas. John Pritchard, land surveyor, who surveyed the land first of all on behalf of the Government, stated that he framed the diagram of the various lots for which the plaintiffs applied to the Government for title.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He was called in to survey the ground because the railway wanted the ground for maintenance and employees houses.

Hans Heese, Secretary of the Divisional Council of the Paarl since November, 1900, stated the records of the Council went back to 1858. The Government sent a Mr. Brinck down to inspect the records, which did not show that the Divisional Council ever exercised any rights over this ground. Since he was secretary the Council never treated the ground as an outspan over which they had any control.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: His Council, as far as he knew, never exercised any control over any outspan within the municipality. The impression the Council had was that an outspan within the municipal area was not their business. He did not remember seeing the notice in the "Gazette" in June, 1905, of the intention of the Government to resume the piece of ground in question, as it was no longer required for outspan purposes.

Septimus P. H. de Villiers, Mayor of the Paarl, stated he had lived there since 1892, but he had known the Paarl for fourteen years. In 1899 there was a fire and the minutes of the Council prior to 1859 destroyed. From 1859 the records it would appear showed that the Council exercised control over this ground. All the minutes referring to people cutting wood referred to this particular portion of the racecourse. During his time the municipality exercised all control over the ground. Public sales were held of the wood by the municipality. The outspan of the Divisional Council was about a mile from this place. In 1902 the municipality gave permission to the Post Office to remove certain trees on the west side of the land in question, which tended to interfere with the telegraph wires. The Council also gave permission to hold picnics in the forest. During the time he was a councillor he never knew of this piece of ground being used as an outspan.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: The municipality had a commonage, which was granted in 1838. Until 1902 there was no power given the Government to resume a public outspan. The first time there was reference in the minutes to the planting of trees on the racecourse was in 1878. He did not know that the railway Department wanted a couple of small pieces of land long before August, 1905. He did not see the notice in the "Government Gazette" of June, 1905, of the Government's intention to resume the ground. In his opinion the control exercised over the ground gave the municipality the right to it. He never knew that the municipality did anything adverse to the Government's rights.

Re-examined by Sir H. Juta: As a municipality they controlled only things that were municipal. Witness was not prepared to argue the legal question, and he agreed that that was what counsel was briefed for. The council all along dealt with this land as if it was their own.

Peter Christian le Roux, 66 years of age, and born in the Paarl, stated he was a member of the Divisional Council from 1873 to 1891. The Divisional Council never had anything to do with ground, but looked upon it as under municipal control. The proper outspan was outside this piece of ground. It was some time in the fifties that the last races were held. The grazing was bad on the piece of ground in question. In 1877 witness became a member of the municipality, and continued in office until 1883 or 1884. In the early seventies sales of the wood from this ground was quite a usual thing. The municipality dealt with the wood as they pleased.

Mr. Le Roux, in re-examination, said that after he became a councillor they had sales of wood. The minutes would show when the sales were arranged. To the best of his recollection they had sales, publicly, even before he became a councillor. There were also private sales.

Gideon Joshua Malherbe, aged 73 years, and Byers Johannes Louw, aged 56, gave evidence to the effect that the ground was always under the control of the Municipality.

In re-examination Louw said that Mr. Louw owned the land to the east of that claimed, and Mr. Conroy owned that to the south. Witness did not know much about the sale of wood.

In reply to Sir H. Juta, the witness said the racecourse had no water on it. He was living in the Municipality, and by virtue of his right grazed his cattle on this land. Witness never understood it to be an outspan. He always believed that his property was bounded by the racecourse.

[Hopley, J.: According to a letter here, your father called his an outspan?—J do not know of it.

Jacob I. de Villiers, 61 years of age, stated he had been a Commissioner of the Paarl Municipality, and was Mayor for a considerable period. He was born in and had always lived at the Paarl. He had always known the place in dispute as the Paarl Racecourse, and as a boy attended race meetings there. Shortly before the railway came the races stopped.

[Hopley, J.: Did the railway coming stop the races?]

Witness: It was partly the railway and partly clerical feeling.

[Hopley, J.: But if you wanted to hold your races there after the railway came, you could have done so, because you had another 44 morgen.]

Witness: It was not altogether clerical feeling, because races were afterwards held at a place between Lady Grey Bridge and the Paarl, and they are now held at Klappmuts. Witness (continuing) said that when he first became a councillor there were trees planted. The municipality claimed the land, and used to sell the trees, and in that way exercised their proprietary rights. During the time he was a councillor it was found that the Klein Drakenstein people sent their cattle on the land for grazing, and a man was appointed by the Municipal Council to look after the place. A good deal of tree pilfering went on as well, and those who were caught were fined by the municipality. The cattle owned in the municipality were grazed on this place, but that stopped when the trees grew up that were planted in 1877. Witness did not know this place as an outspan.

In cross-examination, witness said he was first of all Mayor in 1892. Witness at that time took a close interest in the work of the Council, and signed the minute-book. If witness signed the minutes they were correct. He would not have signed them unless they were correct. Therefore if he signed the minutes containing the following resolution it must be correct: "The secretary is requested to ascertain whether the racecourse has been granted to anybody by the Government, and, if not, to make application to the Government for the ground to plant trees on." The object of that resolution was to see if the Council had any formal claim to the ground.

Witness (continuing) said that in 1879 he saw old trees on this place, trees that appeared to have been planted by the hand of man. The trees that were cut by the Fir Bush Syndicate appeared to have been wind sown.

Mr. J. C. Krige stated that when a boy he herded cattle on the ground in question. They were his father's cattle. Police employed by the Municipal Council took charge of the place and prevented people from pilfering the timber. Witness purchased timber from the Municipal authorities in 1872, and paid them for it.

In cross-examination, the witness stated that there were not many trees in 1872, when he picked out the plantation. The trees that he cut were not planted trees. Witness was about 12 or 14 years of age at the time he herded cattle, which was 1854. Witness's father was a carrier, and was allowed to keep cattle on the place. Witness, when herding the cattle, saw convicts planting near Louw's boundary. There was no railway in those days. The last race meeting was held about 1855. Witness remembered it, because his father kept horses. In those days the Magistrate was Mr. Breda. He was very fond of tree-planting, and had the high road planted. Mr. Breda controlled the prisoners.

Mr. Schreiner: These convicts were all short service men, were they not? The long sentence men would be on the Breakwater?

[Hopley, J.: Was there a Breakwater then?]

Mr. Schreiner: I mean they were not long service men, and they would be engaged on the making of paths and passages.

In reply to His Lordship, the witness said he was asked by the councillors to pick up the fir seeds.

[Hopley, J.: Who were they?]

Witness: I cannot remember. They're all dead.

[Hopley, J.: But your memory is not dead.]

Witness: I forget them all.

[Hopley, J.: Are you sure it was not the constable who asked you to collect them?]

Witness: No, my lord. It was the commissioners.

Mr. Schreiner: How do you know it was the commissioners when you don't remember their names?

Witness: I know it was the commissioners. Continuing, witness said that in 1872 he bought 100 trees at 7s. 6d. for three. He applied to the commissioners, and paid for them as he cut them down. He attended the meeting of the Council to get permission.

Mr. Schreiner: Are you quite sure that this was in 1872?

Witness: It may have been in 1875. Continuing, he said the books of the Council would show that he purchased wood.

Mr. Schreiner: It is very peculiar that your name is not mentioned in the Council books as having purchased wood either in 1872 or 1875?—I got receipts from them.

Mr. Schreiner: But might it not have been in 1876 or 1878?—No, it was about 1875.

In reply to Sir H. Juta, the witness said that if the cash book of the Council showed that he paid 30s. for wood in 1875 it would refer to the trees in question.

Mr. Enslin, who was secretary of the Paarl Municipality from 1882 to 1889, stated that before that period he was a clerk in the office. He knew the ground in question in the 'sixties. In the late 'fifties he went through the country with his father as a trader. Witness remembered the railway being constructed. Witness had never seen people outspanning on the racecourse, but he had seen cattle rested on the spot where the trees were growing. He did not see any cattle grazing there. Witness always understood the Municipal Council controlled this land. The trees were trimmed by direction of the Municipal Council, and the trimmings were sold by auction. Witness, in his capacity as secretary to the Municipality, looked after the place the same as he would have looked after his own property. During the time witness was secretary, there might have been prosecutions for cutting the trees. There were overseers on the place to look after it. He did not think the Municipality had a right to fine these people. Witness often told them that.

Sir H. Juta: But they did not agree with you?

Witness: No. If they did not pay the fine, they would be taken to the Magistrate's Court.

Sir H. Juta: This was under the regulations?

Witness: No, there were no regulations.

Mr. Schreiner: The fact of the matter is, this fining was a sort of compromise to prevent their being brought before the Magistrate?—Yes.

In cross-examination, witness said Sir Pieter Faure was secretary of the Municipality before he was. From all appearances he kept his minutes correctly. Witness always described the point running out from the race course as an outspan. In witness's time the Municipal Council went in a good deal for tree-planting. If any trees were sold it should have appeared on the minutes.

Septimus de Villiers (recalled) produced a minute of 1868 of a meeting of the Municipality, in which a letter was read from an employee named Nicholls, asking for an increase of salary. The cash-book showed the amount received for wood sold. The minute-book showed applications for wood and the appointment of a committee to deal with the intending purchasers.

A resident (74 years of age) stated that he had lived at the Paarl all his life. From his childhood he had known the ground in question as the racecourse. He never knew it was an outspan. During all the time he had known the ground, it was under the control of the Municipality.

Hans Heese (recalled) stated there was nothing in the minutes of the Divisional Council to show that they exercised any control over the outspans within the Municipality.

Counsel for the plaintiffs put in the Municipal Regulations for 1840 and 1865, and this concluded the case for the plaintiffs.

Chas. Shaw Nicholson, Civil Commissioner and Resident Magistrate of the Paarl, and in that capacity chairman of the Divisional Council, produced the plan which belonged to the Divisional Council. The plan, he stated, was hung up for the information of the Divisional Council. The plan was compiled in the office of the Surveyor-General. There was no public outspan at Klipheuvcl. There was an outspan outside the Paarl, but it was not within the control of the Municipality. As Civil Commissioner, he received notice of resumption from the Government, and he brought it before the Council.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: The general impression was that the outspan at Klipheuvcl was a public one.

Henry van Reenen, of the Surveyor-General's Department, stated that outspans were constituted by proclamation. There was a reservation on the map for an outspan. There was a great difference between old grants and new grants. The owner of the land, as a rule, appointed his own surveyor.

A. Hall Cornish Bowden, Surveyor-General of the Cape Colony, stated that since a formal claim was made he had taken the matter in hand. The claim against the Government began through the Railway Department making a claim for land in February, 1904. There was no trace in his office of this piece of land as an outspan before 1817. Then there was no trace of the land being granted as a racecourse. The Municipality, as far as he knew, made no claim for compensation. There was no trace of a grant of the ground as a racecourse.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: In issuing an amended title under the Act of 1879, he insisted upon getting the consent of surrounding owners.

Abraham Stepleton, chief clerk in the office of the Surveyor-General, produced a return of compensation required to be paid to individuals in connection with the Wellington Railway.

James Fleming, second assistant draughtsman in the Surveyor-General's office, stated that, from the records in the office, he could not find that the line of railway touched any municipal commonage except the land in question.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: The railway passed through land left open to the inhabitants of the Paarl, but not within municipal limits.

A. Hall Cornish Bowden, Surveyor-General of the Cape Colony (recalled by Mr. Schreiner), stated he had caused a search to be made for the record of the original application for the land surrounding the piece in dispute. A "Government Gazette" of 1813 published a notice establishing regulations for the conduct of all persons applying for the grants of land. In one notice His Excellency, it was stated, "expects the respective Commissioners to preserve inviolate the roads and outspans to the public."

The original Executive Minute, giving notice of resumption of the land by the Government, having been put in, the case for the defendants closed.

Sir Henry Juta, in argument, cited the case of the French Hoek Municipality v. Hugo (2 Juta, p. 248), for the proposition that prescription in this Colony did run against the Crown in respect of property capable of alienation by the Crown, and quoted Foet (44, 3, 11). In Town Council of Cape Town v. Mossop (August, 1880), a public street was held capable of being acquired by prescription; and Blankenberg v. Colonial Government 11 S.C., p. 90, was cited for the same principle. In Jones v. Town Council of Cape Town (12 S.C., p. 19), it was decided that prescription ran against the Town Council in respect of land forming part of a public square, such land being alienable with the consent of the Governor. There the late Mr. Jones had actually acquired a piece of Church-square, on which he had a stoep, by prescription. Foet (13, 7, 7) held that a public road could be acquired by prescription. In Natal the same principle had been accepted. The only Crown land which could not be acquired by prescription was land pertaining to the Majesty of the State, such as fortifications, etc. The land in suit in this case had always been capable of alienation by the Crown. The user might have been in the public, but the dominium was in the Crown. There were various kinds of outspans—some on private land and some on public land; but an outspan was always a servitude, whether on private or public land, and this servitude could be lost by non-user for the period of prescription. The occupation here had always been nec vi, nec clam, nec precario. Public outspans were always created by some document; there had to be some document to show that the land had been set aside as an outspan. Here there was no evidence that the piece of land in question had ever been dedicated or set aside as an outspan. It was true that the grants of the surrounding properties described them as being bounded by outspan pasturage, but there was nothing to show what this outspan pasturage was. There should be something of a definite nature to show what it was, and not merely the description of an adjoining property that it extended towards the outspan or towards the grazing of the outspan place. It seemed that a part was reserved as an outspan for persons who could not cross the Berg River in winter, but people who resided beyond the river had no right to use it. There was no grant of an outspan. It would be a very serious thing for the municipality of Paarl to be now deprived of this land which they had so long used, and the Court would, therefore, closely scrutinise the evidence upon which it was sought to have it declared that this piece of land was an outspan. Land granted for outspans was generally dealt with in some proclamation, but here there was no proclamation or Government notice. It was a funny place for an outspan where there was no water. All the evidence went to show that it was a racecourse, and the Government had not produced one tittle of evidence to show that anybody had ever used it as an outspan. In 1878 the municipality looked upon the piece of land as municipal land, and again in 1881 they dealt with it as municipal land. In the amended grant of 1901 of an adjoining piece of land to the Spirit Company, this piece of land was described by the Government as municipal commonage.

Mr. Schreiner said that the prayer that the resumption was illegal had not been touched upon. When the Act of 1889 (vesting outspans in the Divisional Council) was passed the prescription was interrupted and the municipality had to start prescribing afresh. The municipality could not, in the circumstances, prescribe against the Crown. The old plan in the Paarl Divisional Council office showed that the piece of land was a public outspan. In 1866 a return of outspans was made, and this piece of land was the first outspan in the return for Paarl. The use in 1862, by the Governor, in refusing an application by the municipality to be allowed to sell a portion of this land, of the words "municipal commonage" did not make it so. In 1901, when the amended title was granted to the Spirit Company, it was by mistake that this piece of land was called "municipal common." A public outspan like a public road could not be prescribed. This land was Crown land, within a municipality, and a public outspan. The occupation of the municipality could only be precario, not pro domino. The cases cited only applied where the land was alienable and where the adverse user was continuous. In this case, except from 1860 to 1887, the land was inalienable and had not been alienable for 30 years.

I wish to call special attention to the fact that a public outspan, once constituted, is not a property over which a municipality can acquire rights by prescription. Now (1) this was a public outspan, and (2) it could not be alienated unless under certain special circumstances. The municipality did not hold the land pro domino, and therefore there was no adverse prescription. In 1889 these outspans were placed under the Divisional Council and no previous rights of Town Councils were provided for. If the Town Council wanted to prescribe they could do so only from 1889. The Court is now asked to declare that the action of the Government under Act 41 of 1902 is illegal. We are quite willing to give the municipality compensation for all improvements, but they do not even claim ownership. If a man says that he has prescribed he must show all that he has prescribed, he cannot prescribe land piecemeal. The municipality never fenced this ground, and therefore did not give the Government and the outspan people notice of adverse possession. No cattle were ever impounded for trespassing on this alleged municipal land. They claim a portion of land "at the racecourse" indefinitely, but do not define their boundaries. The minutes of the Town Council down to 1866 are very interesting: they call for tenders for the manure on the outspan, but they never claimed the outspan as against the Government. After the railway passed through in 1862 the tenders for the manure fell off; showing that the outspan was less used than formerly. After March, 1866, no attempt was made to raise revenue from the outspan, as no satisfactory tender had been received. The minutes from 1876 to 1878 do not show that the municipality made any profit out of the outspan. In 1878 they began to entertain the idea of planting trees on it and proposed to enclose the old racecourse, but never did so. In that year they tried to find out to whom the land belonged, and about the same time Act 14 of 1878 was passed. In 1879 they asked for a grant of the ground. They did not claim it as a right in virtue of adverse user pro domino. All they can show is that from 1879 they may have been planting trees on this land; but the planting of trees does not amount to a claim to hold pro domino. I admit that prescription runs against the Crown, but the property said to be prescribed must be well defined. Blankenberg's case (11 S.C.R., 92). Their whole case is (1) that they planted trees on some part or other of this land. (2) The selling of manure on the outspan; and (3) the permission granted to Moesop to construct a railway across the land.

[Hopley, J.: Their case is that they found it convenient to plant trees only on a certain portion of the land, but they might have planted on any other portion.]

The municipality and the Government could not be adverse to each other, they were working together for the benefit of the public. Prescription must be nec vi, nec clam, nec precario. Their possession was purely precario.

[Counsel proceeded to argue further on facts.]

The municipality now ask for a title to this land on the ground of prescription, but what kind of title; quit-rent, freehold, or what? And then should they obtain this and we should hereafter wish to take a railway across the land we shall have to pay for it. See Swetlandam v. Surveyor-General (3 Menz., 578). That referred to grazing ground and this case does not. Aberdeen Municipality v. Aberdeen Church (15 C.T.R., 661), where see especially the claim in reconvention and the plea thereto. Tarkastad D.R. Church v. Tarkastad Municipality (15 S.C.R., 371), and especially the judgment (p. 374). The Court must be satisfied that the whole of the property claimed has been prescribed.

Sir H. Juta (in reply): The real question is did the municipality acquire this land by prescription before 1902. If they did then their rights are not affected by the Act of that year. The land had ceased to be Government ground. It has been argued that because the Crown could have alienated the land if the municipality had asked for it, therefore the municipality could not claim pro domino. I confess that I cannot follow this reasoning. Then again it is said that after 1887 there was no power to alienate. But under the common law both a public road and a public outspan can be acquired by prescription. It has been contended that the Act of 1889 vested the control of this land in the Divisional Council. There was a usurpatio, but if adverse user is continued I do not see how giving management of property to a person can interrupt the prescription. A man's prescription is running when he dies, and an executor dative is appointed, but that does not interrupt the prescription. Again, in case of insolvency, prescription by the insolvent runs in favour of the trustee. But under Section 27 of Ordinance 16 of 1847 (the Pounds Ordinance) persons were appointed to look after outspans. This land was for years used merely as a grazing ground. It has been argued from Section 33 of Act 5 of 1855 that in this case there was no such adverse user as I have contended for, but Act 14 of 1856 shows that Section 33 of the Act of the previous year was framed in error.

Then as to our claim by prescription: Are we asked to prove that we planted trees over every foot of this land? We planted them where none were growing before. Where trees were growing we pruned them, sold the wood, and exercised general control; surely that is adverse user. No Council minutes previous to 1858 are extant, but ever since that date the municipality has exercised control pro domino over this land; and surely it cannot be said that because a small corner of the land was not planted the public retained possession of the whole of it. It is true that we cannot show any prosecutions for trespass, but there is no evidence to show that anybody ever attempted to trespass. Then again, there is no proof of the dedication of this land as an outspan. Even at the corner where no trees were planted the Municipality still exercised adverse rights. As to the manure, I would say that the sales refer to the outspan upon the small corner of which I have already spoken. The fact that in 1866 this manure was of no appreciable value shows that at that time even this small corner had ceased to be an outspan. Trees were planted on both sides of the line before 1874. The minutes of 1879 show that at that time nobody thought of the place as an outspan. About that time the Municipality decided to fence the ground, which shows that they were claiming it pro domino. True, they did not fence, and we do not know why. They subsequently ask the Government if the land had been granted to anybody? That shows that they did not regard the land as an outspan, but they wished to get a legal title to property which they regarded as equitably their own. In point of fact, they never applied for a title, but continued to exercise the rights of dominium. As to the railway. The Railway Department clearly considered that this was Municipal and not Government land; the whole correspondence between the Department and the Municipality shows that. Here, then, the exercise of proprietorship as of right is acquiesced in by the Crown. Take the case of grazing grounds; they cannot be alienated without the consent of the Crown, and for various reasons it will not give its consent, but these grazing lands do not on that account cease to be public property.

Lastly, it has been argued that the Crown and the Municipality worked harmoniously and that the Municipality had only precarious tenure of this land; but there is no evidence as to that. In 1862, and again in 1882, when we wanted to sell the Crown never objected that our title was precarious.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (August 27th).

Hopley, J.: The matter in dispute between the parties to this suit is a certain piece of ground about sixty-three morgen in extent, lying immediately to the south of the Paarl Railway Station, of which the plaintiffs claim the ownership by prescriptive right, and about which the defendants assert that it still is Government ground, the dominium of which has never passed from the Crown. The defendants, in their plea, set forth that the said ground was before

July 1, 1817, Crown land set apart by Government as a public outspan and grazing in connection with the said outspan, and that it remained such until it was resumed in due form under the provisions of Act 41 of 1902. The plaintiffs claim: (1) A declaration that the said piece of land is vested in them; (2) that they are entitled to have formal title issued to them of the said land; (3) that the resumption of the said land, under Act 41 of 1902 is illegal, and of no force or effect; (4) alternative relief; and (5) costs of suit. At the earliest date of which any evidence can now be produced, viz., the year 1815, the state of affairs was that there were existing grants of properties surrounding a piece of Crown land at the southern end of the growing village of the Paarl, then in the division of Stellenbosch. These old grants were of properties known as Picardie, to the north and west; Zandwyk, to the south-west; Zoetuin Inval, to the south and east, and the property of one C. H. Paulsen, to the north-east. In the year 1815, Pieter Roux, the owner of Picardie, and of another farm to the north, called Laborie, petitioned for a grant of a portion of the said Crown land adjoining his said farms. This petition was reported on August 7, 1815, by the Landdrost and Commissioners of Stellenbosch, and in their report it is stated that the adjoining Government lands are either measured for others or used as outspan places, and that "on a request from the Field-cornet Wagner and different inhabitants, there is a part left unmeasured at the lower end to serve as an outspan place for those persons who cannot pass the Berg River in the winter." In the same year Paulsen petitioned for a grant of a small piece of the said Crown land; and, on October 2, 1815, the same body reported upon his request that to the west of the ground applied for there was "the outspan place for public use." On July 2, 1821 the same body reported upon the petition of Johannes Louw, the owner of Zoeten Inval, who applied for some of the said Crown land adjoining his freehold, and stated in their report that "on the north side is Government land that is not supplied with water, and which is only for an outspan place when the Berg River is impassable." From these old documents it may be gathered that the Crown lands lying vacant at the locality in question had been used, probably for a considerable time, by the travelling public of those days as an emergency outspan place in winter seasons, when the Berg River could not be crossed, and that when applications were made for portions of such Crown lands, the local field-cornet and divers of the inhabitants suggested that a right to do so should be continued and safeguarded. The three petitions above set forth were all successful; and portions of the said Crown land were granted as prayed according to diagrams which had been framed to accompany the petitions, and which were embodied in the grants that were made in response to the applications. Roux got title for his newly-acquired land on July 1, 1817, Paulsen got his on October 27, 1817, and Louw his on June 1, 1827. The boundaries of these three new grants and the defined and previously known boundaries of Picardie and Zandwyk practically surround the piece of land now in dispute, which it is, therefore, a simple matter, by a process of compilation, to define and measure, as has been done: and there is no dispute as to the identity, boundaries, or size of the ground, both parties being agreed that it is correctly indicated by the plan annexed to the declaration. When the new grants were made in 1817 and 1827, as above stated, this piece of remaining Crown land was described in Roux's and Paulsen's grants as "Weide der Uitspans Plaats" (grazing of the outspan place), and in Louw's as "Weide von de Uitspan Plaats" (grazing for the outspan place). Roux's and Paulsen's grants state that their ground extends on their S.E. and W. sides respectively, "aan de weide der uitspan plaats." The grants are bilingual, and the English in these two grants is respectively "Towards the outspan place" and "To the pasturage of the outspan." Louw's grant states that his northern boundary extends "Aan de weide der uitspan plaats," and in English, "To the pasturage of the outspan place." On the true reading of these documents, there is no doubt in my mind that in the year 1817 the then Governor (Lord Charles Somerset) either acknowledged a previous grant, or then formally set aside and dedicated the ground now in dispute as an outspan and grazing for an outspan, for the benefit of the public generally; and that in 1827 the then Lieutenant-Governor (Sir Richard Bourke) looked upon this ground as pasturage of the outspan place, and acknowledged it as such upon a formal title-deed. I am satisfied that this ground was a duly-constituted outspan, of which any member of the public might make use, and there is no reason to suppose that this privilege was not exercised, though in all probability not very extensive use was for the greater part of each year made of it, owing to the fact that, except when the Berg River was in flood, there were other more convenient outspans available. It would, however, appear, that before many years had elapsed, the ground was being used for the purpose of holding race meetings, whenever that form of sport was pursued by its local votaries. The evidence is that such meetings were not frequent, nor at regular intervals—there being sometimes a series of years in which no meeting was held—and one may from the evidence safely come to the conclusion that in the years when they did occur, there would probably not be more than one or two of such meetings. These would naturally be fixed during the clement seasons of the year, when they could not possibly interfere with the rights of the travelling public, and I see nothing in such occasional meetings incompatible with the uses to which this land was then dedicated. In consequence, however, it became known as the "Racecourse," and continued to be used as such whenever a meeting could be arranged, until about the year 1860, when the line of railway was eventually laid in such a position as to cut the ground in two, and spoil it for racing. For some years before that date, however, the meetings had become difficult to arrange, and had begun to flag and fall into desuetude, owing to the influence of a minister of religion who disapproved of that form of recreation. As far as this ground was concerned, however, the position of the railway settled the matter, and no racing has taken place upon it since "the late fifties." Having acquired the name of the "Racecourse," as time went on, it gradually came to be called "The Old Racecourse." During all this period, however, there is nothing to show that the privilege of using the ground as an outspan and outspan-grazing were not exercised by travellers whenever they felt so disposed. Meanwhile, in 1838, the growing community of the Paarl received a grant of land of large extent, chiefly consisting of mountain veld, remote from the disputed ground, to serve as a commonage for the grazing of their cattle; and they had previously, in 1818, received a grant of the Watermuntjes Valley as a communal pasturage. In the year 1840 their village was formed into a separate municipality, and from that date the existence of the plaintiff Council dates. The limits or jurisdiction assigned to them include the disputed ground, which was then in use, as far as I can gather from the evidence, both as an outspan and, on rare occasions, as a racecourse; and it seems to have been assumed at the time by the newly-constituted Council that, because of its situation within the area of their jurisdiction, it fell under their control. I think that, in a certain sense, and to a large, though limited, extent, they were right in this assumption; for, as far as all matters touching municipal good government and general management for municipal purposes were concerned, they were the proper body to see that all their rules touching such matters were carried out in this, as in all other areas, to whomsoever they might belong, falling within the limits over which they had been set for the purposes of local government. Unfortunately, the earliest minutes of the Council's meetings have been destroyed by fire, and we have nothing to show us what that body in the early years of its existence did with regard to this ground; but since the beginning of the year 1859 there are minutes, upon the effect of which, and of the acts chronicled in them, the plaintiffs largely rely for the establishment of their claims in this case. According to such minutes, supported as far as there is available parol testimony at this date, it appears that from the year 1859 and until about the year 1866 or 1867, the Council used to make a small amount of revenue by selling the manure on what is throughout the minutes dealing with such matters called "the outspan at the Racecourse," and this is one of the acts relied upon as evincing an intention of holding such ground in full ownership; but I cannot see that any such inference need be drawn from such acts. Rather, I should feel inclined to say, do such acts prove that the Councillors of those days (and probably if the earlier minutes were extant we should find that their predecessors had acted in precisely the same way) were simply doing their duty in clearing the outspan—which was on, or alongside of the main road within their municipality—of an accumulation of manure which, unless removed, would have been a source of unpleasantness, and possibly of illness to the neighbouring inhabitants of the village. Had manure been of no value to anyone in those parts, the Council would probably have been forced to spend money in carting it away; but since it is, in such a community, a valuable product, they were able, on the contrary, to derive some income from the performance of their plain duty. But the plaintiffs do not rely upon their dealings with manure alone, for there are other matters in which they assumed control and enjoyment of the locality. It appears that originally the area was of a sandy nature, with only sparse native bush and herbs upon the pasturage reserved for the outspan; but Mr. Van Breda, who was landdrost about 1840 and onwards, was an energetic arboriculturist, and there is evidence that about 1845 he planted fir trees along the main road, which runs to the west of the pasturage in question, by the side of which anyone wishing to halt there would naturally outspan. These soon grew up, and their seeds, self sown, began to form thickets of fir saplings upon the pasturage reserve. Mr. Van Breda was also a sportsman, who trained his horses and raced them at the race meetings; and it is quite likely that, to improve the "racecourse," or to indulge himself in his pet hobby of tree-planting, he may have planted some fir-seeds upon a portion of the area in question. There is no evidence that he actually did so, but there is some evidence that there were some trees as early as the fifties, which were not self-sown, and there is no evidence to show who planted them. There certainly is no more to support the idea that the Council planted them than that Mr. Van Breda did so. Be that as it may, the soil was well adapted for the growth and spread of the fir-tree, and there was soon a sufficient quantity of that class of timber to demand attention, for a number of years certainly not sufficient to render the pasturage unfit for the purposes to which it had been dedicated, but gradually spreading, and at the beginning of the Council's minuted records we find that they had, by the year 1859, assumed control of this wood, and were utilising it for purposes of revenue. Something of the same sort as I have already said about the manure might be said about these young fir-trees, since a neglected growth of a young fir-bush is in some ways a public danger, because of the possibility of fires starting there, and very likely the earliest acts of the Council may have been the necessary pruning and thinning out of the young saplings. Here again, however, it was obvious that this duty might be made lucrative, and the Council were not slow to avail themselves of such advantages as might be derived therefrom. Without going into details, it is clear that throughout the time which has elapsed since 1859, the plaintiffs or their predecessors have exercised the function of dealing with the wood growing upon the outspan pasture. They cut it, or allowed it to be cut; they sold it both publicly and privately, and they fined persons who took or appropriated any of it without their permission. Somewhere between 1870 and 1880—I am inclined to think very near to the latter date—they began to plant trees systematically upon considerable portions of the ground; and their efforts in this direction, combined with the natural spread of the trees by the process of self-sowing, have had the effect of converting nearly all of the land originally reserved as pasturage for the outspan into a small forest of fir-trees. It is natural that the unquestioned and unrestricted exercise of such privileges would, as time went on, give a feeling of security of tenure to the Council, which might ripen into an idea of absolute ownership, and there is little doubt that such a feeling did eventually possess the minds of individual councillors, and possibly of that body as a whole. Persons and corporations are apt to accept the prevailing and actual situation as the proper and legal one without inquiring or looking below the surface to ascertain by what right the situation exists; and because actual control was exercised, rangers employed, pic-nic parties regulated, and wood sold or protected, it was assumed by the public, and strenuously argued by counsel for the plaintiffs, that the Council had controlled and possessed this fire-forest animo sibi habendi in their corporate capacity; but I find among their bye-laws promulgated in 1865, with the assent of the Governor, one which deals with such matters, No. 42, in the following terms: "No one shall wilfully or carelessly break, throw down, ride over, or injure in any way whatsoever any tree or trees growing in any public place within the municipality, under a penalty of not less than two nor exceeding five pounds sterling, and no person shall be allowed to cut or prune any trees in the public streets, squares, or on public lands within the municipality, without the consent of the commissioners, and under such regulations as they shall deem necessary; and the commissioners shall dispose of the wood to be cut, and acorns, in such manner as will be most advantageous to the municipal treasury." A piece of ground which has been reserved for the use of the public as an outspan and falling within the limits of the municipality must surely come under the designation of "public lands within the municipality." No argument upon the bye-law was addressed to me, and it seems to have escaped attention; but it is difficult to think that it was not framed with the object of continuing and legalising the system which the minutes show was growing up of selling the wood on the outspan. I am of opinion that this bye-law applies to the outspan and the wood upon it, and, if so, all the acts relied upon as showing the assumption of absolute ownership, and an animus domini would have been done under and by virtue of its provisions, and not in the mind and spirit which the plaintiffs contend must be attributed to them. The other acts with regard to the fire-bush, such as regulating picnics, and so on, seem to me to fall fairly enough within the scope of the duties of the Council. Evidence was also given that, about 1881 or 1882, a firm of Frater and Mossop treated with the Council, and obtained leave from them to lay a short line of railway, a siding to the main line, over the eastern portion of the outspan (lot A), and that in consequence of such licence that firm did lay such railway to their establishment for wool washing, paying a small sum for the privilege to the plaintiffs: but this again I do not think was an act necessarily ultra vires of the Council. For municipal purposes they had control of the ground in question, and they might fairly hold that they had therefore the right to refuse or grant the privilege of laying a temporary railway. Generally I would say that though all the acts I have enumerated singly and collectively are undoubtedly of importance, still the first question that arises out of them is whether, after all, they were not such as might have been expected of a body appointed to control and manage from a municipal point of view, such a place as a public outspan, which, as far as its grazing ground was concerned, was very little used by the public; and though they probably went too far in utilising the ground for tree-planting, they had considerable excuse for their conduct in the circumstances. There may have been other functionaries or bodies who had the duty of seeing that the outspan was not misused or trespassed upon, and such individuals or bodies may or may not have done their duty; but, as far as municipal matters went, the plaintiffs were the controlling body, and I see nothing incompatible with the due exercise of their proper functions in the acts set forth, nor do I think that such acts necessarily indicated more than a desire duly to discharge their duties. In considering this branch of the case, I cannot lose sight of the fact that it is unlike the ordinary claims which are made for the ownership of property by prescription; for the plaintiffs came upon the ground and took possession of it ex mandato, and in a fiduciary capacity, as managers and local governors thereof for municipal purposes, and it is difficult to conceive that they could ever, in fact, have looked upon themselves as the possessors of the land in any other capacity or by any other title, while legally it should have been impossible for them to do so, the maxim of the law on this point being perfectly clear and unambiguous: "Nemo potest sibi mutare causam possessionis." Now, if that be the correct view to take of their position, and of their intentions, it follows that in considering dealings by them with the property so intrusted to them, where such dealings are of doubtful character, in justice to themselves it is right to take the view that such acts were done in the execution of their proper functions as managers of the property, and not for the purpose of asserting ownership in the property itself. It may be, in the present case, that the plaintiffs assumed, ab initio a somewhat fuller control over this outspan than the various ordinances and Acts of the Legislature warranted; but still they were only controlling and not owning the land. They knew when they first came into existence that this land falling within their area was an outspan, and, rightly or wrongly, began and continued to manage it; nor is their position strengthened by the fact that the Divisional Council, who might have asserted some authority at a certain stage and for certain purposes, allowed them to have full control over it. But it is argued for the plaintiffs that because the land fell within their area it was assumed by all parties that it became "municipal land," the property if the municipality, and that their animus sibi possidendi arose from such assumption. This is perhaps the highest point to which the case in their favour can be stretched. But it was clearly an error juris, because the outspan, though within their area, remained an outspan dedicated to the public, and did not come to them by any sort of justifiable title as municipal property. If they assumed possession, and thought, errore juris, that they owned this land for the Municipality, can they found a claim to prescriptive title upon such erroneous idea, and upon such illegal tenure? Voet (41, 3, 3, and 5) is clear that for the purpose of usucaption the possessor of land by error of law could not rely upon such tenure to establish his claim, and the case of De Jager v. Scheepers (Foord, 120) is an authority that continuous undisturbed possession of property burdened by a fidei commissum gives no right to prescriptive title, even though the possessor acquired by purchase from the fiduciary. Here the plaintiffs contend that they assumed ownership because the outspan fell within their boundaries; but they admit that everything that fell within their boundaries did not necessarily become their property, and it is clear that any land burdened with a public right and vested in the Crown did not become their property. There was indeed nothing which invested them with any proprietary title to the land, for they had received it pro bono publico, and retained it by that and by no other title. In such a case the rule, "Rem acceptam usu non capimus, quia pro alieno possidemus," must surely apply. Another point which the consideration of this case brings forward is whether an "outspan" is capable of being acquired by prescription. Such a piece of ground, though dedicated to public use, remains in the ownership of the Crown; and though prescription does run against the Crown, its operation is confined to things capable of alienation by the Crown; so that it comes as far as this point is concerned, to the solution of the question whether the Crown could alienate an outspan while it remained dedicated to the public use. The earliest laws to which I have been referred are the Proclamation of Sir John Craddock, of October 16, 1812 (in which it is absolutely forbidden and made punishable to encroach upon any Crown land), and the advertisement by Government, July 23, 1813, of regulations for persons applying for grants of land, which is interesting in this respect, that there is an emphatic injunction to Land Commissions to preserve inviolate rights of roads and outspan places to the public. It will be seen that the privilege granted to the public to outspan at certain places is here spoken of as a "right." For the purposes of the present case, I may pass on to the Crown Lands Act No 2, 1860, which regulated the methods by which Crown lands might be disposed of. Section 1 of the schedule of conditions and regulations lays down that for the future all "waste and unappropriated Crown lands" will be sold, etc., etc. Section 14 lays down that lands required for public outspans shall not be considered waste lands of the Crown for the purposes of these regulations, and that such lands may be disposed of by the Governor for special public purposes, but only after the Legislative Council and House of Assembly shall have communicated to the Governor their concurrence in the grant. (See section 10.) It would, therefore, seem that while Act No. 2, 1860, was in force there was a very limited power of disposal by the Crown of outspan lands, and that only for special public purposes. As the suffering of usucaption is looked upon in law as a species of alienation, it would seem logically that an unrestricted alienation of such land by prescription was not legal. The Act, however, was repealed by Act 14 of 1878, and even that mode of granting or alienating an outspan was done away with, while nothing was put into its place. Section 2 of that statute enacted that all waste and unappropriated Crown lands shall be disposed of on perpetual quitrent by public auction. But I think that an outspan could not be considered waste or unappropriated ground; it was, on the contrary, ground appropriated to public use, and over which the public had a right, quite as much as pasture lands, as to which see Act 14, 1878, section 13. So that, apparently, after 1878, no way of alienating an outspan existed. It was still Crown land, but Crown land which the Crown could not alienate. It is true that by Act 15 of 1887, section 10, grants by the Governor were authorised for the benefit of the inhabitants of municipalities of any Crown lands within the limits of such municipality, provided that the lands so granted or their proceeds shall be used or applied for the benefit of the inhabitants in a way approved of by the Governor. But it seems to me that under the 12th section of that Act, an outspan would be excluded from the operation of the Act as being land claimed under a promise or order of a Government officer duly authorised at the time to make such promise or give such order. But even if that section only applies to conditional occupation of a different kind, that Act was passed less than 20 years ago, and prescriptive user cannot have been completed by virtue of any power of alienation continued in it. The next Act dealing with outspans was the Divisional Council Act of 1889, section 207 of which gives management and control of all outspans to Divisional Councils, and neither to them nor to anyone else was any right of alienating such outspans given. In fact, the only right of partial alienation was to lease for the purpose of getting accommodation for travellers, not more than one morgen of any outspan, with consent of the Governor, after due advertisement, and for a period not exceeding seven years. Such lands were, in my opinion, in view of such a Statute, clearly inalienable by the Crown or by anyone else. This was also evidently the view taken by the Legislature of the country when by Act 41 of 1902 it altered the law so as to give the Governor the power to deal with outspans, to alienate them under certain conditions, to resume them if they were not longer required for outspan purposes, and in such latter case to dispose of them under the laws regulating the disposal of Crown lands. The mere fact of such legislation being necessary is a proof, or very strong argument, that before that date no powers of sale or resumption of such lands were vested in the Crown. In my opinion, outspans, properly dedicated to the public, were inalienable until the Act of 1902, and such rights could not be prescribed: "Quae per principem alius communicari et in alios transferri possunt, etiam proscribi, possunt; quae vero communicari nequeunt etiam respuunt proscriptionem" (Voet 44, 3, 11). If, however, I hold too strong a view on this point, and if as was argued, an outspan is in no better or more protected position than a public road under common law, which, on the authority of Voet, may be lost to the public by continual adverse user, suffered without protest for the period of prescription (Voet 13, 7, 7), still in that very passage he shows what strong adverse measures are necessary to exclude the public from its right, and I am strongly of opinion, as I shall presently show, that no adverse acts of such a nature ever took place with regard to this particular public right. Finally, it is instructive to test the matter and the intention of the plaintiff Council from time to time by the actual history attaching to this piece of ground since the year 1817, at which date we know that it was formally dedicated or acknowledged as an outspan. From that year until the year 1840 there is no reason to doubt that use was made of it for the purpose to which it was dedicated; and though in 1840 it fell within the limits of the newly-constituted Municipal Council, and though that body assumed entire control over it, still it is clear that its use was not changed, even though it was also utilised as a racecourse. People continued to outspan there to a considerable extent, as is evidenced by the prices paid until the year 1867 or thereabouts for the accumulation of manure on the "outspan at the Racecourse," as it is always described in the minutes which deal with the tenders and sales of such manure. In 1861 and 1862, the railway having come across the ground and cut it in two, dividing lot A from the rest, the Council, seeing that this portion would become valuable for building upon, on account of its nearness to the railway station, made an attempt to sell it in building lots for the benefit of the Municipality. They caused lot A to be surveyed into such lots, and gave notice, under section 2 of Ordinance 8 of 1848, of their intention to dispose in that way of the land. Objections were, however, promptly made by a considerable number of the inhabitants, on the ground that the place was a public outspan, indispensable to the inhabitants. In controverting these objections, the Council pointed out that the ground in question had for a long time not been used as an outspan, that it had been cut off by the railway, and that the remaining extent (i.e., lots B and C of the plan annexed to the declaration), would be amply sufficient for the purposes of an outspan. In December, 1862, the answer of the Governor was conveyed to the Council's letter "relative to a desire on the part of the municipality to alienate a portion of the common lands with a view to applying the proceeds to certain municipal improvements," stating that in the face of the numerous signed petition against the proposed alienation His Excellency could not sanction the sale. Two things are observable from this correspondence, viz. that the Council attempted to treat the land as if it were common municipal pasture land, and that the Governor did not look into the matter to see by what kind of a title they claimed it. He seems to have assumed that they were right, as it is natural that he would do when we consider that he was being approached by a public body about a matter of which they might be presumed to have special knowledge. But, as a matter of fact, they could not at that date have thought that they had acquired a prescriptive right to the land, and, unless it was a mala fide attempt to get the proceeds of such sale for the benefit of the municipality, of which there is no reason to suppose the councillors of those days were guilty, they must have acted under the erroneous impression that the property had been made over to them; but they did not, when they were checked, assert this position, and, on the contrary, they acquiesced in the statement that it was an outspan, only stating that this portion had become disused as such, and that the rest was sufficient for public purposes. The other fact which stands out clearly is that the public then, both in 1861 and in 1862, asserted its right in each year by lodging objections and claiming even the disused Lot A as an outspan, and that they gained their point. It was thus forcibly brought to the notice of the Council that this was not municipal land, but an outspan, and they did not at that date contest the matter. In 1866 the Civil Commissioner of the Paarl, on the instruction of the House of Assembly, asked the plaintiff Council (as apparently all municipalities were asked at the time) for a return of all outspans falling within the municipal limits, and, in reply, the Council sent an answer enumerating outspans in the municipality, and among others, "the former racecourse now intersected by the railway." During this time, as I have already pointed out, the plaintiffs were advertising for tenders for the purchase of the manure on the "outspan at the racecourse," and people were, as a matter of fact, outspanning there. The actual outspan place was on Lot C, near its southern end, by the side of the main road, and there is not a single act recorded or spoken to in evidence of an adverse nature to this public right, except the gradual extension of the fir-bush upon the ground; no person was ever told that he might not outspan there, and no animal belonging to a traveller was ever turned off or impounded, though it is impossible to believe that such animals did not use the "pasture of the outspan" times without number. Up to the time of the resumption of the outspan by the Government in 1905, and even thereafter, people have occasionally outspanned at the usual place on Lot C, as is admitted by Mr. De Villiers, the present Mayor of the Paarl, and by other witnesses for the plaintiffs. All these facts indicate conclusively that the plaintiffs, though making considerable use of the ground, knew perfectly well that they were there only as managers, and not as owners. There is an interesting minute recorded of a resolution at the meeting of May, 1878. "Commissioners resolve that fir-seeds shall, without delay, be planted on the Old Racecourse, and that the secretary buy wire to enclose the Racecourse." But for some reason or other the wire was never bought, and it is probable, in the face of such an emphatic resolution, that something must have taken place, which gave them pause, and that wiser, more prudent and more legal counsels prevailed; and this is the more probable, as we find that on February 4, 1879, the following was minuted: "The secretary is requested to ascertain whether the racecourse has been granted to anyone by the Government, and, if not, to make application to the Government for the ground in order to plant trees thereon." It is said, I believe correctly, that no steps were taken in connection with, or in consequence of, such instruction, but no information is forthcoming as to why no action was taken. The minute is nevertheless important as indicating very strongly what was in the mind of the Council in those days. Such an instruction could never have emanated from a body which considered that they were the owners of that land; on the contrary, they knew clearly that it was Crown land, and they were prepared to petition for a grant of it for tree planting purposes. Again, in 1905, when someone had cut and removed a large number of trees from the wood in Lot B, and the Council wished to prosecute criminally, they appealed to the Government to assist them, as the ground "was Crown land," "an old outspan," which had been "for many years under the charge of the Municipality," and which was "considered Municipal land." It is true that when the Government, through the Agricultural Department, had replied that the land being Crown land, reserved as an outspan, the Municipality had nothing to do with it, the plaintiffs changed their tone, and claimed prescriptive rights; but that claim has very much the appearance of an after-thought when the Council discovered that they were likely to lose the enjoyments of rights which they had for so long a time exercised, and from which they were annually drawing considerable profits. Their acts and their admissions during their long tenure seem to me to be wholly inconsistent with the requirements of the law to establish a claim to the prescription of this outspan, even if such a piece of land could be obtained by the process of prescription. The tests are succinctly and clearly stated by Voet (44, 3, 9) to be whether the claimant by prescription has been for the necessary period in continuous and quiet possession, and that during the whole of such time he has suffered no interference at the hands of the true owner, and that he has not by any act acknowledged such a one as the owner. In view of the facts above stated, the plaintiffs cannot maintain that they have ever had a continuous possession of 30 years without interference by the Crown, or without acknowledging the Crown as the owner of the land; nor, as I have already stated, was there ever a period of 30 years during which the Council possessed the land as domini, with the intention of holding it as their own property for the Municipality. It is, perhaps, advisable not to pass over in silence a fact on which some argument was addressed to the Court, as tending to prove absolute ownership by the plaintiffs of the outspan, and a recognition of their claim by the Government. It appears that about 1901 the present owners of the property to the west of Lot B—"The Paarl Wine and Spirit Co."—applied for a fresh title under the Land Beacons Act, and that they employed Mr. Moll, a duly qualified land surveyor, to carry out the requirements of the Act. Mr. Moll, in the ordinary course of such a proceeding, called upon the owners of the adjoining properties to consent to the position of the beacons of his employers, and forwarded such consents after the said owners had inspected the beacons to the Surveyor-General's Department, together with the diagram on which the new title was to be issued. There seems to have been no dispute as to the beacons, and the land itself remained bounded as it was in the time of Roux, the original grantee, in 1817; but the point of this incident, and the reason of its introduction is that Mr. Moll treated the Municipality as the owner of the outspan, that he called upon the Mayor to consent to the beacons, that the Mayor did so consent, and that the diagram, which he forwarded with the various consent papers, described the land adjacent to the company's property on the east side as municipal land. The Examiner of Diagrams passed the plans as correct, and made no remark as to the description of the land to the east as municipal land, such land being portion of the property now in dispute. Thereupon a fresh title was issued showing the company's land to be adjacent to municipal land, and bounded on the east by land so described. I am not at all impressed by this, for I do not see how the defendants are in any way compromised by such a description, which the Surveyor-General and Mr. Van Renen describe as a palpable error which should have been detected in their office. The surveyor, Mr. Moll, no doubt was led astray by the common error which prevailed as regards this land, as no doubt was the Mayor himself; and the fact that the Examiner of Diagrams, whose chief function it is to certify to the correctness of the sides and angles and general calculations shown on the plan, did not discover that the description did not correspond with the description upon the older grants, and that title was granted with such new description upon it, does not in any way help to settle the matter in favour of the plaintiffs. I am of opinion that the disputed ground never ceased to be in law an outspan (as indeed it is shown in the maps of the Divisional Council district to this day), that the plaintiffs never acquired proprietary rights over it, and that the defendants were fully within their rights in resuming such outspan under the provisions of Act 41 of 1902. The plaintiffs' claims, therefore, fail, and there must be judgment for the defendants, with costs.

Mr. Gutsche moved on the petition of Lily de Smidt for leave to sue her husband, Geoffrey Wm. Henry de Smidt, by edictal citation for restitution of conjugal rights, or, in the alternative, for a divorce. Petitioner said that she was married to defendant at Humansdorp in 1893, and afterwards they resided together in several parts of the Colony. There was issue of the marriage—one child. On or about the 22nd October, 1897, while they were residing at Port Elizabeth, defendant, without reasonable or lawful cause, deserted petitioner and her child, and, except for an allowance of £4 10s. per month, which she had received since defendant had joined the South African Constabulary, stationed at Rustenburg, Transvaal, he had not contributed towards her support. This allowance, which was forwarded to her according to the rules of the force affecting married men, was inadequate for the support of petitioner and her child and the latter's education.

Leave to sue granted, citation to be returnable on the 1st August, personal service to be effected.

EXLEY AND CO. V. WASKAMSKY AND HILL.

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan moved, as a matter of urgency, for an interdict restraining the respondents and others from removing or dealing with certain 29 casks of oil, purchased at the sale of cargo salvaged from the wrecked steamer Oakburn. Petitioners said that they bought the whole of the casks, they agreed to let Waskamsky have half, and the latter was proceeding to take the whole lot.

Rule nisi granted, to operate as a temporary interdict, attaching 29 cases of oil in the hands of either respondent or of the Railway Department, rule to be returnable on the 12th July, action to be instituted by applicant forthwith, and costs to be costs in the cause.

Ex parte NASH AND ANOTHER.

Mr. Lourens moved, as a matter of urgency, on the petition of Maynard Nash, as representing in Cape Town John Deane Simmons, the interim inspector of Reiners, Von Laer and Co., of Port Elizabeth, and Cecil Govey, manager of Govey and Co., of Cape Town, for the discharge of a certain interdict granted in this court restraining certain steamship companies from handing over to persons other than the Table Bay Harbour Board goods consigned to or intended for Govey and Co. Petitioners said that they were now advised by cable that the creditors of Reiners, Von Laer and Co., including the persons who claimed the right to impose "stop" orders on the goods consigned as aforesaid, had consented and agreed to an arrangement and compromise with the African Merchants, Ltd., a company formed and registered in London on the 23rd June, 1906, as indicated in the original petition, for the purpose of carrying on the business of Reiners, Von Laer and Co. Petitioners were advised that the interdict obtained from the Eastern Districts Court had been discharged, and instructions had now been received to apply for an order discharging the interdict granted by the Supreme Court on the 15th May, and amended on the 23rd May.

Interdict discharged as prayed.

Ex parte BOTHA.

Mr. Payne moved, on the petition of Susanna Maria Botha, widow and executrix testamentary of the late J. A. C. Botha, for an order authorising the adoption of certain agreement in reference to the sale of a farm in the estate in the division of Molteneo.

Order granted as prayed.

SPENCER AND CO., LTD. V. POLICANSKY BROS.

Trade mark—Colourable imitation.

This was an application upon notice calling upon respondents to show cause why their trade mark, commonly known as "Saladin," should not be expunged from the register of trade marks.

Petitioners alleged that the trade mark registered by Policansky Bros. is a colourable imitation of Spencer and Co.'s, is calculated to deceive Spencer and Co.'s customers, and consequently will damage their sales. Plaintiff's mark was registered two years before that of the respondents. The main feature of each mark is a horse with a human figure on it, whilst the word "Saladin" is prominently displayed. The applicant alleged that the Registrar of Deeds in the Transvaal, where his mark was registered, had refused to entertain respondent's mark for the very reason that it was now sought to expunge respondent's registration of the mark in the Cape Colony.

Philip Policansky, in an affidavit, denied that there was any colourable imitation, or that his firm's mark could deceive intending purchasers of the applicant's goods. The marks spoke for themselves, and it was denied that the applicant had the sole right to the use of a horse, with a man on it, as his trade mark.

Mr. M. Bisset for applicant. Mr. D. Buchanan for respondent.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

Buchanan, J., said that in these cases one had to look at the trades' marks themselves, and form a judgment, as a juror would have to do from the appearance of the different labels. The essential part of the applicant's labels was a combination of devices, which presented a significant, clear, and defined picture. But the trade mark of the respondent was quite different. His lordship outlined the main features that went to make up this difference, and said that the only similarity between the two labels was that in each there was a man on horseback. In the applicant's case the man was an Indian soldier in uniform on a brown horse, and on the respondent's label he was an Arab riding a white horse. Of course, there was no monopoly of colour, and even if the same colours had been introduced into the two labels the two figures would have been quite dissimilar. There was such an absence of similarity of design that he did not think it required anything like a careful inspection, for the most casual inspection would show that the two designs did not represent the same article. There was no attempt to pass off Polincansky's goods as those of Spencer and Co., of Madras. He failed to see how there was a colourable imitation or that the respondent's trade mark was calculated to deceive any person, whether that person was able to read or not, by the pretended similarity to the applicant's trade mark. He failed to see how the horse could be taken as symbolical of the goods, it might be taken as symbolical of Saladin, who, in romance, was represented as riding a very fine Arab steed, but generally there was no similarity between the two labels. In these cases the similarity must be such as to be likely to lead to deception, and he failed to see how anybody could be supposed to be taken in by the respondent's trade mark. There was no ground for the application, which would be dismissed, with costs.

LAWRENCE V. CAPE DIVISIONAL COUNCIL.

This was an application upon notice to the Cape Divisional Council for leave to sue the respondents and for an order for costs.

The affidavit of James Lawrence, of Kimberley, stated that during December and January last he was staying at Muizenberg, and on the 1st January he was out driving with Mrs. Lawrence. While returning from Constantia to Muizenberg along the Tokai-road, owing to the dangerous condition of the road at that time, he met with an accident. The road was under the Divisional Council's control. On the 2nd January a letter was written by Mr. C. W. Lawrence to the secretary of the Divisional Council informing him that a serious accident had occurred owing to the bridge having no protection whatever on one side, and asking the Council to have the bridge examined and the matter investigated. A letter was written on January 4 by the secretary in reply stating that the matter was receiving attention. On January 10 the secretary wrote again: "I am instructed by my Council to convey to yourself and Mrs. Lawrence their sincerest sympathy, and trust that you will have a speedy and complete recovery."

From the petitioner's affidavit it appeared that some question had arisen as to the notice which is required by the second section of Act 27 of 1894, to be given within fourteen days to the Council concerned in regard to actions for damages. Thinking to remedy the matter, petitioner said he caused a further letter to be written to the secretary of the Divisional Council on March 21, in which it was stated that he had then sufficiently recovered to go into the matter. Mrs. Lawrence had sustained a very severe shock to the system. Mr. Lawrence had both his arms broken, his skull fractured, and his nervous system generally had been shattered. Mr. Lawrence proposed to institute an action for £3,000 damages, sustained by himself and Mrs. Lawrence, to whom he was married in community. Petitioner went on to say that he had been advised that the notice, not being in accordance with the second section of the Act, this Court should be petitioned for leave to sue. The Council had left the matter in an ambiguous state, and had refused to give a definite reply one way or the other. He submitted that the Council had not been prejudiced by not having been supplied with full particulars of the accident within the time stipulated. He added that they took steps shortly after the accident to have the road repaired where his cart had capsized.

The answering affidavit of the secretary of the Divisional Council (who annexed copies of correspondence between the attorneys of the respective parties), stated that the Council did not refuse, and never had refused, consent to the petitioner suing them, but they did object to that portion of the petitioner's application which asked that the costs thereof may be made costs in the cause.

Buchanan, J., said that leave to sue would be granted to the petitioner.

Mr. Burton was for petitioner; Mr. Benjamin was for respondent, Council. Counsel having been heard on the question of costs,

Buchanan, J.: The object of this short Act of 1894 was evidently that persons who intended to sue the Divisional Council or similar bodies for damages resulting from any neglect of duty in keeping roads or bridges or streets under their control in repair should give proper notice to such Council. The object is evident. If no notice is given, the Divisional Council, which is a public body, has no opportunity of seeing or knowing that an accident has occurred. In this case an unfortunate accident did occur on January 1, and notice of the accident was promptly given on January 2. True, the notice does not follow the words of the Act, and does not give all the particulars required by the section, and so, perhaps technically, the plaintiff was forced to come into court to get an order, giving him leave to sue under the proviso of the section, but he has substantially complied with the Act, and if the Divisional Council had not said that they would not agree to the notice being received, but would not consent to such a course, and at once forced the plaintiff into court, I think no further costs need have been incurred by them. However, as further costs have been incurred, I think they may very well abide the result of the proceedings in this case. Leave to sue will be granted, costs to be costs in the cause.

DU TOIT V. RENKEN AND OTHERS.

This was an application to have certain two writs of arrest granted by the Resident Magistrate of Oudtshoorn set aside. Mr. Lourens was for applicant, Johannes du Toit; Mr. Howes was for the second respondent, J. H. Schwemmer, the attorney of the first respondent, Jacoba Renken.

Mr. Lourens said that the applicant had intended to go with Royston's Horse to Natal on the 14th June. Before his departure, the respondent Renken lodged an affidavit with the Magistrate to the effect that applicant had seduced her some time previously, and that she was now entitled to recover from him damages in the sum of £100. This writ, which was granted under Rule 8, was handed to the Deputy-Sheriff on the 14th June, but by that time the applicant had left for Natal, and consequently the Sheriff could not execute this writ. Royston's Horse were ordered back, and consequently, about a week later, on the 22nd June, on the day after his return to Oudtshoorn, the respondents Renken and Schwemmer obtained this writ, which the Deputy-Sheriff had, in consequence of non-execution, returned to the Magistrate, from the Magistrate's Office, and arrested the applicant. The reason given for his arrest was that he was said to be about to leave the Colony. The Magistrate returned on the Monday morning. He discovered that this arrest was quite illegal, but he kept the applicant in gaol the whole of Monday, and in the meantime applicant had to wait for certain further documents to be prepared for his re-arrest. At 3.30 in the afternoon he was released, to be re-arrested on another affidavit, sworn by the respondent Renken, who again stated that she had been informed that Du Toit was about to leave the Colony.

From the affidavits, it appeared that the applicant denied any liability under the claim alleged by Renken, and he declared that she was a woman of loose character. The respondent Renken denied this, and said that she had been courted by the applicant, and that he had promised to marry her. Attorney Schwemmer said that he acted bona fide upon instructions received from Jacoba Renken, who said that she had a claim of £100 against applicant, and that she desired to hold him to bail at the next Circuit Court. It was stated that Renken did not appear, as she had no funds to employ counsel.

Applicant, in the course of his affidavit, said that he was a harness-maker at Oudtshoorn, that he had been out of employment for some time, and that he volunteered for service in Natal to enable him to support his mother. Jacoba Renken, however, took another view, and said that he went away with the intention of defeating her just claim. Du Toit had been released on furnishing security for his appearance at the ensuing Circuit Court.

Mr. Lourens submitted that the writs were irregular.

Without hearing Mr. Howes.

Buchanan, J., said that, by the conduct of the parties, the first writ had been set aside. The second writ, he considered, did not comply with the Rules of the Court, and it would be discharged, with costs against the first respondent, Renken, applicant to pay costs incurred by appearance of Schwemmer.

ADAMS V. MOFFAT, HUT- 1906.
CHINS AND CO. { July 5th.

Rule 333D—Discovery—Privilege.

It is in the discretion of the Court to grant or refuse discovery orders. As a general rule, communications between an agent and his principal are not privileged unless they refer to matters to be brought forward in evidence in impending legal proceedings.

This was an application upon notice to respondents calling upon them to show cause why they should not make disclosure of certain documents and pay costs of application. Mr. Burton was for applicant (defendant in the action); Mr. Searle, K.C., was for respondents (plaintiffs in the action).

Mr. Burton said that an action had been commenced by respondents against applicant to recover a sum of £2,703 upon a contract to supply certain joinery work, the oak, teak, and pine, required in connection with the erection of the new offices of the South African Mutual Insurance Association in Darling-street, Cape Town, of which the defendant was contractor. The matter related to certain material which had been rejected. Plaintiffs objected to produce documents set forth in schedules 4, 5, and 7, of Thomas Moffat's affidavit on the ground that the schedules embodied correspondence between themselves and their manufacturers in Canada (the Globe Furniture Company), between whom and defendant there was no privity of contract, and that much of the said correspondence was of a confidential character, and dealt with differences which had arisen between defendant and plaintiffs, and in regard to which it was evident at the outset that litigation would ensue.

Affidavits having been read on both sides,

Mr. Burton submitted that the documents were clearly liable to discovery. The ground on which he made this claim was Rule of Court 333 (sub-section d). Counsel quoted a number of authorities, mentioning Van der Horst v. Colonial Government (13 C.T.R., 911), Brill v. New York Mutual (15 C.T.R., 643), Chesier and Another v. Big Ben G.M. Co. (4 H.C., 374), Compagnie Financiers v. Peruvian Guano Co. (43 L.T. 22), and Buyshes v. White (34 L.L., 365).

Mr. Searle contended that there was no direct authority in our courts for such an application. It would be most unfair and contrary to all the doctrines of equity that a man should be compelled to disclose documents such as were referred to in this matter. It seemed to him that defendant wanted to make a case at the plaintiff's expense. Surely defendant ought to know whether the material was according to contract. He could not have the right to go and inspect the reports of experts in plaintiff's possession made in view of pending litigation. The defendant had not even yet filed his plea.

Mr. Burton, in reply, referred to the practice in England as to the time or stage at which discovery of documents should be made. There seemed, he remarked, to be no hard and fast rule in such matters. Counsel went on to contend that when the matter came to trial the documents in question could be required from plaintiff in cross-examination unless he could claim exemption on the ground that the documents came into existence in view of pending litigation. It was very significant indeed that the respondents made so much fuss about these documents. On every ground of law and every rule of equity defendant was entitled to inspection of documents which did not come into existence for the purpose of litigation.

Buchanan, J.: Our rules for discovery are founded, no doubt, on the English rules, but our rules are neither so explicit nor so full as the English rules. This application is brought under rule 333, which makes it lawful for the Court or Judge at any time during pendency of an action to order the production by the parties to the action upon oath of such documents in their possession or power as relate to any matter at issue. The party upon whom an order is made of this kind to disclose the documents in his possession may state his reasons for refusing to produce them. Sub-section (d) of this rule, which is relied upon, is as follows: "Every party to an action or other proceeding shall be entitled at any time before or at the hearing thereof, by notice in writing, to give notice to any other party in whose pleadings or affidavits reference is made to any documents, to produce such documents for the inspection of the party giving such notice or his attorneys, and to permit him or them to take copies thereof." Now, that it will be seen on reference to sub-section (d) is not applicable to this case at all. The documents which the defendant in this case wishes to see are not documents which are referred to in the pleadings or the affidavits, and the section goes on to say that any party not complying with such notice shall not afterwards be at liberty to put in such documents in evidence on his behalf in such action or proceeding until he shall satisfy the Court that he is entitled not to comply with the notice. This seems to be the penalty which is imposed by the rule upon non-production of documents. I fail to see in our rules anything which goes further than this, but I think as the rules are founded on English practice, we may refer to the English practice for some assistance in deciding such an application as this. Our practice in regard to discovery is very limited; there have not been sufficient decisions on the point to have crystallised into any settled rules, but I think generally we have adopted the English rules, and I gather from the English rules that the principle which ought to guide the Court when discovery has been ordered, and objection is made to the production of documents, in the first place, the Court has a general discretion to decide whether or not documents should be produced. That is settled by the English rules of Court, but it is pointed out in England that if the Court or judge shall be of opinion that it is not necessary with a third person for the purpose of obtaining evidence at the trial. But with the affidavits, as they stand before me, it is impossible to give a specific order as to what documents shall be produced and what documents shall not be produced. I think the plaintiff in this case must make a fresh affidavit of discovery, and state much more clearly which documents relate to matters concerning evidence in the case, and any such documents will not be disclosed, but any correspondence between themselves and their manufacturers in Canada which does not relate to the obtaining of evidence for the purposes of trial, will not be privileged. I think I have sufficiently indicated what I think the plaintiff ought to do—that he should distinguish between correspondence between himself and his agents carrying on business in Canada, and correspondence that relates simply to the obtaining of evidence of experts and others that ought to be protected, and need not be disclosed in this case. I think the plaintiff should make a more full affidavit of discovery, so that there will be no necessity, I think, to make another application to the Court. The order will be that the respondent specify distinctly which of the documents in his possession relate to the obtaining of evidence only, and which do not. These applications are in the nature of establishing principles which have not been settled, and I think it may fairly be that the costs of application be made costs in the cause.

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

BRUMMELL V. WHEELER. { 1906.
July 6th.

This was an action brought by George Henry Brummell, late of Calvina, against Thomas Henry Wheeler, of Maitland, to recover £35, balance of moneys lent and advanced, and interest.

Plaintiff, in his declaration, said that on June 10, 1904, he lent to defendant £45, and defendant promised to pay interest until repayment of the capital. The said sum was paid to defendant's daughter, R. M. Wheeler. On August 25 1905, defendant repaid £8 on account, but he neglected and refused to pay the balance, and plaintiff claimed payment of the balance owing of £37, with interest.

Defendant, in his plea, said that the said sum of £45 was borrowed from plaintiff by his daughter, Ruby May Wheeler, between whom and defendant there had existed an engagement of marriage. It was borrowed on her own behalf, and not on behalf of the defendant, she being then of age. In or about October, 1904, the engagement was broken off. The sum of £8, paid on August 25, 1905, was paid by his daughter. Defendant had always repudiated any liability whatsoever in respect of the said debt. He prayed that the claim may be dismissed, with costs.

Plaintiff, in his replication, admitted that there had been an engagement of marriage, and that when the loan was advanced Miss Wheeler was over 21 years of age, but he denied the allegation that the money had been lent to her on her own behalf.

Mr. Roux was for plaintiff; Dr. Greer was for defendant.

Geo. Henry Brummell (plaintiff) said that he was a sergeant in the Cape Police, and he was at present stationed at Maraisburg in Cape Colony. He met defendant and his family in 1902, and he became engaged to the defendant's daughter. While he was away in Namaqualand he received telegrams from Miss Ruby signed "Ruby." At that time her father had certain schemes on hand, and one particularly was a tramway project. Witness received an application for a loan for Miss Wheeler on behalf of her father.

[Maasdorp, J.: Is Miss Wheeler here?]

Mr. Roux: Unfortunately, we have not been able to find her.

Dr. Greer said that Miss Wheeler had since been married, and was now Mrs. Payne.

[Maasdorp, J.: She is an important witness, whoever is responsible for her not being here.]

Witness (continuing) said that he sent a draft for £45, payable at the Standard Bank to Miss Wheeler, and in response he received a telegram acknowledging the draft with thanks. That telegram was signed "Wheeler." Witness subsequently received a letter from defendant, in which he spoke of certain of his projects, and added: "Your little amount will be sent forthwith." The sum of £45 was the only loan he had advanced to defendant. Witness repeatedly addressed letters of demand to Mr. Wheeler at Haven House, Maitland. He received several letters from Mrs. Wheeler, who, he took it, was corresponding on behalf of her husband. After the payment of £8, he sent a receipt to Mrs. Wheeler.

Cross-examined: His engagement to Miss Wheeler began in November, 1902, and extended until June, 1904. The draft was payable to Miss Wheeler, and was sent to Miss Wheeler. If the telegram in reply had come from Miss Wheeler, it would have been signed "Ruby." He knew that Miss Wheeler wanted the money to assist her father to pay his rates and taxes. She was taking painting and singing lessons, and attending a millinery class. He did not say anything specially as to whether she should continue those lessons; he denied that the money was borrowed to enable her to continue the lessons. He did not consider that he was badly treated by the breaking off of the engagement. He did not make a legal demand for the loan from the family until after the engagement was broken off; he knew that they were hard up at that time. In April, 1905, witness married a lady at Calvinia, and he required the money for the payment of his insurance premium.

Re-examined: Witness made the advance in response to a letter from Miss Wheeler, in which she said that her father was hard up, and that he was very much worried because he could not meet his rates and taxes, and it would very much prejudice him in his schemes if he were to borrow the money from outside. The letter asked for £50. Witness withdrew his savings from the bank, and remitted £45.

Mrs. Wheeler (wife of the defendant) said that her daughter left her home and was married without witness's consent. The money advanced by plaintiff was lent to witness and her daughter, and not to Mr. Wheeler. The money was paid into witness's account at the Standard Bank. Witness admitted having written a letter to the plaintiff in which she referred to the loan as having been advanced to Mr. Wheeler. She was married to defendant out of community.

Cross-examined: None of the money went to Mr. Wheeler. Part of the money was utilised to pay for the lessons Miss Wheeler was receiving. Mr. Wheeler had objected to paying for these lessons. Witness said that she wrote as though she took up the position that the money was advanced to her daughter, and that witness held herself responsible for it. They were very much worried at that time about financial matters, and Mr. Wheeler had a good deal of worry about his tramway scheme.

Mr. Roux closed his case.

Thomas Wheeler (the defendant) said that he remembered hearing that his daughter had received a cheque from plaintiff, but he did not know the amount. He had not received any portion of the proceeds of the cheque. He did not send a telegram to the plaintiff acknowledging the receipt of the cheque. At the time in question witness was not in want of money, and he did not authorise his daughter to apply to plaintiff for a loan. Witness objected to his daughter continuing her music and painting lessons, because she was 22 years of age, and he thought it was time her education ceased. He objected to Mr. Brummell; he never consented to the engagement, and they were always at loggerheads.

Cross-examined: Witness had not received several letters of demand from plaintiff for payment of the loan to his daughter. He admitted having written a letter to Brummell, in which he said, "Your little amount will be sent forthwith." He then meant that he would send the money on behalf of his wife.

By the Court: Witness's daughter was living with her husband at Observatory-road.

Dr. Greer closed his case.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts.

Maasdorp, J.: With the conflict of evidence in this case, I think the only straight course for the Court to adopt is to be guided by the documentary evidence that has been put in. It appears that a letter was written by the defendant to the plaintiff on October 23, 1904, in which the following passage appears: "My tram, I think, will go through on Tuesday next. Don't you think it nearly time? Eighteen months, about. If it does it will put me in funds, and your little amount will be sent forthwith." Now, the question arises, what is this little amount that is referred to? The plaintiff says that he has written to the defendant in respect of this alleged loan, and this was the only transaction that had ever taken place between them, so that the little amount can only be the amount of money lent by plaintiff to defendant. Upon referring to a letter written to plaintiff by Mrs. Wheeler on January 29, 1905, it seems that she writes to the following effect: "I am dreadfully sorry Mr. W. has not returned the amount you lent him." Now, it would seem from these two letters that there is an acknowledgment by the defendant that there is some little matter outstanding between him and plaintiff, and there is a clear allegation on the part of Mrs. Wheeler that a certain sum of money was lent by plaintiff to defendant. On this correspondence before me, I find no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the telegram that has been put in dated June, 1904, is a telegram direct from defendant to plaintiff, and is a distinct acknowledgment of the receipt of £45 by him from plaintiff. Judgment will be given for the amount claimed, with costs.

On the application of Mr. Roux, the plaintiff was declared a necessary witness.

VOSPER V. OSBURN BROS. { 1906.
July 6th.

Bond—General clause.

V. sold to O. Bros. a certain property, and as security for the purchase price accepted a "first mortgage bond upon the said property."

Held, that such bond was not to be construed as including the general clause.

Semle: had the parties merely agreed that a bond should be passed to secure the purchase price without specifying the property to be bonded, the vendor might have insisted upon the insertion of the general clause in accordance with the usual custom.

This was an action brought by Walter Charles Vosper, retired tradesman, of Wynberg, against William Edwin Percival Osburn and Alfred George Howard Osburn, trading as Osburn Brothers, and carrying on business as brokers and commission agents at Wynberg.

Plaintiff, in his declaration, said that in or about July, 1904, he sold certain property at Wynberg, of which he was the registered proprietor, to one Jamalie Abrahams. Thereafter, on February 5, 1906, and at Wynberg, aforesaid, plaintiff and defendants entered into a certain agreement, to which the said Abrahams consented. This agreement provided, inter alia, that the sale to Abrahams should be cancelled, that the defendants should purchase the property for the sum of £1,000, that they should simul ac semel with transfer pass a first mortgage bond upon the said property for the whole of the purchase price, in favour of the plaintiff, who undertook not to call up the same within five years, interest was to be paid at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, and defendants were to pay £50 per annum off the purchase price and Abrahams was to be released from the sale. Plaintiff went on to say that, by reason of the premises, he was entitled to claim as against transfer in due form of law of the said property to the defendants that the defendants pass a first mortgage bond as aforesaid, according to law, containing the usual and customary clauses, and more particularly certain clauses known as the insurance and general clauses, as well as the special provisions hereinbefore set forth. The plaintiff claimed an order declaring that he is entitled to have a mortgage bond passed in his favour by defendants as set forth, an order compelling defendants to duly execute and register against transfer a first mortgage bond in terms of annexure, or, in the alternative, cancellation of the sale and payment of £400 as damages.

Defendant, in his plea, said that the bond referred to in the agreement was clearly understood by both parties as being for the hypothecation of the aforesaid property only, and that the insertion of the clause known as the general clause was not contemplated by the parties. A power of attorney to pass a bond containing the general clause was tendered to them for execution on or about the 12th February, 1906, at the offices of Friedlander and Du Toit, attorneys, and they at once refused to execute the same, and plaintiff thereupon agreed to have a new bond drawn up from which the general clause should be omitted. This agreement plaintiff had failed to carry out. Defendants had tendered, and hereby again tendered, to execute such bond, with the general clause omitted, and, subject to the tender, they prayed that the plaintiff's claim be dismissed with costs.

Mr. Upington (with him Mr. Bisset) for plaintiff. Dr. Greer for defendants.

Walter Charles Vosper (the plaintiff) said that he left the transaction practically in the hands of Mr. McLachlan Thomas, accountant. When he went to Friedlander and Du Toit's office, no mention was made to him of the general clause, though something was said to Mr. Thomas, as witness was leaving. The property, which was situate in Wolf-street, Wynberg, had depreciated in value, and would now be worth from £750 to £800. He cancelled the sale to Abrahams because he had some difficulty about getting his interest.

Cross-examined: When the agreement was entered into the general clause was not discussed. Witness did not even now know what the general clause was.

[Maasdorp, J.: You are quarrelling about something you don't understand. You want the sale to go through, you say, and you insist upon something the nature of which you do not know.]

Cross-examination continued: All that witness wanted was a bond the same as anybody else would get. He did not think anything at that time about any security beyond the property itself. At the attorney's offices he did not consent to the omission of the general clause from the bond.

E. W. McLachlan Thomas, incorporated accountant, Cape Town said that he assisted plaintiff to put through the sale to Abrahams. The conditions of the sale were not carried out by Abrahams, and the property was subsequently taken over by Osburn Bros. Afterwards, he was seen by plaintiff in reference to the general clause, and witness went over with him to Friedlander, and Du Toit's office. Witness discussed the question of the general clause with Mr. Du Toit, who said that Osburn Bros. wanted the general clause left out. After discussion Mr. Du Toit said that he did not think there would be any difficulty. Witness had had considerable experience of these matters, and he had never seen any bond specially hypothecating the property, which did not contain the general clause.

Charles Adams, a partner in the firm of Stamper and Zoutendyk, auctioneers and appraisers, said he considered the value of the property to-day was £750. The property consisted of two semi-detached cottages and a small cottage.

Andries F. du Toit, attorney, formerly of the firm of Friedlander and Du Toit, and Wm. Molteno Bisset, of Tredgold, McIntyre, and Bisset, attorneys, also gave evidence. Mr. Bisset said that the general clause was always inserted in a mortgage unless a very special agreement was entered into.

Mr. Upington closed his case.

Alfred George Howard Osburn (one of the defendants) said that he went to Friedlander and Du Toit's office. Witness told Vosper that the bond must be without the general clause. Vosper said that he was agreeable. Mr. Du Toit called attention to the fact that this was unusual, and Vosper again said that he was agreeable to the omission of the general clause.

Cross-examined: They were particular about having the general clause excluded, because at that time his brother had property, and witness had none. He agreed that the value of the property to-day was about £750.

Mr. Edward Percival Osburn (the other defendant) said that when they went to Friedlander and Du Toit's office witness said that he did not want to sign a bond containing the general clause, and that it had been agreed to omit it. Mr. Du Toit came in and remarked that it was unusual, and he asked Vosper if he was agreeable. Vosper said that he was.

Cross-examined: It was agreed in their (defendant's) office at Wynberg that the general clause should be omitted.

Benjamin Straubus, articulated clerk in Mr. Du Toit's employ, also spoke to the interview at Friedlander and Du Toit's office. Some discussion took place as to passing a bond without the general clause, and witness was sent out for a power of attorney. Witness obtained a power of attorney without the insurance clause, but not without the general clause. He heard Mr. Du Toit afterwards speak to Mr. Vosper about the bond, but he did not hear anything said about the general clause. From what he saw, however, Mr. Vosper was agreeable to sign the bond without the general clause.

Dr. Greer closed his case.

Counsel having been heard in argument,

Maasdorp, J.: In this case the terms of the agreement between the parties have, unfortunately, been reduced to writing, and the Court has only now, in order to ascertain the rights of the parties, to construe the terms of this agreement. The clause which the Court is called upon to construe is number 3 of the agreement, in which it appears that the parties had agreed that "the purchase price remain on the bond of the above property" for the term of five years. Now, under ordinary circumstances, where the terms are unambiguous, the Court will take the ordinary and natural meaning of the words as expressing the intention of the parties. It seems to me that when the parties agreed that the purchase price should "remain a bond on the above property" they meant that a mortgage bond should be passed on the above property for the security of the purchase price, and they did not mean that a mortgage bond should be passed on such property, and also generally on such other property as the purchasers might be possessed of. That would be the plain construction of this clause. The plaintiff contends, however, that this clause must be read by the right usage in the execution of mortgage bonds, when parties have agreed to pass a mortgage bond for the security of the purchase price. Now, it seems to me that there may be cases when a wider construction may be put upon the words themselves—for instance, if the parties agreed generally that a bond should be passed for securing the purchase price, without specially mentioning the property which is to be bound in the bond then I could quite understand that the Court might take it that the parties intend that the bond should be drawn in the usual form, or the words may be that the usual bond should be passed. Now, it seems to me that the case which has been cited—Smith v. Randall's Trustees (2. Menzies, 385)—may be distinguished from the present case. There it appears that a power of attorney had actually been executed, in terms of which the bond had been drawn up, and the whole inquiry that the Court directed its mind to at that time was what was the usual construction to be put upon such power of attorney, and it was ascertained that when such powers of attorney were exhibited at the Deeds Office, a bond was allowed to be drawn under such power of attorney, including the general clause.

Now, in this case the parties have not proceeded so far as to execute the necessary power for drawing up this bond, and consequently this case does not apply. The conclusion I therefore come to is that that case ought not to be applied to the present one, and that the words of the third clause of this agreement ought to be strictly construed, and they amount to an agreement that the bond should be passed upon the property and nothing more. An attempt was made on the part of the defence to introduce evidence to prove on the other hand that there was an agreement that the general clause should be excluded. Now, it appears from the authorities which have been given that such an express agreement might be a very important clause in a contract of this kind, and that consequently, if it had been part of the contract of the parties, it should have been in the written agreement, and cannot now be introduced by parole testimony. I am glad to say that the construction that I have arrived at works no injustice to the plaintiff at all. The plaintiff himself never intended that any general clause should be introduced. I again say I do not construe this contract by the light of the parole evidence. The plaintiff was not aware of the nature of a general clause. He does not now know what a general clause means, and I am satisfied that he at the time was agreeable to the bond being passed upon the property itself, and nothing more, and that he had in contemplation nothing more. It was only when his legal advisers came upon the scene and advised him that he was taking a very great risk that he insisted upon introducing the general clause into the agreement. Judgment must be given for the defendants, with costs.

Mr. Upington: Your lordship finds there was a definite agreement?

[Maasdorp, J.: I am satisfied that when the parties met at the offices of Mr. Du Toit the matter was explained to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff was perfectly satisfied to take the property alone, and I think Mr. Du Toit acted very properly when he thought plaintiff might have made a mistake in advising him before he went any further to see his own legal adviser.]

Surety—Pledge of cargo—Freight and landing charges — Res inter alios acta.

W. & Co. had applied to defendant for accommodation, and P. bound himself to plaintiffs as W.'s surety in solidum and co-principal debtor for £10,000. This transaction was in respect of a certain cargo of timber of which W. & Co. wished to obtain delivery and which they had pledged to defendant as security. On the arrival of the cargo, W. & Co. could neither meet the bill which had been drawn upon them for the same nor pay the freight. The bills of lading, &c., had been handed over to plaintiffs, who claimed the right to sell the cargo for the benefit of all concerned, and the creditors of W. & Co. acquiesced. Thereafter the firm of W. & Co. was sequestered, and the trustee abandoned the cargo to plaintiffs, who sold it. Defendant alleged that, owing to plaintiffs' negligence, the cargo had become depreciated in value, and he now claimed compensation for this depreciation in the value of his security and claimed that, on paying the £10,000, he was entitled to receive the full value of the cargo apart from freight and charges which he contended the plaintiffs ought to pay in virtue of his agreement with W. & Co., and that their payment of freight, &c., was really a loan made by plaintiffs to W. & Co.

Held, that as no agreement between defendant and W. & Co. could bind plaintiffs, and as the evidence showed that plaintiffs had acted in the best interests of the creditors, and did not show that the payment of freight, &c., was in the nature of a loan to W. & Co., judgment must be given for plaintiffs as prayed, with costs.

This was an action brought by the National Bank of South Africa, Ltd., against Thomas Peel, of East London, to recover a sum of £6,601 18s. 5d., with interest a tempore moræ, alleged to be due from defendant as surety and joint principal debtor for Whitworth and Co., timber merchants.

Plaintiff's declaration was as follows:

1. The plaintiff is the National Bank of South Africa, Limited, and carries on business at various places in this colony, including East London.

2. The defendant is Thomas Peel, who resides at East London.

3. On the 1st December, 1903, a certain firm, styled Whitworth and Co., carrying on business at East London, obtained there from the plaintiff a letter of credit in favour of Enhornung and Co., of Sundsvall, Sweden, authorising them to draw on the London office of the plaintiff to the extent of £10,000, for the purchase of timber, on account of Whitworth and Co., to be shipped to East London.

4. The said letter of credit was granted for the consideration set forth in an agreement, embodied in a letter dated the 1st December, 1903, whereof a true copy is annexed, and marked "A," which the plaintiff prays may be read as though here inserted. The said agreement was entered into between the plaintiff, on the one hand, and the said firm of Whitworth and Co. and the defendant on the other, and the defendant specially bound himself as surety in solidum and joint principal debtor to the plaintiff for the due fulfilment of the said agreement.

5. In accordance with the letter of credit, the London office of the plaintiff made advances of money amounting to £9,978 17s. 8d., for which amount, in accordance with the said agreement, the plaintiff drew a bill on Whitworth and Co., which was accepted, but thereafter dishonoured by that firm at the due date, of which dishonour the defendant had notice.

6. Meanwhile, the said firm of Whitworth and Co. and the defendant had failed, and neglected to pay or make provision as contemplated by the said agreement, for the payment of freight, demurrage, landing charges, duty, and insurance in respect of the cargo of timber purchased for their account, and paid for out of the moneys advanced as aforesaid, and shipped to East London in the Atbara, and the plaintiff, for and on account of Whitworth and Co. and the defendant, advanced and paid the freight, demurrage, landing charges, duty, and insurance in respect of the said cargo, and caused the same to be landed at East London, pursuant to the bills of lading and other documents, whereof the plaintiff was the legal holder, and received same for the account and risk of Whitworth and Co. and the defendant, and from time to time sold portions of the said cargo for cash, and finally disposed of the balance of the cargo by public auction, after full advertisement of all which the defendant had notice.

7. When called upon to pay the amount of the dishonoured bill aforesaid, to wit, £9,978 17s. 8d., the defendant wrongfully and unlawfully refused to pay the said sum unless the plaintiff would, in exchange, hand to him documents enabling him to take delivery of the said cargo, and wrongfully and unlawfully failed and refused to pay the other sums advanced and paid by the plaintiff as aforesaid, including also amounts paid by the plaintiff, by way of expenses in connection with the realisation of the said cargo of timber.

8. In terms of the said agreement, the plaintiff became and is entitled to a commission of 2½ per cent. on the gross proceeds of the timber sold, as aforesaid.

9. The plaintiff annexes hereto an account marked "B," showing in detail the amounts received and expended in respect of the matters aforesaid, the amount of interest due to the 16th December, 1905, in respect of the aforesaid dishonoured bill and the sums expended for freight, demurrage, landing, duty, and insurance, and the amount of commission due to the plaintiff as set forth in paragraph 8, and the defendant is at foot of the said account indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of £6,601 18s. 5d., together with interest a tempore morae.

10. All things have happened, all conditions have been performed, and all times have elapsed and passed necessary to entitle the plaintiff to demand payment of the said sum of £6,601 18s. 5d., with interest, as aforesaid; but the defendant wrongfully and unlawfully refuses to pay the said sum or any part thereof.

Wherefore the plaintiff prays for judgment for £6,601 18s. 5d. sterling, together with interest thereon a tempore morae, or for such other relief in the premises as to this Honourable Court may seem meet, together with costs of suit.

To the declaration the defendant pleaded as follows:

1. The defendant admits paragraphs 1, 2, 3, and 4 of the declaration, but refers this honourable Court to the terms of the agreement itself in question for greater certainty.

2. He says, in further reference to paragraph 4, that his said suretyship was only given on condition that the bills of lading, insurance policies, and other shipping documents in respect of the said timber, should be endorsed by the said firm of Whitworth and Co., and delivered to the plaintiff to be held by the latter for itself and the defendant until the whole of the said amount of £10,000 had been paid by Whitworth and Co., together with interest and charges. That Whitworth and Co. were to pay all freight, landing and other charges on the said cargo themselves, that the said cargo should remain in bond at East London in the name of the plaintiff, and that no part thereof should be released except upon the written order of the plaintiff, countersigned by the defendant, and that the amounts for which any of the goods should be sold through the said Whitworth and Co.

were to be placed to the credit of the said guaranteed liability of £10,000 in the plaintiff bank until the whole of the said amount had been paid. The above conditions were embodied in a written undertaking, dated the 1st of December, 1903, given by the said Whitworth and Co. to the defendant, with the full knowledge and consent of the plaintiff, who agreed to the terms thereof, it being clearly understood between the parties that all the cargo on board the said ship Atbara was to be made over to the defendant in security of his guarantee, and that, when £10,000 worth of timber had been sold, the defendant was to be freed from all further responsibility in the matter.

3. The defendant has no knowledge of the allegations in paragraph 5 of the declaration, save that he admits on the 7th day of April, 1904, he received notice from the plaintiff that a draft for £9,978 17s. 8d. on the said Whitworth and Co., said to be due on that date, had been dishonoured by non-payment, calling upon him for payment of the said amount with expenses in terms of his guarantee.

4. As to paragraph 6 the defendant does not admit that the said firm of Whitworth and Co. had failed to pay or make provision for the payment of freight, demurrage, landing and other charges as alleged in respect of the said cargo, but he says that, even if they had so failed, there was no obligation cast upon him under his suretyship to make such provision. He denies that the payment or provision of payment by him for the freight and other said charges was contemplated by the said agreement, and he also denies that any payment or advances in respect of the said charges which may have been made by the plaintiff (as to which the defendant has no knowledge) were made on his account, or that he is in any way liable therefor.

5. That defendant admits that the plaintiff caused the said cargo to be landed at East London, but he says that the plaintiff's action in so doing was premature, unjustifiable, without authority, and in excess of its rights under the said agreement, inasmuch as, at the time of such landing, the said draft had not yet matured, and there had not been any failure on the part of Whitworth and Co. or of the defendant to fulfil the conditions of the said agreement. He also admits that the plaintiff was the holder of the bills of lading and other documents, but says that these were held by the plaintiff in trust for the defendant, as well as for himself, in terms of the said undertaking by the said Whitworth and Co. referred to in paragraph 2 hereof, to which the plaintiff was a party, as aforesaid.

6. The defendant admits that the plaintiff received the said cargo, and subsequently sold the same as alleged, but he says that, save that he consented to the release of certain timber on March 9, 1904, all the said sales, except that by public auction which was the last, were made without any notification to him, and that in making the said sales the plaintiff acted unlawfully and in defiance of the defendant's rights. He admits notice, on or about the 12th of October, 1906, of the sale by auction, with which he declined to interfere on the ground that he no longer had any responsibility in the matter.

7. He admits paragraph 7 of the declaration, save that he denies that his action as therein set forth was wrongful or unlawful. Immediately upon notice of dishonour of the said draft, to wit on the 8th of April, 1904, the defendant duly tendered to pay the same and the noting charges against delivery to him of the necessary papers to enable him to receive the said cargo, which tender was wrongfully and unlawfully refused by the plaintiff on the ground that he had a lien upon the cargo for freight, demurrage, and other charges. The defendant says that the plaintiff had no right as against him to detain the said cargo, but that, upon his tendering the amount of the said draft as aforesaid, it was bound, in terms of the said agreement and undertaking, to deliver up to him the cargo or the documents necessary to enable him to receive it. The defendant thereafter, on or about the 22nd of April, 1904, withdrew his said guarantee, as he was entitled to do by reason of the plaintiff's refusal of his said tender, and he contends that thereupon he was released from all further liability in the matter.

8. The defendant denies paragraph 8, and says that the plaintiff, having sold the said timber wrongfully and unjustifiably as aforesaid, is not entitled to any commission in respect of such sale.

9. As to paragraph 9, he does not admit the correctness of the said account, and he denies that he is liable to the plaintiff in the sum claimed or any part thereof. Even if he were still liable for the amount of the said draft, the sum shown in the said account to have been received by the plaintiff, as the proceeds of the said cargo, is in any case in excess of his guarantee under the said agreement, and he denies any liability for interest or advances in respect of freight, demurrage, or other charges.

10. The defendant says further that, even if the plaintiff was entitled to sell the said timber, the same suffered depreciation in value owing to exposure to the weather and otherwise through the negligence, default, and want of proper care on the part of the plaintiff in stacking it, and moreover, owing to the unnecessary delay of the plaintiff in selling it, the cost of storage and other expenses were unduly increased, while the actual proceeds of the timber were far below what would have been obtained by prompt sales. If the said cargo had been properly dealt with by the plaintiff, the proceeds would have more than covered the amount of the plaintiff's claim against the said Whitworth and Co. under the said agreement, and the plaintiff is therefore not entitled to recover from the defendant any deficiency which may have arisen thereon.

11. The defendant denies paragraph 10 of the declaration.

12. He further says specially that the estate of the said Whitworth and Co. was placed under sequestration as insolvent on or about the 10th February, 1905. That the plaintiff proved upon the said estate a claim for £12,066 10s. in respect of the liability of the said firm under the said agreement. That the plaintiff in an affidavit of proof of the said debt, made in terms of paragraph 30 of Ordinance 6 of 1843, stated that for the said claim it held certain cargo ex Atbara, valued at £12,500 (which is the cargo herein referred to), and also a guarantee of the defendant for £10,000, and that it valued the said security at the amount of the said claim. Thereafter the said security was, under the provisions of the said section, abandoned by the trustee of the said estate to the plaintiff for his full benefit, and the plaintiff accepted the same and sold the said cargo, which realised more than the amount of the said claim. The defendant says that even if he was, prior to the date of sequestration of the said firm, liable to the plaintiff in any sum by virtue of his said suretyship, the plaintiff, by proving upon the said estate as aforesaid, and accepting in settlement of its claim the said security at the valuation placed upon the same by itself, released the defendant from any further liability to its under the said agreement, and is not now entitled to recover the sum claimed, or any part thereof from him.

Wherefore the defendant prays that the plaintiff's claim may be dismissed with costs.

Plaintiffs, in their replication, denied the statements in the plea, except in so far as they were admitted in the declaration, and specially denied that the bank acted unlawfully and unjustifiably or that they had released defendant by making proof on the estate of Whitworth and Co.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Upington), for plaintiffs. Mr. Burton (with him Dr. Rainsford) for defendant.

Mr. Schreiner, in opening the case, mentioned that the shortfall seemed to have been occasioned by the glut in the market and the falling off of building and other trades requiring timber.

Mr. Burton said that the essential point in the case was that plaintiffs in their declaration said the contract never contemplated the payment of freight by Whitworths and the guarantor. Defendant said that the only possible claim plaintiffs had against him was for £10,000, that the question of freight and other charges which might arise never was contemplated under the agreement and of the subsequent charges could not be made against him under the guarantee.

Mr. Schreiner proceeded to lead evidence.

Richard Henry Friend, manager of the National Bank, East London, said that in the first instance Mr. Whitworth went to Pretoria and arranged with the general manager of the bank about a letter of credit being given. On Mr. Whitworth's return negotiations took place, and the agreement of December 1, 1903, was entered into. The agreement was embodied in a printed form, and was identical with all such agreements used by the banks. The draft became due in April and was dishonoured. The ship arrived in January, 1904. Whitworth's were unable to pay the freight, and had already met their creditors. Mr. Tickler (one of the partners) being appointed to work out the firm's affairs. Witness wrote to Mr. Peel on February 2 and posted the letter.

Mr. Burton: We strenuously deny receiving this letter.

Witness (continuing) said that he had not brought the press copybook into which the letter was copied. Witness afterwards had an interview with Mr. Peel on the subject. In the letter in question witness said that they had to request payment of £10,000, amount of guarantee on behalf of E. Whitworth and Co. that the freight was due and they were advancing the freight. The same, they added, was being paid in order to save demurrage. Witness was acting throughout with headquarters, and the bank paid all the freight, landing charges, and incidental expenses. Peel knew the bank paid the freight, and he raised no protest. The position of Whitworth and Co. was notorious to everybody in East London at the time, and was known, of course, to Peel. They appointed Whitworth and Co. as agents for the bank to see to the landing of the cargo. Every possible care was taken as regarded the stacking of the timber. The utmost tender that defendant made to the bank was that he would meet the draft, and plaintiffs must hand over the cargo or give him credit for such portions as were being sold against payment of £9,978.

The general impression at that time was that there would not be a shortage on the realisation of the cargo. When Whitworth's went into insolvency the bank proved for £12,500. The whole of the cargo had not then been sold. The account showed that there was a balance to the bank of £6,601, through Whitworth and Co. failing to perform their obligations under the agreement. Witness believed that the market was glutted with timber at the time. The Standard Bank also were holders of another cargo in the hands of Whitworth and Co., who were thus disposing of timber for two banking institutions at one time. Witness denied that he had ever given an assurance to Mr. Peel or his attorney (Mr. Wakefield) that the former's liability would be limited to £10,000, or that he would have no liability as to the freight and other charges.

Cross-examined: The National Bank had only been opened at East London about twelve months when this matter came on. He knew that Whitworths had previously approached the Standard Bank in respect of this shipment; but he did not know that Whitworths had previously approached the Standard Bank in respect of this shipment; and he did not know that the bank had refused to go into it. Witness had not met Peel prior to the end of November, 1903. Peel, when asked if he would be willing to be surety, said that he should, but witness remembered no conditions, except that Peel said he wanted to countersign orders for timber. Witness expected that the freight would be paid by Whitworths when the vessel reached East London.

Argument was heard as to the right of Mr. Burton to cross-examine witness on certain correspondence which had been disclosed by plaintiffs.

Cross-examination continued: Witness admitted having received a letter from the general manager in Pretoria, dated early in February, 1904, in which he asked them not only to get Peel to pay the bill, but also to meet the expenses for freight and other purposes. Witness applied to Peel to sign a further guarantee. He subsequently informed the head office that the guarantor declined, stating that it was £10,000 in all. Whitworths said they were to arrange for freight, irrespective of guarantor, and that they could not pay freight without the bank's assistance. Witness advised the head office that he considered the best plan was to advance the freight, and thus have a lien on the cargo. A further letter, dated February 8, 1904, from the head office to the East London branch was put to witness, in which the head office complained that Whitworths had misled them, and that it was never intended that the freight should be paid from that end.

Maasdorp, J., observed that these discussions in the correspondence between principals and their agents would not affect the legal question in the least.

Cross-examination continued: Mr. Whitworth was no longer in the country; he left soon after the shipment arrived. Witness sent a demand for £10,000, both to Whitworths and defendant. The total liability to the bank was really £9,978 odd. The cargo was excellent when it arrived, and was said to be worth about £25,000. It was one of the finest cargoes of Baltic timber shipped to East London. Witness was told that proper precautions were taken as regarded the stacking of the timber. He understood that, when the timber came to be sold, thousands of pieces had to be sawn from the ends because they were rotten. When Whitworths became insolvent the bank proved against the estate for £12,066. They valued the balance of the cargo at the time unsold at £12,500; he did not remember having had a special valuation made.

Alexander Richards Watson, formerly employed by the Standard Bank at East London, said that in December, 1903, he joined Whitworth and Co., upon an advantageous offer from the firm. Witness was at present a trustee of Whitworth and Co. During the liquidation he left their employ in July, 1904; from that time he had a sort of retaining fee from the creditors. Soon after he joined Whitworths he found that Peel got from them a sum of £500. He regarded Tickle, Whitworth's manager, as a competent and practical man in the timber trade. When the ship arrived in East London the Athara's captain was very much agitated about the inability of Whitworths to pay the freight. Witness considered that the stacking of the cargo was the best that could be done under the circumstances.

Henry Judson, inspector of the National Bank, and acting manager of the East London branch during Mr. Friend's absence on leave in April, stated that the plaintiff bank granted to Whitworth and Co. a letter of credit authorising a Swedish firm to draw upon the plaintiffs' London office up to £10,000 for the purchase of timber, to be shipped to East London for Whitworth and Co. Defendant became the surety on behalf of Whitworth and Co. Advances were made up to £9,978, and a cargo of timber was brought to East London in January, 1904, in the Athara. The bank drew a bill on Whitworths, but at the due date this was dishonoured. When the ship arrived Whitworths could not pay the freight. Whitworths subsequently went into liquidation. The bank paid the freight, and other charges, had the cargo landed, stacked, and sold, and they said that, after the sales had been taken into account there was a shortfall of £6,601 17s. 8d., for which they said Peel was liable under his guarantee. Defendant pleaded that his liability was limited to £10,000, the amount of his guarantee, and that after £10,000 had been realised by the sale of the timber, he was released from further responsibility.

Mr. Schreiner closed his case.

Thomas Peel, defendant, stated that in September or October, 1903, he was approached by Whitworth, who asked him to go as guarantor for certain facilities from the bank. The bank was aware of the terms of the document, which they agreed to. Before he signed the guarantee to the bank he got the document from Whitworth.

Mr. Schreiner objected to this evidence, which he said went to vary the written document between the bank and Mr. Peel.

Maasdorp, J., said that very often subsidiary matter was allowed in order to arrive at the intention between the parties. Anything varying the contract would not be taken as evidence.

Witness (continuing) said he had Whitworth's contract signed before he signed the guarantee in the bank. In November, Friend agreed to the terms in Whitworth's document. Later in the same day Friend again called, and witness repeated the terms in the presence of Tickle and Whitworth, and they all agreed to them. Subsequently, witness's attorney, Wakefield, suggested some modification as to the freight, and on a fourth occasion witness dictated the terms to Wakefield, who had them written out, and Friend again agreed. The same afternoon witness went to the bank, and signed the guarantee, after Friend assured them that the guarantee was according to the terms verbally agreed upon. When the ship arrived, Friend asked witness to pay the freight, and witness pointed out that he had nothing to do with the freights. Witness went across to see Whitworth, and Friend came in while they were discussing the matter. Tickle said to witness: "You are not to pay the freight; we will settle it." He did not receive a letter dated February 2 demanding £10,000. At that time he was in a position to pay, and would willingly have paid the money and taken over the cargo. Witness understood the freight had been paid. Previous to receiving the letter of demand the only communication he received was one in March, in which Friend asked him to countersign an order for the release of part of the cargo. A few days before the sale, the timber was covered for the first time; it was very much damaged by rain and sun.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He did not take Whitworth's document to the bank, and say to the manager that the terms contained therein were those which he must agree to. The document was not read over to him when he signed, it was read over to him on the first meeting in the presence of Mr. Wakefield, who suggested that it should be modified. He was not sure that the document he signed was the same as the one which was read over to him. When he said that Whitworth should pay the freight, he did not know that the firm was not in a position to pay the freight.

Wm. Tiokle, formerly a partner of the firm of Whitworth and Co., stated that he did not know the defendant before this guarantee transaction. Witness was present at the interview with Friend and the defendant when the terms of the contract between Whitworth and Peel were discussed. The bank was aware of the terms of the document.

Mr. Schreiner objected to this evidence on the ground that it was either irrelevant or tending to show a variation of the contract.

Mr. Burton and Mr. Schreiner having been heard in argument on the point, Measendorp, J.: I must admit that this question is not altogether without difficulty, and I also say that I do not now decide it upon certain general principles that have been raised in argument. It seems to me there is a special state of circumstances in this case upon which the Court can decide this point. There is now before the Court in a written form a letter written by Whitworth, in which he expresses his consent to enter into a certain agreement. There is nothing before the Court to show under what circumstances that undertaking was given. It is a bilateral contract, and the Court now only has before it the obligation on the one part which necessarily contains certain terms, which will be binding upon both, but it has already been found necessary in going into this case to lay before the Court the circumstances under which this undertaking was entered into by Whitworth; the arrangements that were made at the time for the purchase of certain goods, and how the matter was discussed as to the necessity for paying for these goods and the necessity the defendant was under to obtain the consent of the bank. That was in the shape of a conversation, and upon this conversation this undertaking was signed on the part of Whitworth. It seems to me quite admissible in this case to take evidence as to what was said or written on the part of the bank at the time when this agreement was entered into. We have it, as it were, one letter in correspondence, or one letter in negotiations, and I think the preceding negotiations are admissible in evidence. There is nothing as yet to show that the evidence will have the effect of varying the contract. The question is: How do you know the bank had knowledge of this document? There is nothing to show that the answer will vary the contract, and the Court will lay down this rule, that the evidence is admissible, but not for the purpose of varying the contract.

Witness (proceeding) gave it as his reason that the bank had knowledge of the terms of the document, that Friend was present at the defendant's office when the matter was generally discussed. The defendant emphatically laid down the conditions under which he would become guarantor. When the defendant mentioned the freight, witness told him that he (defendant) had not to pay for it. Witness proceeded to describe the arrangements made for stacking the timber in the grounds of the Agricultural Society, and the exposure to which it was subjected. The ceiling and floorboards were kept in the yard about 20 months, and should have been covered over. The Repton cargo filled the sheds. Witness considered the Athara cargo at the wharf to have been worth about £18,000. The erection of a shed to cover the flooring and ceiling boards would have cost about £400 or £500, and the shed could afterwards have been sold for about £200 when it was not required. Many of the boards were discoloured green or black, and portions were rendered unsuitable, and pieces had to be sawn off the ends. He had made calculations with Mr. Gladwin as to the boards sold by auction, and they arrived at the conclusion that 44,000 boards for which 11s. was the market price only realised 3d. He thought the Repton cargo was rather larger than the Athara's, and would be worth about £20,000. Witness sold as liquidator. He acted at first on behalf of Peel, as he understood; he afterwards acted as liquidator on behalf of the bank, beginning from the 24th February, 1904, about a month after the ship had arrived. He was appointed to be liquidator at a meeting of Whitworth's creditors on 24th February, and to dispose of the cargoes on behalf of the banks.

By the Court: Witness dealt with the cargo as best he could under the circumstances. He was not aware that other stores were available where the timber could have been placed. He had told Mr. Friend that he computed the value of the cargo from £23,000 to £25,000; that was what he regarded as the selling value before the slump came. Peel knew that the cargo was in his (witness's) hands, and at no time did he raise any protest about the sales or the stacking of the timber. Witness was the practical man of Whitworth and Co., and Whitworth was the financial and office man. Whitworth was to find the money, and he led them to believe that he could get money from a private source. That money did not materialise and when the ship arrived Whitworth's had no money to pay the freight. Peel said he was owner of the cargo, and used to call at Whitworth's office. Whitworth's, as far as witness remembered, did not broach the subject of freight to Peel. Witness subsequently told Peel that they had paid the freight; as a matter of fact the bank had paid the freight. Witness had not heard Peel say that he would rather have the ship rot than pay the freight. The agreement between Whitworth's and defendant provided that, in consideration of Peel giving his guarantee, he was to receive £500.

Samuel Thomas Wakefield, of East London, defendant's attorney, said that Mr. Friend, manager of the plaintiff bank, had no knowledge of the consideration of £500 to be paid to Peel by Whitworth's. Witness detailed an interview which took place at the National Bank on the 1st December, 1903, in the presence of Mr. Friend, Mr. Whitworth, defendant, and himself. Witness at the interview raised the question of freight, whereupon Whitworth said that they would pay the freight in East London, and that Peel would only guarantee the letter of credit. Witness then said that the printed form of agreement which Peel was asked to sign would have to be modified, whereupon Mr. Friend said that he did not think the General Manager would allow any alteration of the printed form, that they all knew what the agreement was, and, at any rate, there were three of them against himself. In subsequent conversation Peel said that everything on board was to be his in security for his guarantee. Witness afterwards drew up the statement between Whitworths and Peel.

Mr. Upington: Did you tell Mr. Friend in November that Peel was good for £15,000?

Witness: I am secretary of the Divisional Council, and I have a good many applications. I may, or may not, have done so. I have no recollection of it.

The effect of your evidence is that Mr. Friend, as manager of the bank, agreed to that document between Peel and Whitworth as a binding agreement?—As far as I am able I am giving exactly what occurred, and I say what I understood was, that the conditions had been agreed to.

You knew if it was intended to make the bank a party to that agreement, no portion of it was in the document that was signed at the bank by your client—No, I don't suppose there was any portion of it in.

Now, if it had been intended that the bank was to be a party to that agreement, Mr. Wakefield, a legal gentleman of your experience would have seen that these terms were embodied in the principal agreement?—Yes; but they would not allow us to alter it. I don't say that the bank intended to make themselves a party to the agreement at all. I say this document embodies practically what was said at the interview.

Thomas George Gladwin, formerly employed by Whitworth and Co., gave evidence as to the state of things where the timber was stored from the time he was engaged as storeman in February, 1905.

Leonard K. Walker, architect, East London, said that he had never, during all his experience, known floor and ceiling boards stacked in the open as in February, 1905, he saw the Atbara's cargo stacked. A shed could have been put over the timber at a cost of about £500.

Mr. Burton closed his case.

Postea (June 29th).

Mr. Schreiner (for plaintiff): Peel refused even to pay the freight. He admits that a verbal demand was made for the payment of the bill, but he denies that he received our letter; we can prove delivery of the letter. The bank was left without aid from either the obligors or the obligees and was forced to spend thousands to protect the interests of all concerned. Whitworth and Co. owed the bank over £6,600. The bank had to pay freight and charges on the Atbara shipment as the obligors would not. If Peel had paid his £9,000 the bank would have been glad to hand over the bills of lading and to have had nothing further to do with the matter. The bank was willing to let Whitworth and Co. have the documents to clear the goods and realise, but they could not do so, and Clause 5 authorises the bank to clear and realise should Whitworth and Co. fail to do so. The bank had the right to receive the goods and sell by public auction, but this involved paying landing charges, etc., to get possession of the goods. The Atbara account was kept distinct from the current account of Whitworth and Co. This Atbara account is shown to amount to £6,601.

[Maasdorp, J.: The contention is that you lent the money to Whitworth and Co. to realise the goods.]

We lent nothing; it was not likely that we should practically make Whitworth and Co. a present of £6,601. Whitworth's current account was £12,000. Under Clause 3 the bank was entitled to compel Peel to pay £9,900. Peel's evidence was self contradictory. At one time he said he would rather have let the ship rot than pay a single penny; at another time he said he would have paid the freight if asked. He wanted to get the cargo on paying simply the freight without the other charges which the bank had advanced. Whitworth and Co. indemnified both the bank and Peel against all risk. Peel signed as co-principal debtor. As to co-principal debtors, see Van der Vyver v. De Wyld and Others (4 Searle, 27). There Watermeyer, J., discussed the history of the law on this point from Cod. (8-41-3) and Fort (46-1-16), where Fort discusses the force of the clause singuli in solidum and holds that it does not involve renunciation of the beneficium divisionis. Watermeyer, J., also cited Cens. Foren. (4-17-23) and Van der Kessel (Thes., 503). Peel is not a mere surety but a co-principal debtor with Whitworth. Whitworth could not fulfil his obligation, and so Peel in law became liable. We have nothing to do with any understanding between Whitworth and Peel; we take our stand on the agreement between Peel and ourselves. In his evidence Peel says that if he had been asked to pay up the £10,000 as guarantor he would have been glad to have done so, but we asked him to do so in our letter of February 2nd. The bank paid the freight to save demurrage. He admits that he was asked to pay the freight. He knew that a meeting of Whitworth's creditors had been called and yet he then says that he did not know that Whitworth and Co. could not pay the freight. Peel might reasonably have complained had we not released the goods, and thus left him without security. On April 9th he got notice of the dishonour of a bill for £9,978, and to have the proceeds of part of the cargo which had been already sold and apparently he expected us to lie out of the landing charges, insurance, etc., etc. On April 22nd, 1904, he withdrew his guarantee to the bank, and yet long after this he was taking the greatest interest in the condition of the cargo. In February, 1905, the firm of Whitworth and Co., which had for some time been carried on by Tickell for the benefit of the creditors, was voluntarily sequestrated, Tickell signing the petition. We valued the cargo at £12,066 and abandoned it; but it does not follow that the cargo realised £12,500, or that it was worth that sum, or that by abandoning the cargo we received payment of the £12,066 owing to us. We gave full notice of the sale of the balance of the timber although we were not legally bound to do so. We had not given notice of previous sales because they were cash sales. Every allegation in the declaration has been proved, and now the defence is set up that the plaintiff agreed that Whitworth should hand over all bills of lading to Peel. Any arrangement between Whitworth and Peel is res inter alios acta and does not concern us. The Court ruled that this agreement could not be brought in to vary our contract with Peel.

[Counsel dealt at length with the evidence of Tickell, Friend and Wakefield.]

[Maasdorp, J.: Peel could never be liable for more than £10,000 as he would always have the security of the cargo to fall back upon. Now he is asked for only £6,000.]

Of course there was a limit to his guarantee, but then he had to pay the insurance, landing charges, etc. The first charges on the proceeds of the cargo are the moneys advanced by the banks to enable the creditors to get the cargo. The contract of a surety must be continued strictissimi juris i.e., must always be construed in favour of the surety (Colonial Government v. Edenborough (4 Juta 290) where see judgment of De Villiers, C.J. Turn to Burge, Collier or any other authority on suretyship and we shall not find any ground on which the defendant could be excused from liability as a surety. See MacDonald v. Bell (3 M.P.C., 315). That case was decided under our law, but see Black v. Ottoman Bank (15 M.P.C., 472), Oudshoorn Public School v. White (10 S.C.R., 213), Rudd, Milton and Co. v. Dolley and Co. (3 E.D.C., 351). Even where a creditor holds a second claim against the same security, a co-guarantor who has only one claim cannot come upon the surety unless he meets both claims. Woodhouse* (23 Beav. 18).

Mr. Burton (for defendant). The first point is what was the actual nature of the contract on which the defendant is sued. By the document put in the defendant became liable up to £10,000 as and for the price of a certain cargo. The plaintiff contends that the defendant is liable for all charges and says that he became liable up to £10,000 as and for the price of the cargo. Plaintiff contends that defendant is liable for all charges, but he only became liable for the draft up to £10,000. There is nothing in the document put in as to freight, landing charges, etc. In paragraph six of the declaration plaintiff alleges that the letter of credit contemplates the liability of Peel for freights, etc. I admit that any agreement between Whitworth and Peel cannot vary the written contract. The plea clearly sets forth the defendant's position. He does not say that the undertaking of December 1st sets forth the condition as between the parties, but that the conditions of which all the parties were aware had been incorporated in that document. See Patle v. Hornbrook (1896 1 chapter D. 25). The guarantee being silent as to freight, demurrage, etc., none of the parties deemed that these matters entered into the agreement. See evidence of Peel and Tickell.

Although any arrangement between Peel and Whitworth could have nothing to do with the bank, an understanding of which all parties concerned were cognisant, would have been binding. See the evidence of Friend and Wakefield. The East London branch of the bank had only been recently opened, and Friend was naturally anxious to get this business. He sought out Peel, and neither he nor Peel had any doubt as to Whitworth's financial position. All the parties expected him to pay freight on the arrival of the ship. I admit, that if Whitworth failed to fulfil the conditions of his undertaking, the bank was entitled to take the cargo, to land and sell it. Friend did not deny that he said that the three of them were at the bank, and that they all understood the arrangement. The parties all understood that freight, etc., were outside Peel's guarantee. The bank could have called upon Peel to pay the draft as soon as the ship arrived. He would have been willing to do this, and then would have been free from any further liability.

Friend says that he did write a demand, but the ship arrived on January 22, and he certainly did not write till the 2nd of February. The letter said to have been written then, of which a copy is said to have been made by one of his clerks, and which we deny having received demanded payment of a draft of £10,000. He admits that this letter was a mistake. He said nothing about having made a demand on Whitworth, though he had done so on the same day. He received no reply from Peel, and Peel denies having received the letter. Friend was certain that he had posted the letter; he sometimes sent letters by hand, and these sometimes went astray. I say that no demand was made till April. Friend did not demand payment of a draft, but a sum of £10,000, which was not due. See his letter of February 2 to the bank at Pretoria and the reply. These show that Peel was only liable for his guarantee on the Bill. The letter from Pretoria, of February 8, confirms the letter of February 3, and shows that the bank was disappointed by Whitworth failing to pay the freight. They did not expect Peel to do so. In March the bank wanted Peel to sign a further guarantee form, but he refused. No demand was made upon him for the draft. When he was asked to pay the freight he refused, and saw Whitworth, who agreed that he (Whitworth) had to pay freight. Mr. Friend was present, and Peel went away and left him and Whitworth together. The bank had no right to seize the cargo, for up to February 2 there had been no failure of any condition, and we say that there was no failure afterwards. The bank is in the position of an unauthorised dealer with the cargo and is responsible for any shortage which may arise from its negligence. What the bank has realised on the cargo should go to the reduction of Whitworth's debt. Instead of that they set it off against all expenses incurred, plus the price of the cargo, and then claim £12,000 from Whitworth's trustee. The cargo has been abandoned, and they have realised 10s. in the pound. I submit that defendant is entitled to deduct one half of the amount claimed, viz., £6,000. See Gie v. Park (33 L.J., 49), Hobson v. Bass (6 Ch. Ap., 792).

Postea (July 6th).

Maasdorp, J.: In December, 1903, the firm of Whitworth and Co., carrying on business at East London, having purchased a quantity of timber in Sweden, found themselves in need of financial assistance to enable them to obtain delivery on board ship from the sellers. The plaintiffs agreed to accommodate them with a letter of credit upon their London office, upon the terms contained in a written acknowledgment signed by E. Whitworth and Co., to which the defendant became a party, in the following terms: "I, Thomas Peel, hereby bind myself as surety in solidum and joint principal debtor to the said The National Bank of South Africa, Limited, for the due fulfilment of the foregoing agreement in respect of this letter of credit, No. 3-1. for £10,000." In terms of their undertaking, the National Bank issued a letter of credit in favour of Messrs. Enhornung and Co., of Sundsvall, Sweden, authorising them to draw on their London office to the extent of £10,000 for the purchase of the timber on account of Whitworth and Co., to be shipped from Sundsvall to East London. The timber was duly shipped, and Enhornung and Co., on the 7th of December, 1903, drew upon Messrs. E. Whitworth and Co. for £9,978 17s. 8d., the price of the timber, payable to their own order. This bill of exchange, which was payable 90 days after sight, was endorsed by Enhornung on the 11th of December, in favour of the National Bank, or order without recourse. In January, 1904, their bill was accepted by E. Whitworth and Co., payable at the National Bank, East London. On the 22nd of January the ship Atbara arrived at East London with the timber on board. Thereupon the plaintiffs, who were the holders of the bill of lading and other shipping documents, communicated with Whitworth and Co., in order to obtain a settlement of their indebtedness upon their undertaking of the 1st of December. The bill of exchange was not due until the 7th of April, but Whitworth and Co. had undertaken to pay the amount at the latest on such date as to enable the bank to place the money in the hands of their London office on the hands of their London office on the day the acceptances would fall vessel might arrive at East London. Upon the arrival of the ship, therefore, the amount of the draft became payable to the plaintiffs. It then appeared that Whitworth and Co. had got into such financial difficulties that they could pay neither the bill nor the freight due on the timber. Under the agreement it was contemplated that the plaintiffs might elect to hand the shipping documents to the firm, to enable them to clear and realise the timber upon their undertaking to account to the bank, and to hold the documents on its behalf. Under the circumstances, however, this clause was not acted upon. The firm was wholly unable to fulfil their engagements, and the 5th clause of the agreement came into operation. It is quite clear, from the evidence, that the defendant was informed of the state of affairs, and that there was a difficulty about the payment of freight. He says himself that when the manager of the bank asked him, upon the arrival of the ship, what was to be done about the payment of freight, he told the manager that it was Whitworth's affair, and he would rather let the ship rot than pay the freight. This must be taken as an absolute refusal on defendant's part to have anything to do with the payment of freight, and the plaintiffs were left to do the best they could under the agreement. Peel said in evidence that Whitworth assured him that the firm would settle for the freight. But nothing was done by the plaintiffs to lead him to believe that the firm ever did so. The defendant was aware, as he says himself, that when Friend spoke to him about the freight, the ship was commencing to incur damage, and he says: "If I had received a letter on that date that Whitworth was not able to pay the freight, I would have paid it and taken delivery of the cargo." He seemed to forget that there was something more to do than pay the freight and take the cargo, and that was to pay the amount of the bill. However, nothing was done by the plaintiffs after the arrival of the ship to forfeit any rights they had under the agreement against the defendant. Upon the failure of Whitworth and Co. to pay the freight, the plaintiffs, who, amongst other rights, had a lien or right of detention against the cargo, as a security for their debt, found that the goods would become liable to demurrage unless they were speedily landed. They therefore took the necessary steps to pay the freight and land the timber. Now, it occurs to me that, without express provision in the contract in that respect, the bank was entitled, as the holders of the bills of lading, to safeguard their rights by retaining the goods until the purchase price was paid. Or, to look at the matter from another point of view, they had a right of retention by way of security, until the principal debt was paid. To preserve the security, and to prevent its being reduced by the liability for demurrage, they were entitled to pay the freight, without which they could not have obtained possession. But in the absence of any express condition in the agreement, they would have been obliged to take judgment against the debtor, and deal with the goods thereafter in execution for the satisfaction of the judgment. However, the contract expressly provided that, failing the fulfilment by Whitworth and Co. of any of the foregoing conditions, the bank should be at liberty to land the timber and sell it by public auction or otherwise, and to take a commission of 2½ per cent. on the gross proceeds over and above the aforesaid commission and exchange shortly after the ship arrived. Whitworth and Co. went into liquidation, and the creditors consented that the bank should deal with the goods under the above clause. The bank appointed Tickler, one of the partners in the firm of Whitworth and Co., to act for them in the safe custody and disposal of the timber. After that the estate of Whitworth and Co. was sequestrated as insolvent, and the trustee abandoned to the bank the security they held, at the value placed upon it by the creditor. The timber was realised, with the ultimate result is shown in the plaintiffs' account. The defendant is perfectly right in his contention that he should be allowed the benefit of the securities held by the bank upon his satisfying the debt of his principal. The bank has allowed him the full benefit they themselves derived from the security, but the defendant contends that through the gross negligence of the bank the timber was so seriously damaged and reduced in value that he is entitled to relief in that respect. Without going into the legal question as to the responsibility of the creditor for the safe-keeping of the security, I may say that I am of opinion that the bank did all in their power to realise it to the best advantage, and that any damage that was suffered arose from unavoidable circumstances. Moreover, the defendant was well aware of what was being done, and he could have protected himself. I have dealt with the case thus far irrespective of what I may call the principal ground of defence set up by the defendant. The defendant alleges that by a collateral contract entered into at the same time as the agreement upon which the plaintiff sues he was held harmless of the payment of freight, and that while released from liability from freight he was entitled to the full benefit of the timber as security for the debt, and as the timber realised £14,043 5s. 10d., whereas the debt was £9,978 17s. 8d., the creditor was fully satisfied as far as he was concerned. When evidence was tendered with the object of proving this collateral contract, it was objected on behalf of the plaintiff that it was inadmissible as tending to vary the admitted agreement between the parties. It was argued for the defence that a contemporaneous agreement as to any collateral matter not dealt with in the contract would not be at variance, and was admissible. Without at the time deciding that point, I feel that upon the face of the document relied upon by the plaintiff it was merely a collateral undertaking signed by Whitworth, and as reciting the promise of the bank, but it did not purport to be a complete and entire contract, putting forth all the terms agreed to by the bank, and that possibly such agreement by the bank might be contained in another document, or might be proved by parol evidence. Upon that ground I admitted the evidence. I do not now say that the defendant's counsel may not have been right in his contention that even if the contract was a complete and entire whole signed by all the contracting parties, that an understanding as to a collateral matter, such as freight, may not have been admissible, but in the view I take of the evidence admitted upon another ground, it is unnecessary to decide that point. And I am not sorry not to be called upon to decide a point as to the admissibility of extrinsic parol testimony to affect written instruments, which Taylor, in his work on evidence, section 1128, declares to be, perhaps, the most difficult branch of the law of evidence. The evidence put in was a document signed by Whitworth and Co., in which they agree to pay the defendant £500 in consideration of his becoming security, consenting that the bank and Peel should have the benefit of the timber as security for the debt, undertaking to pay the freight and landing charges, and indemnifying Peel in respect thereof. There is absolutely nothing contained in the document which adds anything to the obligation incumbent upon Whitworth and Co. under their agreement with the bank. But it is said for the defendant that the bank was informed of this undertaking, and consented to it, and by their consent they undertook to hold defendant harmless of the payment of freight. It was contended that, as a consequence, the bank was obliged to pay the freight, and allow the defendant the full benefit of the security free from freight and charges. The acquiescence of the bank in the undertaking by Whitworth in favour of Peel cannot possibly throw that responsibility on them. But it is not necessary to go into that, for I find upon the evidence that there is no proof that the bank was a party to this agreement. The manager denies that he became a party to it, and there is certainly no evidence on the part of the defendant to prove positively that the manager undertook to indemnify the defendant, and hold him harmless in respect of the freight. A further position is taken up by the defendant, and that is that the bank did not pay the freight by virtue of the terms of the contract, and to protect their security; but they made a loan on advance to Whitworth and Co. to enable them to pay the freight and expenses. If that were so, it might materially affect the right of the parties, but it is unnecessary to go into the law on that point, because the evidence does not establish the fact. I am of opinion that the defendant is liable for the debt, and has received upon the account rendered by the plaintiff the full benefit of the security. No evidence has been led to dispute the correctness of the figures upon the plaintiffs' account, and judgment must be given as prayed, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), the Hon Sir JOHN BUCHANAN, and the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

SAAIMAN AND OTHERS v. { 1906.
VAN DER MERWE AND { July 9th.
OTHERS. " 12th.

Water Court—Jurisdiction—Appeal—Act 40 of 1899.

A Water Court established under Act 40 of 1899 has jurisdiction to decide a question of damages alleged to have been sustained by a party to a dispute concerning the diversion of water from a stream alleged by him to be a public perennial stream, and if the Water Court decides that the stream is not perennial, there is an appeal to the Supreme Court under the 15th section of the Act.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Water Court of the district of Ladismith in an application brought by the appellants against the respondents to recover damages for alleged wrongful diversion of water, and an order for removal of certain obstructions. Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Dr. Greer), was for appellants; Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Louwrens), was for respondents.

Mr. Searle said that this was an appeal from a decision of the Water Court held at Ladismith. Judgment was given on the 26th April last in a matter in which the present appellant was applicant and the present respondents were respondents.

Mr. Schreiner (interposing) said that he wished to mention that he took in limine an objection that there was no appeal from this judgment of the Water Court.

Mr. Searle said that, with regard to that point, he had better state shortly what the circumstances of the case were and discuss the objection afterwards. The Water Court was established under the Act 40, 1899. The claim in this case was that the respondents be adjudged jointly and severally to pay the applicants the sum of £100 as damages sustained by reason of the respondents having wrongfully and unlawfully diverted water, and that they might be ordered to remove the obstructions they had placed in the Hoeko River to prevent the free flow of water to the applicants' property, the farm Annex Hoeko. Applicant claimed under a servitude registered against the farm Hoeko, whereunder he was entitled to take water from a certain dam. Applicant said that, as riparian proprietor, he was entitled to a sufficient supply of water for his ordinary purposes, and also to a reasonable share for irrigation purposes. The respondents, he said, had constructed certain dams and furrows, and had thereby wrongfully and unlawfully deprived him of the use of the water of the river. First of all, the respondents excepted to the first prayer that the Court had no jurisdiction to award damages. Then in regard to the second prayer they said that all the parties were not before the Court. In their plea defendants denied that they had constructed any additional dams or furrows in January and February as alleged, and deprived the applicant of water that he had previously enjoyed. In case the foregoing plea was held to be insufficient, they set up a defence of prescription.

[De Villiers, C.J. (to Mr. Searle): Under what Act do you appeal?]

Mr. Searle: It seems to me, unless section 15 of Act 40 of 1889 gives the power there is no other power in the Act.

Mr. Schreiner said that the consent filed in the Water Court stated that the applicant procured the intervention of certain executors as co-applicants, and the respondent procured the intervention of certain parties as co-respondents, and they agreed to abide and be bound by the judgment of the Court, and the exceptions were withdrawn.

Mr. Searle: There is no consent filed, save that the Court shall have jurisdiction under the section 15.

[De Villiers, C.J.: That is not the point raised by Mr. Schreiner; his objection is as to the right of appeal to the Supreme Court.]

Mr. Schreiner: That is so.

Mr. Searle said that he did not read the consent to mean that the parties agreed to submit this matter to the final decision of the Water Court. There were two big dams on the farm, and this dam was one. The water from the dam that the appellants complained of as barring off all their water would come down to the dam marked "q" on the plan. The whole of the evidence did not show that, but the bulk of the evidence certainly showed that.

Mr. Schreiner submitted that on the authority of Waite and Harvey v. Young (15 "Cape Times" Reports, 793), the appellants had no right of appeal to the Supreme Court from the judgment of the Water Court in this matter. There were two cases in which a right of appeal was given. The one was where a right of abutment was under consideration. The other was against an order as to the distribution of water. Counsel also quoted the case of Nel v. Kleinhans (15 "Cape Times" Reports, 120), and pointed out that that case was decided distinctly under section 11. His point in pressing the preliminary objection was that his learned friend was on an inexorable dilemma, because, if he came under section 5 (subsection 3), there was no appeal from such decision, but only a review on the ground of irregularity or otherwise, and if he came under section 16 it seemed to have been the intention of the parties who signed the consent that they would be bound by the judgment of the Water Court. On the point of damages, the Act, he said, never used the word "damages." If the Court had any jurisdiction in damages it was left entirely to be inferred from the words. The fact that the applicants claimed damages indicated that they came under section 16 when the consent paper was filed. There was no provision for damages except they came under section 16. It was equally good for the purpose of his (Mr. Schreiner's) objection whether it be a section 16 or a section 5 matter.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Is not the line of distinction between section 11 and section 1 a very thin one?]

Mr. Schreiner: The line of distinction is this: that under section 11 the application is always to have a certain scheme of distribution laid down. That is, something that has to be registered on the title.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Supposing it had been a perennial stream, then the Water Court would make a distribution?]

Mr. Schreiner: They could not, because a man cannot get what he does not ask for. He asked for (1) damages, £100, and (2) to remove an obstruction in the stream.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Is that all?]

Mr. Schreiner: That is all; no other relief, nothing else is asked for.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But would not that removal of an obstruction of necessity mean some scheme of distribution?]

Mr. Schreiner: Surely not, my lord. If he did come under section 11, then his application is not in accordance with the forms prescribed for section 11.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But could not the Water Court go further and say that they would not only remove an obstruction, but also lay down a fair distribution of the water?]

Mr. Schreiner: The difficulty is as to the Act and the regulations. Continuing, counsel said it would be well that people should understand when the Water Court has given its decision on these matters, when they do not come under section 7 or section 15, that there is no appeal. They should know that they should not waste expenses for their own sake and for the sake of others.

Mr. Searle said if the objection of his learned friend was upheld, it would be a frightful confession of the utter inopititude of the Water Court. Under section 5, sub-section 3, there was no appeal, and yet there was an appeal under sections 7 and 11, and so on. It seemed to him that if the objection was upheld, it was a fortunate thing there was an Irrigation Bill before Parliament now. Why should there be a section 16, which said that in the event of any dispute in a water district concerning the use and diversion of water, the parties may agree in writing to submit the matter in dispute for the final decision of the Water Court. Surely it was the intention of the Court that there should be an appeal, otherwise what would be the use of a section of that kind?

[De Villiers, C.J.: That is an argument which might properly be addressed to the Legislature. You have to satisfy the Court that this is an appeal which comes within the Act.]

Mr. Searle (continuing) said the evidence on both sides showed what was the right distribution, and what was the wrong distribution. Counsel contended all such matters should be appealed against under section 15; otherwise, he submitted, if that was not the intention of the Legislature, it would throw the parties into great confusion, because no one would know what was appealable and what was not, unless it be said that the Water Court had no jurisdiction at all in the matter of damages, except under section 16.

Mr. Schreiner (in reply): Section 15 only relates back to Section 11 and not to Section 10 or any previous section. In every case in which there is no question of registration or title Parliament has given expressly the right of appeal where it has intended to grant it. Here we objected in limine to the claim for damages, but we withdrew the exception when all the parties consented to refer the matter to the Water Court. In assessing these damages the Court was not acting as a Water Court but as an arbitrator. There is no machinery by which a Water Court can recover damages save under Section 16.

[De Villiers, C.J.: How are costs to be recovered.]

They are provided for by section 4.

De Villiers, C.J.: The application in the Court below prayed: (a) That the respondents may be adjudged jointly and severally to pay applicants the sum of £100; and (b) that the respondents be ordered to remove any obstructions which prevent the free flow of water in a certain river to which the applicant claimed to be justly entitled. It is clear that the dispute there arose out of a matter concerning the division of water from a stream alleged to be perennial. Exceptions were taken to the claims on the ground that the first was beyond the jurisdiction of the Court, and that the second claim required the joinder of two other parties. Thereupon these parties were joined and the respondents withdrew their exceptions. Now, it has been argued on behalf of the respondents that that amounted to an agreement between the parties, under section 16 of the Act of 1899, to refer the matter to the final decision of the Court. I confess I cannot look upon that arrangement in this light. The only thing that was consented to by the parties was that when these persons had been joined the exception to the jurisdiction would be withdrawn, but there is not one word throughout to show that all the parties to this dispute had agreed to submit the matter to the final determination of the Court, and, therefore, upon this ground the respondents cannot now successfully maintain that there is no right of appeal. Then we come to the further question: whether in the form in which the proceedings were brought in the Court below, there is a right of appeal to this Court. The powers given to the Water Court are very wide, and they are to be found in several sections of the Act 40 of 1899. The first section provides: That from and after the taking effect of this Act it shall be lawful for the Governor in any area of the Colony to appoint a Court, hereinafter called a Water Court, for the purpose of hearing and determining disputes in connection with the use and appropriation of water and for such other purposes as may be assigned to such Court by this Act, or by regulations framed hereunder, and such area may be styled a water district. These terms “for the purpose of hearing and determining disputes in connection with the appropriation of water” are wide enough to include a claim for damages for improper use and appropriation of water. Then section 5 states the general duties of a Water Court. Among the general duties are the following: (Sub-section 3): “In the event of any dispute arising out of any matter concerning the diversion, use, taking, or appropriation of water from any perennial public stream; or river, to investigate such dispute on the spot, on the application of any party thereto, and to decide on the matter at issue in accordance with this Act, and regulations thereunder." This sub-section appears to be quite wide enough to embrace a claim for damages arising out of a dispute concerning the use, taking, or appropriation of water. I am not, therefore, prepared to give the limited construction to this Act, which has been contended for on behalf of the respondents. My own opinion is, it was the intention of the Legislature to give very wide powers to such a Water Court, and that if it became necessary to decide the question as to damages sustained by either party, by reason of any diversion, use, taking, or appropriation of water, the Water Court would have the power to decide it. Then comes the 11th section, which says: "In the discharge of the duties assigned to it by this Act, and in any case where the flow of any perennial public stream has not been distributed or apportioned, either under any agreement, whether such agreement be verbal or in writing, or by any other legal mode, it shall be lawful for the Water Court upon application in writing of one or more owners of land adjacent to the said stream to investigate all the circumstances, and to make a fair and reasonable apportionment or distribution of the waters for irrigation or other purposes." Then comes the 12th, 13th, and 14th sections, and the 15th section says: "Within three months after receiving notice of any such order, as aforesaid, any person affected by any such decision who may feel himself aggrieved may move the Supreme Court," and so on. What then is meant by the words "such order as aforesaid"? The only order to which it can, according to a strict construction, be held to refer is the order mentioned in the 14th section, as follows: "A copy of the order embodying such scheme shall be served on the riparian proprietors." In strictness, therefore, if the Water Court made no order embodying a scheme there could be no approval, but the respondents' counsel admitted that if the Court, acting under the 11th section, decided that a stream was not perennial, there would be an appeal to the Supreme Court. It appears to me that every order made by a Water Court in the discharge of its judicial duties under the Act was intended to be subject to an appeal, except, of course, orders made in reference to disputes which the parties might have agreed under the 16th section to submit to the final decision of such Water Court. This view, no doubt, conflicts with the decision in Waite and Harvey v. Young (15 C.T.R., 793), but it does not appear that the provisions of the 11th and 15th sections of the Act were cited in that case. It seems to me that the intention of the Legislature was to give an appeal in a case like the one now before the Court, and that Mr. Searle should be allowed to argue the case on behalf of the appellants.

Buchanan, J.: The preliminary objection taken to the hearing of this case was that there is no right of appeal vested in the appellants. I think, after careful reading of the Water Act, there are certain decisions by the Water Court against which there is no appeal. For instance, in a case coming under the 16th section. After careful consideration of what has been called the consent paper, I cannot see that this consent paper brings this case under this 16th section. Then it is said that if this case does not fall under the 16th section it falls under the 5th section, paragraph 3 of which has been cited by His Lordship the Chief Justice. In the previous case which came before me, under clause 1 of section 5 I held there was no appeal against a decision of the Water Court under that section. The ground upon which I held this was that the distinction seemed to have been drawn by the Legislature between a Water Court settling whether a user of water was in accordance with a definite right or a contract, which had previously existed, and a case in which the Water Court was called upon, under the 11th section, for the first time to apportion water between different riparian proprietors. In the latter case, under section 11, it is clear that an appeal is given, but it did not then seem to me clear that any appeal was given under section 5. Since the adjournment my attention has been called more specifically to the first line of the 11th section, which couples acts done by the Water Court "in the discharge of the duties assigned to it by the Act," with cases in which the Water Court for the first time apportions and distributes water among riparian owners. It is common cause that by the 15th section there is an appeal from any order made under the 11th section. The 5th section defines the general duties of a Water Court, and, if in the discharge of those duties, the Water Court should make an order under the 11th section, it follows that there is a right of appeal to the Supreme Court under section 15. I therefore think I erred in the previous case in saying that any decision under section 5 could be appealed against, having overlooked the first line in section 11. Any decision by the Water Court under section 5 that is in discharge of the duties assigned to it by the Act, are by section 11 brought into the subsequent provision of the Act, and therefore an appeal can be had against such decision. The decision of this Court now overrules the case of Waite, which has been referred to. The case of Nel v. Kleinhaus had not then been reported, and was not referred to in argument in the case of Waite, but it does not settle the same point as was raised in the case of Waite. I think, in allowing this appeal, it must be taken to overrule my decision in the case of Waite.

Hopley, J., concurred.

Postea (July 12), Mr. Searle having been heard in argument on the facts,

De Villiers, C.J.: It is not necessary to hear Mr. Schreiner in this case. It is clear that in the year 1838, when a grant of this farm Annex Hoeko was made, a stream which flowed over Hoeko and Annex Hoeko on to Weltevreden was a perennial stream, and this quality of the stream was recognised by the fact that a right was given to the owner of Annex Hoeko to come upon the land of Hoeko and at a certain point marked "q" on the plan, to take out the water, but it is also clear that many years ago, certainly fifty years ago, at the point "a," that is, the upper part of the farm Hoeko, there was a diversion of the main stream. On this point we have the evidence of the respondent's witnesses, and also the applicant's witnesses. Then there is the witness Van Zyl, who says: "Ever since I knew the furrow 'a,' it has always taken away the visible stream of the river, except flood water." He says again: "The river between 'a' and 'c' runs on an average not three months in the year." The whole of the evidence shows that the stream is a very precarious one, and I am satisfied that after the diversion from "a," which has been acquiesced in for more than fifty years, there is not sufficient water to be capable of common use by the proprietors of Hoeko and Annex Hoeko. These witnesses show that the stream is so precarious that it is not capable of common use among the different proprietors. The main point against the present applicant is that he was respondent in a previous case, in which the owner of Weltevreden claimed as against the owners of Hoeko, that they had diverted all the water to Hoeko, and not allowed any to flow beyond. In the previous case he was willing enough to set up the defence that Hoeko had taken all the water, and now, when he wants the Annex Hoeko to take the water, he practically withdraws the defence which had served his purpose when as part owner of Hoeko he was sued by the owner of Weltevreden. The appeal will be dismissed with costs.

Buchanan and Hopley, J.J., concurred.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

BRADY V. S.A. TURF CLUB. { 1906.
July 10th.
" 16th.

Totalisator — S.A. Turf Club — Acts 20 of 1882, 9 of 1886 and 36 of 1902—Ultra vires
—Gaming — Betting — Game of chance.

It is ultra vires of the S.A. Turf Club under Acts 20 of 1882 and 9 of 1886, to provide a totalisator on the grounds of the Kenilworth Racecourse, granted to them for other specific purposes by such Acts.

The totalisator, as carried on by the Club, besides being a means of betting, is a means of gaming, and is, therefore, illegal under the 2nd part of Act 36 of 1902.

Held, therefore, that the plaintiff, as a member of the Club, was entitled to an order declaring this system of gaming to be ultra vires and illegal, and to an interdict restraining the committee of the Club from continuing its use.

This was an action brought by Christopher Brady, attorney, Cape Town, against James Bryant Lindley, in his capacity as chairman of the South African Turf Club, for an order declaring the totalisator to be illegal, and for a perpetual interdict.

Plaintiff's declaration was in the following terms:

1. Plaintiff is Christopher Brady, an attorney of this Honourable Court, practising in Cape Town; defendant is James Bryant Lindley, chairman of the South African Turf Club, and as such the proper person, under section 3 of Act 20 of 1882, as amended by Act 9 of 1886, to be sued for or on behalf of the said South African Turf Club.

2. Plaintiff is a member of the said South African Turf Club.

3. Under and by virtue of Acts 20 of 1882 and 9 of 1886, certain lands situate at Kenilworth, in the division of the Cape, were granted to the said South African Turf Club by the Governor of this colony, for the purposes of a racecourse and for other purposes, on certain conditions in the said Acts set forth, and to which plaintiff craves leave to refer at the trial. In pursuance of the said grant, the said South African Turf Club constructed and laid out a racecourse on the said land at Kenilworth, and erected various buildings in connection therewith.

4. In or about the year 1884 the said club instituted at their said racecourse a system of betting, gaming, or wagering by means of a machine or instrument of gaming known as the totalisator or pari mutuel, and for that purpose has erected on the said course or land certain buildings, in which the said system of betting is carried on. Since the said year, the said club has continued to own, keep, and use the said buildings for purposes of gaming or wagering by means of the said machine or instrument of gaming, and still continues to do so.

5. Plaintiff said that the said club, by instituting and continuing the said system of betting or gambling, and by keeping, owning, or using the said buildings for the said purpose, is acting illegally and in contravention of the provisions of Act 36 of 1902, and more especially of sections 4 to 11, being part 2 of the said Act and section 37 of the said Act.

6. Plaintiff further says that the said club is not authorised or empowered to institute, carry on, keep, or own any such system of betting, gaming, or wagering by means of the said instrument known as the totalisator, under either of the Acts, viz., 20 of 1882 and 9 of 1886, under which the said club is constituted, or under any of the by-laws duly passed, sanctioned, and promulgated in accordance with the provisions of the said Acts, and that the institution, keeping, carrying on, or owning of the said system of betting is ultra vires.

Wherefore plaintiff claims:

(a) An order declaring that the system of gaming, wagering, or betting, as at present carried on by the South African Turf Club by means of the machine or instrument of gaming known as the totalisator is illegal or otherwise, that the said club is not authorised or empowered to institute the said system of betting, wagering, or gaming, and that the institution, keeping, carrying on, or owning thereof is ultra vires of the club.

(b) A perpetual interdict restraining the said club from keeping, carrying on, or owning the said system of betting.

(c) Alternative relief.

(d) Costs of suit.

Defendant, in his plea, admitted paragraphs 1 and 2 of the declaration, and also paragraph 3, but craved leave to refer to the Act in question at the trial for their meaning. As to paragraph 4, defendant admitted that the club had erected buildings in which there was worked a system known as the totalisator, whereby persons who chose to do so were enabled to invest moneys on horses engaged in races held by the club on the day of racing. Defendant specially denied that there was any machine or instrument used for that purpose, and he denied all other allegations contained in paragraph 4. At the time the plaintiff became a member of the club, the totalisator was in use, and plaintiff had from time to time invested money on it, and had at all times acquiesced in its use, and had consented to it. As regarded paragraphs 5 and 6, defendant denied every allegation, and specially denied that he had acted illegally or ultra vires. Wherefore he prayed that plaintiff's claim may be dismissed, with costs.

Plaintiff, in his replication, said, in reference to paragraph 4 of the plea, he admitted that the totalisator was in use when he became a member of the club, and that he had used it for the purpose of investing his money when it suited his convenience. At the time when he joined the club, and up to recently, bookmakers were licensed to ply their avocation on the racecourse, and he had the choice of investing his money either with them or the totalisator. Since bookmakers' licences were withdrawn, defendant had monopolised the whole of the betting on the racecourse by means of the totalisator. He admitted that he had used the instrument for the purpose of investing this money on the races, because no other means was available, but he denied that in any other respect he had acquiesced in or consented to the use of the instrument. On the contrary, whenever possible, he had opposed the monopoly created by the use of the totalisator, and advocated the return to the state of affairs which prevailed when he became a member of the club. Save as above, and save for admissions, he denied the allegations of fact and conclusions of law in the said plea contained joined issue thereon, and again prayed for judgment as before, with costs.

Mr. McGregor (with him Dr. Greer) for plaintiff. Sir H. Juta K.C. (with him Mr. Molteno) for defendants.

Mr. McGregor explained that the matter originally came before the Court on the 29th March last, (16 C.T.R. 237) when plaintiff, on motion, sought (1) to have the proceedings of a certain meeting of the club declared null and void; (2) to have the totalisator declared illegal; and (3) to obtain a perpetual interdict. The Court then refused the first prayer, and, as to the other parts of the application, decided that plaintiff should proceed by action.

Christopher Brady (the plaintiff) said that he had been a member of the South African Turf Club for a few years. Besides the ground devoted to the racing of horses, there was the totalisator, which consisted of about a dozen to fifteen boxes or offices, presided over by attendants, and dispersed about the ground. At those boxes or offices tickets were obtained for the totalisator. The totalisator was worked under regulations by Doyle and Co., under contract with the club (copy of contracts and regulations put in). Witness described the modus operandi of betting under the "tote." He said that behind the attendant in each of the offices were pads of tickets, which were sold to investors. A man buying a ticket at an office had no means of knowing how many similar tickets were being sold at another box. If a man bought the only ticket issued in respect of a successful horse, he would take the whole of the pool, less 10 per cent. taken by the club. If twenty others bought a similar ticket, then he would only receive a twenty-first share. After a race had been run, the whole of the pool was divided among the winners, less the usual commission taken by the managers. Until the division took place, it was absolutely impossible to know what was going to be received by a backer. The issue of tickets only began about 15 to 20 minutes before each race. About 10 or 15 minutes after the race had been completed, the dividends were announced on a black-board.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I see, under the contract, Doyle and Co. receive 2 per cent.]

Witness: Yes, and the club takes 8 per cent. Witness (continuing) said that when he joined the club, the totalisator was in operation, but at that time professional bookmakers were permitted to assemble on the course. In October last the club passed a resolution excluding the professional bookmakers. Witness had taken an active part in opposing the exclusion. He had searched the bye-laws of the club, and had been unable to find any bye-law or regulation referring to the totalisator, except the regulations issued by Doyle and Co.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I see the totalisator is described as a "machine." Your description does not show that it is a machine, but a series of buildings?]

Witness: "Machine" is their expression; they call it a "betting machine." They have elaborated it and made it a building. It could have been a portable machine. In further evidence, witness said that on the average about £14,000 passed through the totalisator on a race day. He found that the amount of profit from the totalisator, according to the balance-sheet for the year ending 31st January last, was £22,872 18s. It was impossible for the managers or "bankers" to lose on the transaction.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But they simply act as agents; they simply distribute the betting according to the result of the races.]

Witness said that the operators were really, to his mind, bankers.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What would be the result, if an outsider which nobody has backed wins?]

Witness: According to their own regulations the club takes the pool.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Do you know whether that has happened?]

Witness: I do not remember anything of that sort. Something very near that I do remember is that on one occasion there was only one ticket taken on the winning horse, and on that occasion I think £429 was paid to the person who backed that particular winning horse.

[De Villiers, C.J.: With one ticket?]

Witness: Yes, that is so.

[De Villiers, C.J.: If it had not been so backed, the £429 would have gone to the club?]

Witness: Exactly so.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: Witness was a member of the Gymkhana Club at the time of the amalgamation in 1903, and on the amalgamation he became a member of the Turf Club. The Gymkhana Club had carried on a totalisator. He had sometimes bet on the totalisator, but mainly when he had no choice, and could obtain no bets amongst the people assembled there. He did not say that betting was a necessary adjunct of racing. Witness had heard of the Goodwood Park Club, but he had not been to the course. He knew a paper called the "Referee." He believed that paper had said it was a public question that he was taking up. Witness did not know whether, because the Goodwood Park Club did not run under Jockey Club Rules, they could not have betting. He knew of the appeal brought by the Goodwood Park Club from the conviction. As far as he knew the meetings of that club were held no longer.

Sir H. Juta: You complain very much about the money that the Turf Club get by this totalisator?

Witness: I think it is absolute robbery.

They don't put it into their own pockets—I do not know that.

Do you suggest that the officials—? —I don't suggest anything improper against any official.

I put it to you that the money is required for the upkeep of the raco-course, buildings, race ground, etc.—? You say so; I don't know that.

[De Villiers, C.J.: (to Sir H. Juta): You must prove that; he cannot know anything about it.]

Sir H. Juta: He is a member of the club, and he ought to know it.

Witness: I have nothing to do with the management, Sir Henry.

Cross-examination continued: Witness had to a certain extent championed the cause of the bookmakers and his own views.

Sir H. Juta: They were very pleased with what you did originally?

Witness: I cannot say that.

They are not very pleased now with your action?—I have not consulted them.

Because it now appears that if the totalisator is illegal, then betting is illegal?—I don't know that.

That will mean that bookmakers will not be allowed anywhere in the Colony?—That I cannot help.

Do you know that they are displeased now with your action?—I have not consulted them.

Asked why he had commenced these proceedings, witness said that he brought the motion some few months back, because he thought a gross monopoly had been created at Kenilworth, and he thought the amount they were charging was scandalous. He looked upon it that they were charging from 25 to 50 per cent. of every penny on the course each race day.

De Villiers, C.J. (interrupting the cross-examination) said that all this might be very interesting, but it did not seem to him to affect the case. Plaintiff might not be acting from the very highest moral principles, but if he had the law on his side, then he would have the judgment of the Court irrespective of his motives.

Cross-examination continued: Witness was not a member of the club when the old totalisator was in existence. He was aware that there had been an increase in starting-price betting of late years.

Sir H. Juta: As a betting man, what is the difference in principle, I would ask you, between starting-price betting and the totalisator?

Witness: I am not a betting man, Sir Henry; I only bet now and then.

Further cross-examined: Witness thought that starting-price betting had come more into vogue than it was ten years ago. By betting on the totalisator, one would get the starting prices, except for the 10 per cent. The bookmakers did not charge 10 per cent. He should say that both systems were illegal.

Sir H. Juta: And a great many people then would have to be prosecuted.

Mr. McGregor: My learned friend asked you if you could race without betting. Can you race without the totalisator?

Witness: There is no necessity for betting, unless you choose. In England they never have the totalisator, they cannot have it. I have been on nearly every racecourse in England, and I have never seen a totalisator.

By the Court: He would not say that, while bookmakers were allowed on the course, he never bet on the totalisator. Sometimes one could not get the price from the bookmakers, and at the last moment he might have gone to the totalisator.

John Dunn, commission agent, Adderley-street, Cape Town, said that the first totalisator at Kenilworth, which he saw in 1867, was a machine worked with a handle. The totalisator at that time was run by the Turf Club, under the superintendence of Mr. Cloete. He remembered the prosecution of Mr. Cloete. He had not seen the buildings at present on the ground. He saw the totalisator about two years ago, when the ticket system was in force. The 10 per cent. had always been taken off.

Mr. McGregor closed his case.

Henry Graham Cloete (secretary of the Turf Club) said that he had been acquainted with racing in the Colony for a considerable period. In 1867 there was the case of Day v. Cloete (5 J., 139). After that they took advice, and enclosed the totalisator. They exercised control over the persons allowed to come into the totalisator, so that it was not public. They adopted the French system of giving tickets, and dispensed with the machine. Witness showed the Court the system now adopted. Proceeding, he said that starting-price betting was increasing a good deal in England. The totalisator was common in some parts. It was common in South Africa, in Buenos Ayres they had nothing else, it was common in New Zealand, and parts of Australia, while in France they only had the pari mutuel, and would not allow bookmakers.

By the Court: In England the totalisator was not allowed; only bookmakers were allowed.

Witness (continuing) said that when the Act of 1902 was passed there were no buildings or structures in the Cape Colony in which bookmaker betting was carried on, but there were structures and buildings where totalisator betting was carried on. The totalisator buildings were of a substantial character, and had cost nearly £2,000. The profits obtained from the totalisator were utilised for the upkeep of the racecourse, and for stakes; there were wages to pay to clerks, and so on. Without revenue either from the totalisator or the bookmakers' licences, he did not think they could conduct a race meeting, because they would not be able to give more than £5 stakes. Witness remembered the Goodwood Park case. Apparently the Goodwood Park people had not been able to carry on their race meetings, because they had been prosecuted for allowing betting.

By the 21st section of the Act, the Jockey Club got jurisdiction over the bookmakers. The racecourse was entirely enclosed, and the Turf Club could remove anyone, according to the condition on the back of the ticket. Frequently he had exercised the right of prohibiting persons from coming on the public stand.

Cross-examined by Mr. McGregor: The barrier at the totalisator was more for preventing a crush than keeping people away. It was a fairly public place, and to get to the totalisator, provided there was no charge against the visitor, all that was necessary was to be a member of the public, and to be in possession of 7s. The principle of the totalisator was that you got the true odds at the time of the start. The totalisator came under the general rules of conducting a race meeting.

[De Villiers, C.J.: On what authority did you enter into the contract with Doyle to allow him to have the totalisator?]

The committee of the club took it upon themselves.

They assume it as part of their duties as a racing club to allow a totalisator?—Yes, they think it is worked better by having someone else than doing it themselves.

They deem it essential to the success of the club and to the purposes for which it was established that betting of some kind should be permitted?—Yes.

Witness (continuing) said that very often people lost their tickets. On one or two occasions the totalisator had received money where the winning horses were not backed.

Sir H. Juta: There never was a bye-law for bookmakers. The Jockey Club, as a rule, took no cognisance of betting, although the Jockey Club took notice of defaulters, and that was how they got control of the bookmakers.

Sir H. Juta closed his case.

Mr. McGregor referred in the first place to the case of Tollett v. Thomas (6 Q.B., 514), in which it had been held that the totalisator was an instrument of gaming. He then referred to Part II. of Act 36 of 1902, in which the keeping of a gaming house was prohibited. Keeping a totalisator was keeping a gaming house, section 7 (a) was the nearest approach to a definition of a gaming house. It was necessary to prove two things under that section; (a) that a game of chance was played in the house; and (b) that it was for the profit of the keeper of the house. It was clear that both these elements were present in the case of the totalisator. The totalisator would also fall under section 7 (b), because a bank was kept for the benefit of the Turf Club exclusively, and what was more the bank would always win; and, when an unbacked horse won, then the totalisator took all the stakes.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Did not the Legislature intend to draw a distinction between gaming and betting?]

Mr. McGregor: Yes, but the totalisator is not an instrument for betting only; it is so ingeniously contrived that it is an instrument for gaming as well.

Proceeding, he said that betting necessarily required certain odds—there was one event, and a fixed amount was paid on the event. Betting on the totalisator was a game of chance, because the odds obtained would depend upon the number of other people who betted.

[Maasdorp, J.: If the totalisator were found to be illegal, would betting with bookmakers be legal?]

Mr. McGregor: Yes, in certain circumstances, my lord.

[Maasdorp, J.: If the Club took no profit would all this argument fall away?]

Mr. McGregor: Yes, my lord, so far as it is based upon section 7 (a) and (b).

The Legislature, he continued, did not forbid a game of chance inuring to the profit of the owner of the horse. Section 21 of the Act was described in the Goodwood Park case as an involved section. That section referred only to Part III. of the Act. The word "part" should be strictly construed, because the Act had been specially divided into parts, and therefore the division into parts was an integral portion of the Act. Part III. only referred to "betting houses," and so the Turf Club was given no exemption under section 21 from the penalties imposed upon keeping "gaming houses" under Part II. of the Act. Section 21 did not legalise "gaming houses," it only legalised betting between persons assembled on the racecourse for the purpose of betting. In England the totalisator was not allowed. Part V. of the Act dealt with betting in streets or "open place." Counsel quoted Langeridge v. Archer (10 Q.B. 45), and Power v. Kempton Park (18 L.T., 538). In Day v. Cloete the use of the totalisator had been declared to be illegal. There were certain physical differences between the totalisator then used and the present one, but the principle of both was the same.

There was another ground on which the use of the totalisator on the Kenilworth racecourse was illegal, and that was that its use was outside the powers granted to the club by statute. The Jockey Club was constituted by Act 20 of 1882, and its powers were transferred to the South African Turf Club by Act 9 of 1886. Section 2 of Act 20 of 1882 set out the powers of the club. It was granted land (a) for a racecourse, (b) for a training ground for horses, (c) for any other public amusement declared to be such by the Governor. The use of a totalisator did not fall under any of these heads. The ground could only be used for those purposes or for some purpose legalised by a by-law made under section 8. No by-law had been made legalising the totalisator. In such circumstances, the use of a totalisator was ultra vires. Counsel cited the Encyclopædia of the Laws of England (Vol. XII. p. 360), Bryce on ultra vires (3rd edition pp. 37, 43).

[De Villiers, C.J.: Then the position is, Is betting by means of a totalisator a necessary adjunct of racing, or of one of three purposes mentioned by the Act?]

Mr. McGregor: Quite so, my lord; I submit it is not.

De Villiers, C.J.: Has the Governor been asked to declare the totalisator an amusement, in terms of section 2 of the Act?]

Mr. McGregor: There is no evidence on that point, my lord.

Even if betting, he proceeded, was a usual adjunct of racing, it was still essential under section 7 that there should be by-laws regulating it, and in this case, no by-laws had been made. The plaintiff was entitled to come to Court in this matter. Simpson v. Westminster Palace Hotel Company (8 H.L.C. 112) was quoted.

Sir H. Juta said that the first question was: What was the intention of the Legislature when they passed the Act of 1902? Did they intend to exempt race meetings held under Jockey Club Rules from the operation of the Act? They must have done so; if not, the position would be absurd; because section 21 allowed the Jockey Club to keep a betting house, while section 37 punished anyone who went to bet there. It was also clear that it was intended that the Jockey Club should have control over race meetings, and the Act gave them this control in only one way, and that was by giving them control over the betting. Betting was such a necessary adjunct of racing and the control of betting was such a powerful lever that no races had been held at Goodwood since betting was forbidden there, because the races were not run under Jockey Club rules. Section 37 was not intended to nullify section 21.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I have a recollection that a clause was proposed in one of these Acts legalising the totalisator, but it was struck out.]

Sir H. Juta: Yes, my lord, that was in an earlier Act.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Why was it not put in this Act?]

Sir H. Juta: I don't know, but I know that such a clause would have passed in 1902.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Would it have passed both Houses?]

Sir H. Juta: The totalisator is a much fairer instrument than a book-maker. It is equivalent to a starting price betting.

[Maasdorp, J.: Section 21 allows the Turf Club to keep a shed for betting purposes; but can they do anything more; can they bet?]

Sir H. Juta: The Club does not bet.

[Maasdorp, J.: In certain circumstances, the club takes all the stakes; for example, when no bets are laid on the winning horse.]

Sir H. Juta: The Club really only makes a charge for its trouble.

Continuing, he said that whether the keeping of a totalisator was ultra vires depended upon whether betting was a necessary adjunct of racing, and it clearly was. The plaintiff could not take advantage of the fact that it was ultra vires, because he was a member of the club and acquiesced in its use for years.

Mr. McGregor was not heard in reply.

De Villiers, C.J.: The plaintiff is a member of the South African Turf Club, and he seeks by this action to have it declared that the system of gaming wagering or betting, as carried out by the committee of the club by means of the totalisator, is illegal as well as ultra vires, and he prays for an interdict restraining the committee from continuing to carry out such system. The defendant is the chairman of the committee, and he, by his plea, admits that the club has erected buildings in which there is worked a system known as the totalisator, whereby persons, who choose to do so, are enabled to invest money on horses engaged in races held by the club on the day of racing. He specially denies that there is any machine or instrument used for the purpose, and he denies moreover that the working of the system on the racecourse is either illegal or ultra vires. The plea further alleges that at the time when the plaintiff became a member of the club the totalisator was in use, and that the plaintiff has from time to time invested money on it, and has at all times acquiesced in its use and consented to it. It is not clear whether these special allegations as to the plaintiff's acquiescence were intended as a defence to his claim. If the conduct of the defendant club was illegal, or ultra vires, the plaintiff's acquiescence could not make it legal or intra vires, nor can such acquiescence deprive him of the right which, as a member of the club, he has to prevent the continuance of a system which—whatever his motives might be—he no longer approves of. If by reason of the plaintiff's previous investing of his money on the totalisator—as his betting has been euphoniously termed—the defendant's position had been in some way altered, there might have been some ground for raising the defence of estoppel, which is not, however, the defence suggested by the plea. Upon this point, I need only refer to the case of Merriman v. Williams (Foord's Report p. 176), where it was held that previous concurrence in an illegality cannot be relied upon by way of estoppel to a claim for discontinuance of the illegality.

The plea, as I have said, denies that any machine is used for the purpose of working the totalisator, but the regulations under which the managers of the totalisator work it, are headed in the largest possible letters: "Regulations for the totalisator betting machine." These regulations, I take it, must have been posted on different parts of the racecourse, and must have been known to the committee of the club. Under their contract with the committee the managers of the totalisator bear the expenses of the working, and they took over the plant at the landed cost, but the club has the option of taking over all the plant at the termination of the contract at cost less a fair amount for depreciation. The percentage on receipts from so-called "investors" is ten per cent., of which the managers receive two per cent., and the club the remaining eight per cent. Authorised officials of the club have access to the books of the managers, and the committee has the power to instruct the managers as to the number of boxes to be opened for the issuing of tickets. In fact, there are about fifteen buildings on different parts of the ground, which were originally erected by and at the expense of the club, at a cost of about £2,000. These buildings are inside an enclosed space, which, again, is inside an outer enclosed space. Admission to the outer enclosed space is obtained for non-members of the club by payment of one shilling, and admission to the inner enclosure is obtained by payment of six shillings. On the back of the tickets of admission to both enclosures is an indorsement to the effect that "no person is entitled to remain upon the course if ordered to leave by one of the stewards or the secretary," and the tickets for the inner enclosure purport to admit the bearer to the "public stand." The different buildings are used as offices for the issue of the totalisator tickets, and the roofs of these offices run over the place outside, where people come to obtain their tickets. From the place where they stand pads are visible at the back of the office, showing in large numerals how many tickets have been taken to back each horse to run in the immediately following race. A ticket may be taken for a place or for a win, and, in either case, the price is a pound sterling. The delivering of tickets continues until the race commences, after which no tickets for that race can be issued, and after the race has been decided the entire money taken at the various offices is "aggregated," and the balance of the takings, after deduction of ten per cent., is equally divided among the backers of the winning horse in the proportion to which he has been backed. It is clear that this is a combined system of gaming and betting, and that although persons desirous of betting do not meet each other for the purpose, the Club, through its managers, act as the intermediary for the receipt and distribution of the stakes, and receives a commission of 10 per cent. for its services. That these services have been profitable to the Club, if not to all the backers of horses, is clear from the last annual report, which shows that the receipts of 8 per cent. for the year 1905 amounted to £22,872, being more than half of the total receipts from all sources for the year. The money thus received is expended on the upkeep of the course and the stakes for the races. The use of the word "machine" as applied to the totalisator appears to be somewhat inappropriate, and the more correct term to employ would be "machinery" for efficiently and expeditiously carrying out the combined system of gaming and betting which I have described.

The first question to be decided is whether under the Acts which authorise the grant of the racecourse to the Club for certain specific purposes and entrusted the management to the Club, the committee had the power to provide such machinery as I have described for the benefit of the so-called "investing" public. The first of these Acts (No. 20 of 1882) is entitled an Act "to empower the Governor to grant land for a racecourse and purposes connected therewith, and to provide for the management and regulation of the club to which such land shall be granted." The preamble states that it is expedient to encourage efforts to improve the breed of horses, and the second section enacts that "it shall be lawful for the Governor to grant to any club now established, or hereafter to be established, for the control and management of matters connected with the racing of horses, such parcel of land as to him may seem fit, for the purposes hereinafter described, that is to say, firstly as a course upon which horses may be run with the consent or under the direction and control of the said club; secondly, as a training ground for the purpose of training horses intended to race, and also for the erection of training stables and dwellings for the use of persons engaged in training racehorses; thirdly, for any other public amusement or purpose which the Governor may, upon the application of the said club, declare to be a public amusement or purpose for which the said land may be used."

Under this section the ground at Kenilworth was granted to the Jockey Club, and by the Act 9 of 1886 the grant to the Jockey Club was vested in the defendant Club for all and several the purposes of the former Act, and all the rights, privileges, duties and liabilities created by such former Acts are declared to apply to the defendant club. It appears that the defendant club has used the ground as a training ground, and as a racecourse, but there is no evidence that any part of it is used for the erection of training stables and dwellings for the use of persons engaged in training racehorses. As to the third purpose for which the grant was to be made, namely, to provide for any other public amusement it does not appear that an application has ever been made to the Governor to declare the use of the totalisator as such a public amusement, nor is it by any means clear that the Governor if applied to would make such a declaration. The 7th section of Act 20 of 1852 enacts that "the land by the second section of this Act authorised to be granted to the club shall be held, enjoyed and used only for the purposes authorized by this Act or by any bye-law to be made under and by virtue thereof." Nowhere in the Act is any provision to be found which mentions any purposes for which the land can be used other than those specified in the 2nd section. That section cannot, with the most liberal interpretation possible, be construed as having contemplated the use of the land or any part thereof for a totalisator. The 8th section of the Act authorises the committee to make bye-laws "for regulating all matters concerned or connected with any lands, buildings or other property belonging to the club And for the general management of the said racecourse; provided that no such bye-laws shall be repugnant to the laws for the time being in force in this Colony." The 9th section enacts that no such bye-law shall be of any force or effect until it shall have been sent to the Colonial Secretary, and, after approval by him, published in the "Gazette." It is admitted by Mr. Cloete, the secretary of the club, that it was not thought necessary to get a bye-law for the totalisator, "no more," he adds, "than we should go for permission to start refreshment rooms." The analogy would be complete if, like refreshment rooms, a totalisator were a necessary adjunct to horse-racing, but the evidence does not satisfy me as to such necessity. He admits that in England, the home of horse-racing, the totalisator is not allowed at race meetings, and, consequently, it cannot be regarded there as a necessary adjunct to horse-racing. It is said, however, that bookmakers are there allowed, but the evidence does not show on what terms they are allowed to pursue their calling at race meetings. For the present the Court can only deal with the totalisator, and, if the defendant fails to satisfy the Court that, according to the most liberal construction of the Act 30 of 1882, the statutory purposes for which the club was entrusted with the management of the course do not include the maintenance of the totalisator, the fact that bookmakers are allowed at English race meetings cannot assist him. It has been contended that the 21st section of Act 36 of 1902 shows that the Legislature approves of the use of the totalisator at race meetings held under the rules and regulations of the Jockey Club of South Africa. The effect, however, of that section is merely to exclude the operation of the 3rd part of the Act relating to betting-houses in the case of the owner of a racecourse keeping or using, on any day on which a race is held under the rules of the Jockey Club, any buildings or enclosed spaces within the ground, for the purpose of betting, between persons there assembled. Even, presuming that the taking of tickets by individuals constitutes betting between persons there assembled—and this is by no means clear—there is more than betting, as I shall presently show, and the 21st section of Act 36 of 1902 cannot be relied upon as conferring on the club powers which the previous Act omitted to bestow. It may well be that the section was intended to legalise the calling of bookmakers at race meetings held under Jockey Club rules, but that does not affect the question whether the club has the power to establish a totalisator on the course.

I have thus far assumed that the totalisator is a perfectly legal institution, and I now proceed to consider whether its illegality has been established. The evidence satisfies me that it is a system, not only of betting, but also of taking part in a game of chance. A person who bets, whether he gives or takes odds, knows what he stands to win, but a person who backs a horse with the totalisator cannot know what the winner is to receive until the amount is distributed. Even, if he knows at the time of taking his ticket how many others have backed horses for a race, the odds are liable to be altered afterwards by others taking tickets for the same race. In one sense the result of a horse-race itself is a matter of chance, but betting upon such an event is well understood. The totalisator introduces this further element of chance that the amount to be paid to the winner depends upon what the Lord Chief Justice, in the case of Tollet v. Thomas (6 K.R., Q.B.), styled "the will caprice of the other persons betting." In that case it was the unanimous opinion of a strong Court, including, besides Chief Justice Cockburn, Justices Blackburn, Meller and Lush, that the totalisator is an instrument of gaming at a game of chance. The appliances have been somewhat modified since that time so as to enable a larger number of persons to stake their money, but the essential features are the same in both. There are still the same elements of "uncertainty and chance to the individual bettor," which were referred to in the judgment as constituting the whole proceeding a game of chance. If this view is correct it would follow that the keeping a totalisator constitutes a contravention of the second part of Act 36 of 1902, which relates to gaming-houses. The 7th section enacts that "on a charge brought against any person for keeping a gaming-house it shall be sufficient to prove that the house or place is allowed to be used or frequented for the purposes of playing therein at any game of chance for the profit, advantage or gain of the owner or keeper thereof." All these facts have been proved in the present case. It has been urged that when the Legislature enacted in the 21st section that "nothing in this part shall extend" to the person therein described, it really meant to say "nothing in this Act," but it is impossible to uphold this contention, more especially in view of the fact that by the 1st section of the Act the Legislature directed special attention to the division of the Act into parts of which part 2 relates to gaming and part 3 to betting. Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment as prayed, with costs.

[Maasdorp, J.: I agree in the decision, and I only wish to make it quite clear that I reserve my opinion upon one point that has been raised in this case. It appears that in Part 3 of the Act of 1902 the keeping of betting-houses is prohibited, and penalties are imposed upon persons who contravene the sections in that part. But under section 21 it is provided that this part of the Act shall not extend to the owner of a racecourse who keeps any buildings or enclosed spaces for the purpose of betting between persons there assembled. The respondents in this case claim their protection under that provision, because they contend that, as the owners of a racecourse, they keep these buildings for the purpose of betting between persons there assembled. But it seems to me that they have gone much further than that, and they have gone beyond the protection of the section. They have introduced in this enclosure which they have preserved for betting a system which they describe as a new system of betting, but, forming an opinion upon their procedure and upon the finding of the Court in the case which has already been given, they have really introduced a system which goes far beyond the ordinary system of betting, and they have introduced a system of gaming. It has been pointed out that there are introduced into their system many elements of chance which do not exist in merely betting. Betting is supposed to be upon the result of a race and the result of the takings of the totalisator seems to me to depend upon other considerations than merely the result of the race. Then we find that there is an element of gaming in this, that the keeper of the "house" takes large profits to himself, and not only that, but he even seems to act as is done sometimes by the keepers of gaming tables themselves. He would under certain circumstances, sweep all the stakes. On the whole, I come to the conclusion that large elements of gaming are introduced into the system which has been adopted by the respondents. But what I want to reserve my opinion upon is this: that doubt has been cast upon the powers of the respondents to erect buildings even for the purpose of ordinary betting, and it has been contended that the grant has been so made that it might exclude such buildings and such powers, because they are not provided for under the grant, and the grant must be strictly construed as merely providing for races and such matters as are essential to races. Now, in my opinion, which I express with some reserve, the Legislature intended that there should be power in persons who run this racecourse to make some provision for betting, and it may be found to be within their powers to erect these buildings and make provision for betting. But I merely express this view with reserve, not as a final finding, but because the question has been so pointedly raised and it might be taken that the Court has to some extent proceeded upon that also.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

ARDEENE V. MILLER. { 1906.
{ July 10th.

This was an application for an order empowering the applicant to withdraw his name as one of the signatories to a deed of assignment in the estate of the respondent, by reason of the respondent having failed to make a full and complete cession of his assets. Mr. Searle, K.C., was for the applicant, and Mr. Alexander was for the respondent.

Mr. Searle said the applicant, Henry Matthew Arderne, was one of the creditors in the assigned estate of Jacob Miller. Mr. Steytler was appointed assignee. All the creditors signed except the Board of Executors. It was understood by all parties that the Board of Executors should stand out and administer their own property. Certain property in Hanover-street, on which the applicant held a second mortgage bond, was managed by the respondent for some fifteen months. The rents were collected by the respondent and paid to the assignee. At the end of fifteen months the tenants left the premises, and Miller was the only remaining tenant, but he failed to pay his rent. The assignee took proceedings in the Magistrate's Court to have the respondent ejected, but he failed, the Magistrate holding that the assignee did not represent all the creditors, and under these circumstances the applicant now sought to be relieved from the deed of assignment.

Mr. Alexander said there was no necessity for the applicant to withdraw his name as all the creditors had not signed the deed and the deed had not become operative. The respondent had been sued by the Board of Executors, the outstanding creditor, and sued by the assignee.

Mr. Searle: He may take up the position now that the deed is operative. The respondent failed to pay any rent for the property for the last six months.

Mr. Alexander: The affidavit of the respondent shows that when he assigned his estate he understood he should be released from all claims and demands his creditors might have against him. The deed of assignment, deponent stated, had never been of any legal force and effect, and had never been recognised as such by him.

Counsel having been further heard in arguments on the facts,

Buchanan, J.: In September, 1904, the respondent, Miller, assigned his estate to one Steytler for the benefit of the creditors. The deed was signed by all the creditors except one, namely, the Board of Executors. It was known by all parties that the Board of Executors had not signed, and they stood outside the assignment. The assignor, Miller, acted upon the deed for eighteen months, and treated Steytler as the assignee on behalf of the creditors. At the end of eighteen months he takes up a hostile position towards the assignee, and when sued for the rent of the premises let to him by the assignee, he disputes the right of the assignee and alleges that the deed is invalid. The Magistrate before whom the case came sustained the objection and, thereupon, the assignee, Mr. Steytler, was unable to carry on the administration of the estate. The application in the present case now says: "I have been bound by the assignment for the last eighteen months and in consequence of the assignor's conduct I now ask to withdraw." Miller says: "I don't care whether he does or not." The only question is one of costs. I certainly do not think that the respondent is entitled to any costs. The application will be granted, and there will be no order as to costs.

PINTO V. PINTO.

Mr. Watermeyer asked leave to have the return day extended from 1st August until 31st August, as it was found impossible to communicate in time with the respondent, who was in Delagoa Bay.

Application granted.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDOEP.]

PURCELL, YALLOP AND EVERETT, LTD., AND W. AND G. SCOTT AND CO., LTD. V. BRICE BROS. 1906. July 11th.

Fraudulent insolvency—Anticipation of return day.

Where it was alleged that certain persons whose estates had been provisionally sequestrated had fled the country and taken with them the assets of their partnership and private estates before the return day of the rule nisi, the Court amended the original rule by fixing a nearer date for the return day.

Mr. Benjamin moved, as a matter of urgency, on the petition of the applicants, for an order anticipating the return day of a certain summons. Petitioners said that they had petitioned the Court for the sequestration of the estate of the firm of Brice Bros., and of the private estates of the partners thereof, viz., Robert Brice and George Brice. In the said petition, it was alleged that defendants had absconded from the Colony, and were on their way to England. Petitioners then asked the Court for directions as to the service of process upon defendants. On the 25th June, 1906, the Hon. Sir John Buchanan granted a provisional order of sequestration against the defendants, which order was made returnable on the 2nd August, but no further directions as to service were given. Petitioners had been informed and believed that thereafter summons was issued against the defendants, calling upon them to show cause why a final order should not be granted, which summons was duly served at the last known place of residence of the defendants. Defendants had carried away with them a large sum of money, being the realised portion of their available assets in this colony. Petitioners believed that it was the intention of the defendants to escape to America or some other foreign country with their assets, and so evade the payment to their creditors of the proceeds of their assets. Defendants would effect such escape if the final order of the adjudication of their estate was not granted before the 2nd August next. Petitioners intended to apply for the arrest of defendants on the ground of fraudulent insolvency, but they were advised that they could not obtain a warrant for such arrest until the final order be granted. They therefore prayed that the return day should be anticipated, and that the summons should be made returnable for some day not later than the 14th July.

[Maasdorp, J.: The Court cannot interfere in the matter in that form. A rule has been issued, and the Court cannot interfere when the rule has been issued.]

Mr. Benjamin: The difficulty is this: I understand that application was made to the Attorney-General for an extradition warrant, but he declined to issue it until a final order of sequestration was obtained against defendants' estate.

[Maasdorp, J.: What was the necessity of giving such a long return day? It was quite unnecessary to have such a long return day.]

Mr. Benjamin: The return day seems to have been fixed by his lordship, Sir John Buchanan, in Chambers, but I do not think his lordship was aware that an application of this sort was necessary.

[Maasdorp, J.: I did not know that it was fixed by the Court.]

Mr. Benjamin: It was fixed by his lordship when the papers were laid before him in Chambers.

[Maasdorp, J.: It was unnecessary to come to the Court until the return day. Why not issue a fresh summons?]

Mr. Benjamin: Under the Insolvent Ordinance, the return day has, I think, to be fixed by the judge in Chambers to whom the matter is referred.

[Maasdorp, J.: That makes a difficulty again. That order would have to be varied.]

Mr. Benjamin: Yes, by making a shorter return day. At the time when the application was made to his lordship in Chambers, the defendants had not been absent from the Colony for forty days. Therefore his lordship made no order with regard to additional publication.

[Maasdorp, J.: If a new order is granted, then defendants would have been absent forty days.]

Mr. Benjamin: They would.

Maasdorp, J., said that the original order would be varied, and the return day altered to the 14th inst.

GOLDSTEIN V. MAY.

This was an action brought by George Goldstein, medical practitioner, Cape Town, against George May, photographer, Cape Town, to recover £30 10s. for professional attendance on one Mrs. Parry.

Plaintiff, in his declaration, said during the period from July, 1903, to January, 1904, both months inclusive, he attended one Mrs. Parry professionally in his capacity of medical practitioner, the costs and charges of which attendance defendant promised to pay. He said that £30 10s. was a fair and reasonable sum to charge for such attendance. Defendant wrongfully and unlawfully refused to pay the said sum, wherefore plaintiff claimed judgment for £30 10s., with interest, a tempore morae, and costs.

Defendant, in his plea, admitted the formal allegations, but he specially denied the allegation that he had promised to pay the costs and charges referred to in paragraph 2. Otherwise, as to the allegations in paragraph 2, he said that he had no knowledge of, and did not admit, the same. He admitted that he had refused to pay, and so he repudiated any liability in respect of the claim, and otherwise denied the allegations in the fourth paragraph. He prayed that the claim may be dismissed, with costs.

The replication was general.

Dr. Greer was for plaintiff; Mr. Lewis was for defendant.

George Goldstein (the plaintiff) stated that he had attended Mrs. Parry from time to time. He attended her before the dates in question. She was then living in Plein-street and Caledon-street, and was known to witness as Mrs. May. Witness thought she was Mrs. May until November, 1902. Defendant had paid for witness's professional services up to that time. In November, 1902, Mr. May told him that the lady he had known as Mrs. May was really Mrs. Parry. May at the same time told him that it would not make any difference as regarded payment for his services. In January, 1903, Mr. May paid him for professional services rendered to Mrs. Parry. Witness subsequently attended Mrs. Parry between the dates named in the declaration.

Thor Osberg (private inquiry agent), John H. Mitchell (retired merchant, Sea Point), and Lena Wasser (formerly an employee of defendant) also gave evidence in support of plaintiff's case.

Dr. Greer closed his case.

George May (the defendant) said that the plaintiff had attended him in 1900. He had paid the plaintiff for attendance by cheque. The payments in the plaintiff's books referred to attendance upon witness, and once upon Mrs. Parry. About 1901 witness had a fever, and was very ill. The doctor came and caught him at work. Plaintiff got out of temper, and witness lost his temper, and he asked plaintiff for his bill, and paid him. He was not afterwards attended by plaintiff. Mrs. Parry had been in witness's employ for about 10 years off and on as a retoucher and assistant. Mrs. Parry had been called by various people Mrs. May and Miss May. He had not told anyone, as far as he knew, to call Mrs. Parry Mrs. May. He had paid her a salary. She was in his employ while his wife was living. Witness gave a cheque to Mrs. Parry in favour of Dr. Goldstein on account of wages due to her. He did not remember any other occasion when he had given her a cheque in favour of Dr. Goldstein. He had never promised Dr. Goldstein that he would discharge Mrs. Parry's indebtedness to him. Mrs. Parry had not occupied the same room as witness.

Cross-examined: While witness was in Caledon-street Mrs. Parry looked after his children. People generally called her "Mrs. May." He denied that the plaintiff attended him in 1903 and 1904. He could not understand what plaintiff's motive would have been in making entries in his account book against witness's name. When Mrs. Parry went to England, witness paid certain of her expenses. Mrs. Parry looked after his children. Witness carried on a fairly big business, but he did not keep proper books.

Wm. Wilson, accountant, Cape Town, who had shared a room with defendant, was also called.

Mr. Lewis read the evidence on commission of Mrs. Parry, who was an inmate of the Eaton Convalescent Home. She said that she had been employed as a retoucher by the defendant. She denied that she had told Dr. Goldstein that Mr. May would pay the bill. May did not send her to the doctor in 1903 or authorize her to go. She was suffering from a sore leg. As far as she knew, Mr. May had never promised to pay the account. She was sure that the account could not be correct. She had not lived with the defendant as his wife. Lots of people coming into the reception room of defendant's place had called her "Mrs. May." She had never led the plaintiff to believe that she was Mrs. May.

Mr. Lewis closed his case.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts.

Maasdorp, J.: It seems to me that the decision of this case should largely depend upon the view which the Court takes of the evidence in respect of the personal relationships that existed between the defendant and Mrs. Parry. It is quite clear that when the doctor made the acquaintance of the defendant and Mrs. Parry during the time they lived in Caledon-street, he regarded them as husband and wife, and he seems to have come to that conclusion from the manner in which they lived together, without any admission, as far as his evidence goes, having been made to him by either of these parties. Mr. Mitchell was also acquainted with the defendant, and this lady when they lived in Caledon-street, he (Mr. Mitchell) being the defendant's landlord, and he says that in the communications that he had with them he was expressly informed by the defendant that the lady was Mrs. May. At the same time there was in the service of the defendant this girl Wasser, who lived with them for many years, and seems at the last to have left on the most friendly terms with both Mrs. Parry and the defendant. She states in the clearest terms that the defendant and Mrs. Parry lived together as man and wife, and that she was told after the death of the defendant's first wife that this lady was Mrs. May. Now, in addition to the direct evidence given by these witnesses, we have the arrangement of the house from which one must come to the conclusion that certainly at Caledon-street there was only one bedroom for the occupation of defendant and Mrs. Parry. The defendant explains the residence of Mrs. Parry in his house by saying that she came there, and looked after his children, and that she was to some extent regarded as their mother, but it incidentally transpired during the examination of the girl Wasser that for some period there were no children in the house. The conclusion, therefore, that I come to, is that in Caledon-street the defendant and Mrs. Parry were on such terms of relationship as to justify people in regarding her as his wife. If it is found that they lived together as man and wife, then the evidence given by the defendant himself upon that part of the case is untrue, and the discredit which is consequently thrown upon his statements must affect the whole of his evidence. It has been argued that, whatever their relationships in Caledon-street, it had not been proved that intimate relationships continued in Plein-street. But then, it has not been admitted by the defendant that there was any change of relationship. Certain of the documents that have been put in corroborate the statement of the plaintiff in this case. There was one circumstance which I thought at one time was unfavourable to the plaintiff, and that was the delay which occurred in pressing his claim after the defendant had positively disputed it. However, he has given reasons which I can accept for his conduct in that respect. In the absence of any evidence which can throw doubt upon the items in the account itself, I must accept it, supported as it is by plaintiff's books, as correct, and though perhaps there might be some ground for arguing that daily attendance in this case would hardly be regarded as necessary, and that the services were too frequently rendered, I see no reason for believing that the doctor would have pressed his services upon this lady, unless they were required and asked for, and I consequently take this account as correct. Judgment is given for the plaintiff as prayed, with costs.

Dr. Greer said that the plaintiff had obtained judgment against the defendant under Rule 329d, and that that judgment had been set aside, and costs ordered to be costs in the cause.

Maasdorp, J., said that the costs would include the costs of the proceedings.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN and the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

STAG LINE, LTD. V. TABLE 1906,
BAY HARBOUR BOARD. { July 12th.

Table Bay Harbour Board—Dock regulations—Breach of contract.

The plaintiffs, being the owners of ship C., which required to be painted, entered into a contract, by which the defendant Board undertook to take her into the Graving Dock, but no specific day for doing so was agreed upon. Before the date of this contract the owners of the ship M. had engaged room in the Dock for a certain day, but owing to a detention on the Coast she did not arrive on the day agreed upon, whereupon the Board allowed her to enter when she arrived, two days later, charging her with dock fees from the day agreed upon. The result was that the ship C. could not enter the Dock until about 14 days after the date on which the contract for dry docking her was entered into. The Board is a statutory body, having power to make regulations for the management of the Docks, and one of the regulations so made was to the effect that 'on failure to place a vessel in the Dock on the day appointed for that purpose, such vessel should, if the Dock be required, lose her turn on the list, and the owner shall be liable to pay to the Board the expenses which may have been incurred in preparing the Dock for her reception.'

Held, that the regulation did not make it obligatory on the Board to let the M. lose her turn, and that, as under the circumstances disclosed in the evidence, it was not unreasonable to allow the M. to enter when she did, the defendant Board was not liable in damages for the detention of the ship C.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Maasdorp, sitting as Divisional Judge of the Supreme Court, in an action in which the Stag Line sued the Table Bay Harbour Board for £1,000 by way of damages. The plaintiffs were, on the 21st March, 1901, the owners of the steamship Clematis. On or about the 20th March, 1901, the plaintiffs, through their agent in Cape Town, entered into an agreement with the Table Bay Harbour Board through the Dock Superintendent, whereby the defendants undertook to take the Clematis into the Graving Dock for painting, upon certain terms and conditions. Among the lawful regulations in regard to the Graving Dock was one: "On failure to place a vessel on the dock on the day appointed for the purpose, such vessel shall lose her turn on the list, and the owner is liable to pay the expenses to the Board." On the 23rd March, 1901, an agreement in similar terms was entered into with the owners of the S.S. Matabele. The day appointed for the Matabele was the 24th March, 1901, but the evidence showed it was the 25th March. The defendants, by the Dock Superintendent, refused to take the Clematis into the Graving Dock, and £1,000 was sustained in damages in consequence of the detention. The defendants said that their own regulations were not in contemplation of the parties to the agreement, and even if they were they were not binding. When the Court found that the regulations were part of the agreement and binding, it was argued further and with success that the Board had a certain discretion under these regulations, and that they were entitled, notwithstanding the strict tenor of the regulations, to act in the spirit of them, and to say in this case that the Matabele should be allowed to go into the dock. The owners of the Clematis were not allowed to claim for the days during which she had been excluded from the dock as against the charterers who hired the ship, and the loss fell upon the owners of the Clematis.

Plaintiff's declaration was as follows:

1. The plaintiff is the Stag Line, Limited, which is a company duly registered in England, having its office at North Shields, and is the owner of sundry steamships.

2. The defendant is the Table Bay Harbour Board, constituted under Act No. 36 of 1896, and the Graving Dock at the port of Cape Town is, amongst other property, vested in the Board, and by it placed under the superintendence of the Dock Superintendent.

3. The plaintiff was before and on the 20th March, 1901, and thereafter at all times material to this suit, the owner of the steamship Clematis.

4. On or about the 20th March, 1901, the plaintiff by the agents at Cape Town of the said steamship entered into an agreement with the defendant through the Dock Superintendent, subsequently specifically approved of by the Board whereby the defendant undertook and agreed to take the Clematis into the Graving Dock for painting on the 27th March, 1901, upon the following terms and conditions, to wit:—

(1) The vessel shall be taken into Graving Dock by and under the direction of such person as may be appointed thereto by the Board, in the presence of the Master or his duly appointed representative. (2) So soon as the vessel is declared by the person in charge to be properly placed on the blocks, the Master or his duly appointed representative shall forthwith satisfy himself thereof, and failing to point out any defect in such placing to the superintendent or his representative, the vessel shall be considered to have been properly and safely placed on the blocks. (3) The Board shall not be liable for any damage which may be sustained by the vessel, and the vessel shall not be liable for any damage which may be sustained by the Dock or its appurtenances either in docking or undocking. (4) The Board shall not be responsible for any detention of vessels in the Graving Dock through stress of weather, disarrangement of machinery, block of work, or from any other cause whatever. (5) Every vessel using the Graving Dock will be charged at least one day's rent in addition to the charge for docking and undocking. (6) Notice in writing must be given by the Master or agent when the vessel is ready for undocking, but such notice will not be accepted by the Superintendent until the vessel has finished her work and the Dock cleaned, cleared and ready for flooding; if such notice is served before 10 o'clock a.m., the day on which such notice is given, Sundays excepted, will be considered the undocking day.

5. Amongst the lawful regulations regarding the said Graving Dock made by the Board under the Act aforesaid is the following, to wit: "On failure to place a vessel in the Graving Dock or on the Patent Slip on the day appointed for that purpose such vessel shall if the Dock or Slip be required lose her turn on the list and the owner, master or agent of such vessel shall be liable to pay to the Board the expenses, if any, which may have been incurred on preparing the Dock or Slip for her reception." And the said regulation was in contemplation of the parties to the aforesaid agreement and binding upon them.

6. On or about the 23rd March, 1901, an agreement in similar terms and subject to the said regulations was entered into between the defendant and persons representing a certain vessel, the Matabele, but the day appointed for the Matabele to be placed in the Graving Dock was the 24th March, 1901.

7. The Matabele was not duly placed in the Graving Dock on the appointed day and lost her turn on the list, yet thereafter on the 27th March, 1901, despite lawful protest by the master of the Clematis on behalf of the plaintiff company, and in breach of its agreement aforesaid with the plaintiff, the defendant, by the Dock Superintendent acting wrongfully and unlawfully and not in accordance with the said agreement and regulations refused to take the Clematis into the said Graving Dock and took in the Matabele, which remained in the said Graving Dock until the 9th April, 1901, to the exclusion of the Clematis.

8. The Clematis was on the 10th April, placed in the said Graving Dock and undocked on the 12th April, the painting required being done in two days.

9. The Clematis was detained and delayed for fourteen days by reason of the premises, and the plaintiff sustained damages in the sum of £1,000 in consequence of such detention including specially loss of hire of the Clematis for the period of detention, in addition to the actual expenses and costs occasioned by the delay of the vessel, for which sum, by reason of the premises, the defendant is liable.

10. Notwithstanding frequent demand the defendant refuses to pay the said sum.

Wherefore the plaintiff prays for judgment for £1,000 sterling by way of damages or for such further or other relief as to this honourable Court may seem meet together with costs of suit.

To this declaration defendant pleaded as follows:

1. Paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 8 and 10 of the declaration are admitted.

2. The defendant denies that any agreement to take the Clematis into the Graving Dock on the 27th March was entered into between the plaintiff and the Dock Superintendent and that any such agreement was subsequently specially approved by the Board. Defendant says that on the 20th March, 1901, the Dock Superintendent signed the following document: "Terms on which the Table Bay Harbour Board engage to place the Clematis..... in the Graving Dock on the following conditions" which was signed by the agents of the plaintiff, "We agree to the above condition" and the document contains in the margin the words "Cleaning and painting only." The conditions are those stated in paragraph 4.

3. The defendant admits that the regulation set out in paragraph 5 is one of its lawful regulations for the management and working of the Docks under the provisions of Act No. 36 of 1896, and that the same is binding upon all masters, agents and owners of vessels, but save as above it denies paragraph 5.

4. The defendant denies paragraph 6. Application to have the Matabele, which was represented as a vessel carrying mails and as fitted as a passenger boat, dry-docked was made prior to the month of March, 1901.

5. The defendant says that the Matabele arrived in Table Bay on the 27th March, that the Dry Dock was partly occupied by a vessel lawfully and properly placed there previously, that the Clematis required the whole dock which was not available, whereas the Matabele only required that portion of the Dry Dock which was available, and that the defendant was not legally bound to take such other vessel out of the Dry Dock to make room for the Clematis. The Matabele was placed in the said portion of the said dock on the 27th March, where she remained until the 9th April. Save as above the defendant denies the allegations in paragraph 7 and denies that the plaintiff had any legal right to claim that the Clematis should be docked on the 27th March or for the 14 days thereafter.

6. The defendant denies the allegations in paragraph 9 and denies that it is liable for any part of the sum claimed, and save as above denies the allegations in the declaration.

Wherefore the defendant prays that the plaintiff's claim may be dismissed with costs.

The replication was general.

The following judgment was delivered in the Court below.

The plaintiff company allege in their declaration that on the 20th of March, 1901, they entered into an agreement with the defendants, whereby the defendants undertook to place their ship, the Clematis, in the Graving Dock of the Table Bay Harbour for cleaning and painting, on the 27th March, upon the terms and conditions contained in the printed form of contract, which was duly signed by all the necessary parties. The plaintiffs were on the appointed day prepared to place their ship in the dock, but the defendants failed to take her in, and delayed doing so until the 10th of April. They now claim as damages sustained by them, by reason of this delay of fourteen days, the sum of £1,000. It appears there was a prior undertaking on the part of the Harbour Board to place another ship, the Matabele, in the Graving Dock on the 25th March. That ship did not arrive until the 27th, when she was docked, and she was not undocked until the 29th of March. It was the presence of the Matabele in the Graving Dock which prevented the Clematis going in. And in anticipation of this fact being set up as a legal impediment to docking the Clematis on the 27th, the plaintiffs proceeded to state that upon the failure of the Matabele to go into the Graving Dock on the 25th March, which was the day appointed for the purpose, she lost her turn on the list in accordance with Regulation No. 45, sub-section D of the Harbour Board. It is alleged that if this regulation had been observed, the Graving Dock would have been available for the Clematis on the 27th of March. The defendants deny that they agreed to place the Clematis in the Graving Dock on the 27th of March, and say that the Dock was not available for that ship until the 10th of April, being occupied by the Matabele until that day, but they admit that they engaged to place the Clematis in the Dock in terms of the printed document which was put in at the trial. The first point to decide is whether there was a definite agreement on the part of the defendants to dock the Clematis on the 27th. It appears from the evidence of Captain Stephen, the Dock Superintendent, that when he was approached in the matter by the agents of the ship, which had not then arrived, he entered into the agreement mentioned, pointing out to the agents that he had already undertaken to place the Matabele in the Dock on the 25th of March, and he was under the impression that she would be disposed of in a couple of days, in which event the Dock would be available for the Clematis. He says he never definitely undertook to dock the latter ship on the 27th. This is the only direct evidence in respect of the terms of the agreement at the time it was entered into, the agent who made the contract on behalf of the ship not having been called at the trial. Captain Stephen says he never enters into an engagement by which he undertakes to put any vessel on an appointed day out of the dock to make room for another, and he did not do so on this occasion. I am bound, under the circumstances, to take the evidence of Captain Stephen as conclusive upon this point, there being no direct contradiction of it. Captain Stephen is supported in his statement by a passage in a letter written by the agents of the Clematis on the 1st of April, to the following effect:—"The steamer Clematis arrived here on the 24th ult., the Dry Dock having been booked by the Matabele from the 25th, which latter steamer we were informed would leave the dock again on the 27th ulto." There is no pretence here that the 27th was fixed in express terms as the day for the docking of the Clematis. In the printed undertaking no date is fixed. I come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs have failed to prove that there was an agreement to place the Clematis in the Dock on the 27th. The defendants undertook, on the 20th, to place the Clematis in the Dock, and I am of opinion that they then entered into a binding contract to do what was required within a reasonable time, having regard to the regulation of the Harbour Board, and the ordinary course of business at the port. These agreements are entered into in contemplation of the regulations and the ordinary course of business at the port. It would appear that, in the ordinary course, it would be reasonable to expect that a ship would be docked within such time as the necessary arrangements can be made if the Dock is available, or so soon after the Dock becomes available. Independently of the consideration of the further question raised by the plaintiffs, which I still have to deal with, it would seem that the Matabele, which had a prior claim, and had to be disposed of, occupied the Dock until the 9th April. The work on the Matabele took longer than was anticipated, and the dock was not available for the Clematis until the 10th April, when she was actually docked. But it is contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that in calculating the reasonable time within which the defendants should have carried out their undertaking to dock the Clematis, the alleged prior rights of the Matabele should not enter into the calculation, because she had, under the Harbour Board regulations, forfeited her claim to be docked through her failure to be placed in the Graving Dock upon the appointed day. The regulation in question is to the following effect:—"On failure to place a vessel in the Graving Dock on the day appointed for that purpose, such vessel shall, if the Dock be required, lose her turn on the list, and the master shall be liable to pay to the Board the expenses, if any, which may have been incurred in preparing the Dock for her reception." It seems to have been contemplated by the regulations that a book should be kept, in which the names of vessels applying for the use of the Graving Dock should be entered, and that such vessels should be placed in the Dock in the order in which they appear on the list, providing all the prescribed conditions were fulfilled. The abovementioned rule provides for the forfeiture of this right of precedence under certain circumstances. It was contended for the plaintiffs that the moment a vessel fails to be placed in the Dock on the appointed day, she, as a necessary consequence, lost her place on the list, and the next vessel could claim the right to go in. If the regulations were strictly construed, a vessel would lose its turn on the list even where the failure to go into Dock arose from no fault on her part, and indeed, when the failure was due to default on the part of the Harbour Board. That could never have been intended. The regulation seems to me to provide for a forfeiture of a right, and for a penalty upon failure to enter the Dock through default of any vessel, as a matter of contract between that Harbour Board and that particular vessel, and is no direct concern under its contract of any other vessel on the list. In the analogous case of forfeiture provided by contract, the rule is that a forfeiture of rights should not be too readily assumed, and in this case, I think, it was in the discretion of the Dock Superintendent to take into consideration all the circumstances before he pronounced that the Matabele had lost her right to go into Dock. I can find nothing in the evidence to show that he exercised his discretion in an unreasonable manner, even it were in the jurisdiction of the Court, to interfere with his discretion. A point which it is unnecessary to decide. I am of opinion that the Harbour Board placed the Clematis in the Graving Dock in such reasonable time as they had by their contract undertaken to do, when they put her in after the Dock was vacated by the Matabele on the 9th April. That being my view of the case, it is unnecessary to decide whether the measure of damages contended for in the declaration is the correct measure to apply in a case like the present.

Judgment must be given for the defendants with costs.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Close and Mr. D. Buchanan) for appellants. Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Mr. Bisset) for respondents.

Mr. Schreiner: The learned judge in the Court below is mistaken in saying that the Port Captain has discretion to vary the turns of vessels using the patent slip. The Matabele should not have been allowed to enter the dock. The Port Captain can turn a vessel out of the dock should she stay too long, but the rule that should a vessel fail to enter the dock on the day appointed "she shall lose her turn on the list" is imperative, and the Port Captain has no general discretion. Stephen said the dock would be ready by March 25th. The Matabele did not arrive till the 27th and then was not admitted into the dock though she was charged dues from the 25th. Stephen says in his evidence that he never promised the dock on any particular date, and yet he promised to dock the Matabele on the 25th. Sec. 40 (as to giving notice of the Board's regulations must be brought to the notice of parties. Bulman is not contradicted by Stephen in any part of his evidence. The Gudrun could easily have been shifted (see evidence of Bulman and Stephen). The Clematis could not enter the dock while the Gudrun was there the Matabele (being a smaller vessel) could do so. Stephen says that the fact that the Matabele was a mail boat had no weight with him.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But may it not have weight with the Court?]

But the following regulations are compulsory and bind the Board just as much as they bind the ship:—

(d) On failure to place a vessel in the Graving Dock or on the Patent Slip on the day appointed for that purpose, such vessel shall, if the Dock or Slip be required, lose her turn on the list, and the owner, master, or agent of such vessel, shall be liable to pay to the Board the expenses, if any, which may have been incurred in preparing the Dock or Slip for her reception.

(f) The Port Captain and the Dock Superintendent may, in his discretion, allow any vessel which shall have arrived in the Harbour in a distressed or leaky condition, to enter the Graving Dock before all other vessels in the entry book.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The Board took advantage of sub-section (d). May not that have been inserted to meet cases like the present?]

[Hopley, J.: Did not the Captain agree to pay from the 25th?]

There is no evidence as to that. Stephen had no power to put the Clematis off her turn. He knew (see his evidence) that she would be in dock for ten or twelve days.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The Court will have to determine what is meant by a "reasonable time." Evidently the object of the rule is to protect the Board.]

The word "turn" is significant, and means that the ship next in rotation must go in.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Do you say that a mail steamer, no matter what the urgency for her early despatch might be, would lose her turn, if she failed to dock on the due date?]

So it would appear, and if it is not so that should be clearly expressed in the Regulations.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Why did you not contract to be docked on the 25th?]

We saw Bulmer's letter.

[De Villiers, C.J.: On the 26th March, Stephen says that he could not get the dock ready for the Matabele.]

Yes, but that was simply a declaration of what he was going to do. It does not prove his right to do it. We say that the interpretation of the rules given by his lordship in the Court below is incorrect. The word "turn" is very expressive. See Gough v. Port Elizabeth Town Council (16 C.T.R., 229), and the judgment at p. 231. The principles there enunciated are clearly applicable in the present case. Also Brady v. Turf Club (16 C.T.R., 237), Wright v. Paterson (5 Searle, 29, and 5 E.D.C., 390), and Bristow v. Paterson (5 Searle, 29, and 5 E.D.C., 390), and Liquidator Cape Central Railway v. Nothing (8 Juta, 25).

[De Villiers, C.J.: But this regulation is for the benefit of the Board, not for that of the public.]

The regulation says "in turn." We only claim our turn and not any particular day.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Cannot the Board waive a privilege in its own favour?]

Not to the prejudice of others. I rely on the word "turn," it shows that each ship must come in rotation. Sec. 7 of Regulations shows that "turns" must be strictly observed. The Board can waive its own rights but not those of the people, e.g., they could not shut up the graving dock altogether, Harbour Board v. Bucknall Line (14 C.T.R., 351). There the Board escaped liability because they had observed their own conditions: here e converso they have not observed them.

Mr. Searle (for respondents): This was an action on contract, but as the learned Judge said, the action on contract nearly broke down. We refused to admit that we had contracted to allow the Clematis to go into dock on the 27th. The Board's regulations are empowering: they are made for the purposes of their own business. It makes binding regulations only for other people. Had these things been done under an Act of Parliament, of course the Harbour Board would have been bound. These regulations are not incorporated in any contract with the Harbour Board. No contract has been proved. Stephen says that he never contracted to put in any vessel on any specified day.

[De Villiers, C.J.: If the Matabele was charged from the 25th does not that go far to prove that she ought to have been docked on the 25th. Must not the rule as to vessels in distress being first docked be taken to imply that all other vessels must be taken in their turn?]

No, we have simply followed the custom of the Port. The Matabele was due on the 26th; she arrived on the 27th, and was docked. No time was specified in the contract. See Alice Municipality v. Crallen (7 C.T.R., 409). This case is not quite on all fours with the present, but it is analogous, as to the force of empowering regulations.

Mr. Schreiner (in reply) cited London Shipowners v. London Docks (1902, 3 Ch.D. 252) in which the whole question of bye-laws and ultra vires is fully discussed. The case of Alice Municipality v. Crallen does not touch this case, but see Hopkins v. Mayor of Swansea (4 M. and W., 640).

De Villiers, C.J.: This action is founded upon a contract by which the defendant Board is alleged to have undertaken to take the plaintiff's ship Clematis into the Graving Dock on the 27th of March, 1901. The finding of the Divisional Court was that a contract to drydock the Clematis had been duly made, but that no date had been fixed upon in the contract. The written contract did not fix the date, but there was evidence for the plaintiff to the effect that the 27th had been agreed upon, whereas the evidence for the defendant was that the date was not fixed. Incidentally the declaration refers to one of the regulations of the Harbour Board which is said to have been in the contemplation of the parties to the contract and to be binding upon them, but if that regulation is to form the basis of the contract the date would have to be the 25th instead of the 27th of March. In so far as the plaintiffs rely upon an oral agreement that the ship was to be taken into dock on the 27th I quite agree with the Court below that no such definite agreement was made.

Assuming, however, that the regulation just referred to was in the contemplation of the parties at the time when they entered into the contract the question arises whether there was any breach of contract on the part of the defendant Board in not taking the Clematis into dock until the 10th of April. The delay was occasioned in the following manner. Before the date of the contract in question the Dock Superintendent had agreed with the owners of the ship Matabele to take her into the Graving Dock on her arrival, which was expected would be on the 25th of March, from which day dock dues were to become payable. This was during war time, and the agents of the Matabele, which was used in carrying mails on the East Coast, had been instructed to have her docked immediately. She did not arrive until the 27th, on which day she was allowed to enter the dock. On this point the Dock Superintendent gave the following evidence: "I knew the necessity for despatch in the matter of the Matabele. When the Matabele did not arrive on the 25th I still knew that she was coming down and that, barring accidents she would be here almost immediately. To have taken the Clematis in would have meant incurring a day's delay. The half of the dry dock, which is all that the Matabele required, is always prepared, but the whole of the dock which would have been required for the Clematis, required a day to prepare, and I would have had to put the Gudrum out of her berth until the Clematis left. I felt that if I had to begin to prepare the dock for the Clematis the Matabele would arrive whilst in the midst of the preparations. I thought the Matabele required only painting and cleaning." The contention on behalf of the plaintiffs is that under regulation 45 (d) the Board had no discretion, but was bound to refuse admission to the Matabele into the dock on the ground that the agents had failed to place her in the Graving dock on the 25th March, being the day appointed for that purpose. The regulation reads as follows: "On failure to place a vessel in the Graving Dock on the day appointed for that purpose, such vessel shall, if the dock be required, lose her turn on the list, and the owner, master, or agent of such vessel shall be liable to pay to the Board the expenses, if any, which may have been incurred in preparing the dock for her reception." The object of this regulation was not to confer rights on other ships, but to enable the Board, whilst refusing to allow admission to the ship which is in delay, to charge her with the expenses incurred for her reception. Under sub-section (f) the Dock Superintendent may, in his discretion, allow any vessel which shall have arrived in the Harbour in a distressed or leaky condition, to enter the Graving Dock before all other vessels in the entry book," but it does not follow that he was deprived of all discretion in every other case. To give one particular ship a preference over all other vessels in the entry book would be such a wide exercise of discretion as to require special authority under the regulations of the Harbour Board, but this is not the kind of discretion which was exercised in the present case. A berth had been engaged for the Matabele before the agents of the Clematis asked for a berth, and although the Matabele did not arrive on the very day agreed upon there were circumstances in the case which might reasonably induce the Superintendent to keep a berth for her although she was late. Anyhow, I cannot read regulation 45 (d) as depriving the Board itself of all discretion in a case like that of the Matabele, and in the present case the Board has adopted the act of the Superintendent. That regulation contains provisions in favour of the Board which it may, in my opinion, waive in favour of a particular ship if circumstances exist which in the opinion of the Board justify such a waiver. Under circumstances such as those under which a berth was engaged for the Matabele the Board was not bound to insist upon her losing her turn. Cases could be imagined in which it would be a breach of duty towards other ships if special favour is shown to some particular ship, but the present is not such a case. Nor is it part of the plaintiff's case that the defendants have been guilty of neglect of a statutory or quasi-statutory duty which it owed to the plaintiffs. The claim is for damages for breach of contract, and as the contract relied upon has not been proved, the judgment of the Court below was rightly given for the defendants. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

DONNELLY V. DONNELLY.

Plaintiff appeared in person, and applied for a decree of divorce, in default of defendant's compliance with an order of restitution, with maintenance for the child at the rate of £3 per month. Defendant was stated to be a plumber. His present whereabouts were unknown.

FRYER AND CO. V. WELCH.

This was an application to have a certain rule nisi, relating to rights to an auctioneer's stand on the Parade, made absolute. Mr. Alexander was for applicant.

Dr. Greer (for respondent) said that he had just been instructed, and was not prepared to go on at present.

Ordered to stand over till Saturday.

Ex parte JOYCE AND MCGREGOR.

Mr. Palmer moved for a rule nisi to be made absolute authorising alteration of a certain general plan.

Rule made absolute.

STROTHER V. JALIEL.

This was an application by Harry Heath Strother, upon notice to Behair Jaliel, to show cause why she should not be interdicted from ejecting one Javardien from certain property in Leeuwen-street, Cape Town, until respondent has discharged her indebtedness to the applicant, secured by a cession of the rents. Dr. Greer was for applicant; Mr. Benjamin was for respondent.

After affidavits had been read and counsel had been heard in argument, The application was refused, with costs.

Ex parte BERNING AND ANOTHER.

Mr. Roux moved, on behalf of the petitioners, as executors in a certain estate, for leave to execute certain mortgage bonds.

Order granted as prayed, subject to Master's report.

INDEPENDENT ORDER OF BRITISH FREE RIGHTS BENEFIT SOCIETY V. RUNCIMAN.

This was an application, upon notice, to set aside a certain judgment, to purge default, and to file a plea to respondent's claim. Mr. Benjamin was for applicants; Mr. Gutsche was for respondent.

From the affidavits, it appeared that Mr. Runciman had advanced certain moneys to the Simon's Town branch of the British Free Rights Benefit Society, and had taken judgment against the applicant society. Applicants said that the Grand Independent Order at Rondebosch had been sued, and that the proper parties to be sued were the African Methodist Equitable Order, at Simon's Town, to which the money was advanced. Applicants repudiated liability for the loan, or any portion thereof.

Mr. Benjamin submitted that there was nothing to show that the Rondebosch branch were liable for the moneys advanced to the Simon's Town branch. On the merits, applicants were entitled to have the matter re-opened. He further submitted that the service of summons in the provisional case was not good.

Mr. Gutsche submitted that the service which had been made was quite valid. Before the order of the Court was set aside, his learned friend must show a reasonable ground why his clients did not appear at the hearing of the provisional case, and that they had a good defence to the claim. No reasonable cause had been shown why appearance was not entered at the provisional hearing. On the point of merits he submitted that both societies were one Grand Lodge, that they had been sued as one Grand Lodge, and that the branch at Simon's Town was a subordinate member. The lodge at Rondebosch was the parent lodge.

Maasdorp, J., granted an order setting aside the provisional judgment and authorising applicants to purge default, and to enter appearance and defend the action, question of costs to stand over.

Ex parte THE COLONIAL TIMBER CO., LTD. (KNYSNA).

Mr. Douglas Buchanan moved for an order confirming the reduction of the company's capital from £3,500 to £875 the proposal being to reduce the shares to 5s. each, instead of £1 each, as heretofore. The capital was issued after registration, and fully paid up, by fifteen shareholders.

Ordered to stand over for further information as to the articles of association.

Ex parte MURRAY.

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan moved for an order authorising petitioner to raise a loan for £50 upon a life insurance policy ceded to her by her husband under ante-nuptial contract.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte CASTLE.

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan moved on the petition of Charles John Castle, as the duly authorised representative of the Matatiele Lodge of Freemasons, No. 2,130, for an order authorising transfer of certain landed property to the Municipality of Matatiele, and distribution of the proceeds among the eleven surviving members, and the heirs or representatives of the two deceased members. It had been found impossible to continue the lodge and the charter had been returned to England.

Order granted authorising transfer, appointment of petitioner as receiver of the proceeds, and payment of the costs out of the fund, but as to the prayer for directions with regard to distribution of the proceeds, no order was made.

Maasdorp, J., pointed out that there was no resolution of the members as to the division of the property.

Ex parte NEL.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for leave to dispose of certain property in the division of Ladismith, and invest the proceeds thereof in the purchase of another farm in the division of Robertson. The petitioner was a minor. The Master's report was favourable.

Order granted in terms of Master's report.

Ex parte ESTATE LATE HALL.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved on the petition of the executor for leave to hypothecate certain property in Breechstreet and Buitengracht-street, Cape Town, for the sum of £1,000.

Order granted.

Ex parte PETERS.

Mr. De Waal moved for leave to presume the death of petitioner's brother, Willem Peters, who formerly resided at Lady Grey, division of Robertson, and for the appointment of petitioner as curator bonis. The said William Peters was supposed to have died about 23 years ago. A dead body, believed to be that of Willem Peters, was found near a hut on the veld, in the Swellendam division.

Maasdorp, J.: I think that under the circumstances the Court will deal with the matter as if the death of Wm. Peters had been established. The proceedings will be far too summary thereupon immediately to dispose of his property without taking the necessary steps in the ordinary way to see that it passes on to his lawful heirs. Under the circumstances the Court will authorise the petitioner to pass transfer of the property, to receive the purchase price to satisfy his own debt out of the balance of the fund to be paid to the Master, the Master being authorised to take the necessary steps for the appointment of an executor ad litem, costs to be paid out of the proceeds.

DUNELL V. MOROKA.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for leave to sue respondent by edictal citation and to attach certain landed property in the division of Mafeking. Respondent was living in the Orange River Colony.

Leave to sue by edict granted, and property attached as prayed, citation to be returnable on August 1, and to be served personally.

Ex parte MINNAAR.

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan moved, on the petition of a minor residing at Stellenbosch, for an order authorising the payment of a certain legacy.

Ordered to stand over for a supporting affidavit.

Ex parte TRUSTEES INSOLVENT ESTATE KOENIG.

Mr. Howes moved for an order seeking the aid of the Courts of Natal in certain bankruptcy proceedings.

Order granted as prayed.

SALIE V. MOORE AND CO.

This was an application calling upon respondents to show cause why they should not be ordered to forward, deliver, and hand up to applicant a certain deed of transfer and diagram made in his favour, and relating to certain property at Somerset West Strand. Mr. Douglas Buchanan was for applicant; respondent appeared in person.

It appeared that the matter had been narrowed down to a question of costs, respondent having handed up the deed. Respondent at first claimed to have a lien on the deed for £36 10s. in respect of a debt owing to him by applicant, but he had now delivered the deed, and he said that he proposed to institute an action to recover the debt. The deed was originally handed to respondent for the purpose of raising a mortgage on the applicant's property at Somerset Strand.

Respondent was ordered to pay the costs of the application.

ROWE V. ROWE.

Mr. Roux moved on behalf of the petitioner for leave to sue his wife, Alice Rowe, by edictal citation for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce. Petitioner had not seen his wife for a considerable period, and her whereabouts were unknown to him.

Leave to sue granted citation to be returnable on October 15, personal service, failing which publication once in the "Government Gazette," "Cape Times," and a Melbourne newspaper, with leave to serve interdict and notice of trial at the same time.

Ex parte EXECUTOR ESTATE LATE HIGGS.

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan moved for an order fixing the date within which claims from persons entitled to share in the residue of the estate should be filed. Mr. Higgs died about November last.

Counsel (in answer to the Court) said that the object of the application was to assist the executor in distributing the residue of the estate. The property left by Mr. Higgs, who died a widower without issue, was stated to be worth about £3,000.

Maasdorp, J., said that the executor seemed to be too expeditious. No order would be granted now, but leave would be given to apply at a later stage.

In re THE KRAAIFONTEIN HOTEL CO.

Mr. Roux presented the third and final report of the liquidators, and applied for the usual order.

The usual order as to lying for inspection was granted.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN, the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP, and the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

CAPE TOWN TOWN COUNCIL
V. COLONIAL GOVERNMENT
AND TABLE BAY HARBOUR BOARD. } 1906.
July 13th.

[For head note, see report of the case in the Court below, p. 137.]

This was an appeal from a decision of His Lordship, the Chief Justice, declaring certain land on the Green Point Common to be the property of the plaintiffs.

The plaintiff's declaration was as follows:

1. The plaintiff is the Town Council of Cape Town, a body incorporated under Act No. 26 of 1893; the first defendant is the Honourable Arthur John Fuller, of Cape Town, who is sued in his capacity as Secretary of Agriculture, and as such representing the Colonial Government; the second defendant is the Table Bay Harbour Board, a body incorporated under Act No. 36 of 1896; and the third defendant is Colonel Chandos Hoskyns, Commanding Royal Engineer, Cape Town, and as such representing His Majesty's Secretary of State for War, or the former Board of H.M. Ordnance.

2 By Section 110 of the Act No. 26 of 1893, the Green Point Common, so far as it is situated within the Municipality of Cape Town, and also the foreshore within the said Municipality beyond the Harbour Board enclosure on the north side of the Breakwater, are vested in the plaintiff Council.

By Section 111 of the said Act, all waste ground or land situated within the said Municipality, which was before the first day of January, 1828, vested in or committed to the administration of the late Burgher Senate, and all other property which at the time of the expiration of Ordinance No. 1 of 1840 was legally vested in the Commissioners mentioned therein, was vested in the plaintiff Council, a reservation being made of any right or title which His Majesty's Imperial Government might have to any such immovable property.

Upon a portion of the said Green Point Common adjoining the Somerset Hospital is situated a certain fort now called "Fort Wynyard" but formerly known as "Kyk-in-de-Pot" Battery, and a laboratory. On June 1st 1840, His Excellency Sir George Napier, the then Governor of the Cape Colony, granted to the respective officers of Her Majesty's Ordnance, a certain piece of ground shown on the plan annexed to the said grant, together with all military buildings thereon, the said land being the aforesaid laboratory together with a small portion of ground surrounding it; it was further guaranteed, in the said grant, to the grantee, that no buildings whatsoever should henceforth be suffered to be erected on a certain larger area of land shown on the said plan as surrounding the ground granted as aforesaid, the said land included the "Kyk-in-de-Pot Battery" as shown on the said plan; the plaintiff Council craves leave to refer to the said grant and plan when produced at the trial.

The said grant was made on the further condition that the ground thus granted and guaranteed should be found, not to comprise, encroach upon or interfere with any ground already disposed of by Government.

6. The whole of the land dealt with as aforesaid is situated within the limits of the Municipality of Cape Town, and extends down to the seashore between the Breakwater and Mouille Point over the lower portion of it, a road has existed for far more than thirty years, and the said road is now the public road in front of the Somerset Hospital to Three Anchor Bay.

7. The Green Point Common, including the whole of the land shown upon the aforesaid plan attached to the said grant of 1840, formed portion of the land vested in or administered by the Burgher Senate before January 1st, 1828, and is now vested in the plaintiff Council under the one hundred and eleventh section of Act No. 26 of 1893.

8. The plaintiff Council further says that the said land, saving the portion actually granted as aforesaid, and "Fort Wynyard" has for a period of far more than thirty years always remained open and unenclosed, and has always been freely, continuously, uninterruptedly and as of right used and occupied by the inhabitants of Cape Town as a pasturage for cattle, and for recreation and other purposes, in the same manner in which the rest of the said Common has been used, and the said inhabitants have acquired a prescriptive right to the aforesaid use thereof.

9. Even if it be not proved that the said land was vested in or administered by the Burgher Senate, before January 1st, 1828, or that since the said date the inhabitants of Cape Town have acquired a prescriptive right as aforesaid to the use thereof, the plaintiff Council submits that the said land being the said land shown on the said plan excluding that expressly granted, and excluding "Fort Wynyard" vested in it upon the promulgation of Act No. 26 of 1893, the said ground being at the said date open for the use of the inhabitants of Cape Town and used and enjoyed by the said inhabitants, as aforesaid, as portion of the Green Point Common.

10. On September 9th, 1897, the Surveyor-General purporting to act under the eleventh section of Act No. 15 of 1887 and in pursuance of a resolution of the Houses of Parliament dated July, 1896, issued a certificate of reservation, reserving for the purpose of defence the portion of land hereinbefore referred to as to which the aforesaid guarantee in the grant of 1840 was given, the plaintiff Council had no knowledge of the said certificate of reservation, or of the aforesaid resolution or of any of the proceedings connected therewith, and only recently discovered the same, and submits that it is in no way bound or affected thereby.

11. In or about the year 1903, the plaintiff Council discovered that the Imperial Military Authorities were purporting to give a lease or right of occupation to the second defendant, the Table Bay Harbour Board, over portion of the said land, being that portion situated between the road passing in front of the said "Fort Wynyard," and the sea; and the said Military Authorities in or about the said date, fenced in a portion of the said land, and obstructed a road or roads, across it, to which the public had a right.

12. Thereafter the second defendant took possession of a portion of the said land, between the road running in front of "Fort Wynyard" and the sea, and adjoining the ground of the Cape Canning Company, made excavations thereon, laid down lines of railway, and constructed sheds and buildings thereon, enclosed the said portion with an iron fence, and also encroached upon, took possession of, and commenced work of reclamation upon the foreshore adjoining the said land.

13. The public, and the inhabitants of the Municipality are, by the aforesaid works, excluded from all access to the portion of land taken possession of as aforesaid, and to the foreshore, and the second defendant, in the construction of the said works, has encroached on the public road in paragraph 6, referred to: none of the aforesaid works which are being constructed or purposes for which the said land is being used, and occupied by the second defendant, are in connection with the military or naval defence or protection of Table Bay, or the Harbour thereof.

14. The plaintiff Council has recently ascertained that the first defendant has purported to deliver over the said land, of which the second defendant has taken possession, to it (the second defendant) and is about to issue a title of the said portion of land situate between the road in front of "Fort Wynyard" and the sea, to the second defendant, unless restrained from so doing by order of this honourable Court.

15. By reason of the aforesaid acts of trespass committed by the defendants, and each of them, the plaintiff Council, and the inhabitants of Cape Town have been deprived of the free use and enjoyment of the said land, and have sustained loss and damage.

The plaintiff Council claims:

(a) A declaration as to the rights of the plaintiff Council and the defendants in respect of the said portion of land—the plaintiff Council making no claim in respect of the said laboratory, and the small portion of ground surrounding it which were actually granted in 1840, nor in respect of the land occupied by "Fort Wynyard."

(b) An interdict restraining the first defendant from granting any portion of the said land, save as above, to either the second or third defendant, or from purporting to reserve the said land so as to give the said second or third defendant any rights over the same.

(c) An order on the second defendant.

1. To quit and deliver up the portion of the said land of which it is in occupation.

2. To remove all buildings and other obstructions therefrom, and the fencing around the same.

3. To fill up all excavations made by it thereon.

4. To build up and restore the road which it has encroached upon.

(d) A declaration that the plaintiff Council and the inhabitants of Cape Town are entitled to the free and unobstructed use of and access to the foreshore, encroached upon by the second defendant, and an interdict restraining the second defendant from interfering with the same, or from interfering with, obstructing, or trespassing on the foreshore.

(e) An order compelling the third defendant,

1. To remove the fence placed by him or under his authority round portion of the said land.

2. To allow all roads across the said portion to remain free and unobstructed.

(f) As against the two first-named defendants £100 damages for trespass.

(g) As against the third defendant £100 damages for trespass.

(h) Alternative relief.

(i) Cost of suit.

To this declaration the third defendant (Colonel Hoskyns) put in the following exception and plea in abatement.

The defendant, Colonel Chandos Hoskyns, comes into Court for the purpose of taking exception to and plead in abatement of the plaintiff's action, including the summons and declaration, on the ground that without obtaining submission and consent on the part of His Majesty's Secretary of State for War to the jurisdiction of this honourable Court the plaintiff was not entitled to institute and is not entitled to have and maintain this action against him, the said defendant, and that neither in the summons nor in the declaration is it alleged that such submission and consent has been obtained.

Wherefore the said defendant prays that this action as against him may be set aside and abated with costs of suit.

The exception was allowed with costs.

The first and second defendants pleaded as follows:

1. Paragraph 1 of the declaration is admitted.

2. Paragraph 2 is admitted save that as regards so much of the paragraph as refers to the foreshore the defendants refer to the terms of the said Section 110.

3. Paragraph 3 does not correctly state the provisions of the 111th Section of Act 26 of 1893, and is denied and the defendants beg to refer this honourable Court to the said Section for the terms thereof showing what waste land or other property was vested in the plaintiff.

4. The defendants deny that the said Fort Wynyard and the laboratory hereinafter mentioned are or were situated upon the Green Point Common, vested in the plaintiff. The defendants admit the grant referred to in paragraph 4 being a grant of the said laboratory with a small portion of the ground adjoining and the said grant guaranteed to the grantees of the guarantee set forth in paragraph 4; and contained the proviso in paragraph 5 set forth and also with permission to dispose of or alienate the said ground with the approbation of the Government and subject to all such regulations as were either already or should in future be established with regard to such lands.

5. As to paragraph 6 the defendants deny that the land referred to in the said paragraph is situated within municipal limits, they deny that the said land extends to the seashore between the Breakwater and Mouille Point. They admit that a certain road exists between the Somerset Hospital and Three Anchor Bay but otherwise they deny the allegations in paragraph 6.

6. The defendants deny the allegations in paragraph 7 of the declaration. They admit that the land referred to in paragraph 7 was for a period of time open and unenclosed, but they deny all the other allegations in paragraph 8 and they specially deny that the inhabitants of Cape Town have uninterruptedly and of right used and occupied the said land for a period of thirty years and they specially deny the said use and occupation as regards the land referred to in paragraph 8 hereof. The defendants deny the allegations of fact and conclusions of law in the 9th paragraph contained.

7. The defendants admit that on the 9th September, 1897, the Surveyor-General issued the certificate referred to as he legally might in accordance with the law and the resolutions of both Houses of Parliament, and they deny the other allegations in paragraph 10 contained.

8. The defendants have no knowledge of the alleged discovery by the plaintiffs, and do not admit the same. They say that the Imperial Military Authorities did in 1897 purport to give a right of occupation to the second defendant over the portion of land between the said road and the sea, and the defendants did take possession thereof in the said year, save and except a certain portion thereof, which was granted years ago by the Crown, and is now the registered property of the Canning Company, from whom the second defendant has leased it. The defendants have no knowledge of the other allegations in paragraph 11.

9. As to paragraph 12, the second defendant admits that under the powers conferred on him by law and with the sanction of the Colonial Government he took possession of the land as described in the 8th paragraph hereof, and that he reclaimed certain land from the sea and filled up and levelled the said land which chiefly consisted of rocks and has improved and made the land which was useless, of great value, and has laid down lines of railway and constructed sheds thereon. Save as above, paragraph 12 is denied.

10. The defendants admit that the public and inhabitants of the Municipality are excluded, as alleged in paragraph 13, of the declaration, but they deny the other allegations in paragraph 13.

11. As to paragraph 14, the defendants admit that the Colonial Government was about to issue a title to the second defendant of the said portion of land in paragraph 8 hereof referred to, but they deny the rest of the said paragraph 14, and they deny paragraph 15.

Wherefore they pray that the plaintiff's claim may be dismissed with costs.

And for a claim in reconvention the second defendant says:

1. That in case this honourable Court should adjudge in terms of the plaintiff's prayers in convention, he begs to refer this honourable Court to the pleadings in convention, and says that as a bona fide possessor of the said portion of land from which the plaintiff claims that he should be ejected, he has made great improvements upon the said land, and of which improvements the plaintiff was fully aware, and has enhanced the value of the said ground by £12,000 more than which was expended by him thereon.

Wherefore he prays:

(a) For an order that the plaintiff is not entitled to eject him from the said land without the payment to him of the sum of £12,000.

(b) Alternative relief.

(c) Costs of suit.

Replication and plea to claim in reconvention:

Plaintiffs say for a replication:

(1) (a) That as to paragraph 4 of the plea and the effect in law of the said grant of 1840 they refer to the terms of the said grant.

(b) That as to paragraph 8 they do not claim any part of such ground as may have been granted to and is now owned by the said Cape Canning Company.

2. Save as above and save in so far as the said plea admits any of the allegations in the declaration, they deny all the allegations of fact and conclusions of law therein, join issue thereon and again pray for judgment with costs.

And for a plea to the claim in reconvention, they say:

3. They crave leave to refer to the several matters hereinbefore by them pleaded.

4. If this honourable Court should find that the said Harbour Board is a bona fide possessor in respect of improvements effected prior to the summons in this suit (as to which allegations they submit to the judgment of the Court) they say that the said works done by such Board are not works which they as owners would have executed and they have not received any account from plaintiffs in reconvention of the said works of their value; they say that if this honourable Court should find that the said works enhance the value of the land and are improvements within the meaning of the law in that behalf, they are prepared and hereby tender to pay the fair and legal value of such improvements as have been effected prior to the date of summons in this suit.

Wherefore, subject to the above, they pray that defendants' claim be dismissed with costs.

The rejoinder and replication in reconvention were general.

The reasons of the Chief Justice, for his judgment were as follows:

The original defendants in this action were the Colonial Government, the Table Bay Harbour Board and Colonel Hoskyns, as representing the Secretary of State for War. On behalf of the last of the three defendants an exception was taken to the exercise of jurisdiction by this Court over him in his said capacity without the consent of the Crown, and the exception was allowed by me. The only remaining defendants, therefore, were the Colonial Government and the Harbour Board.

The action is for a declaration of the respective rights of the parties in respect of a portion of land which formerly formed part of the Green Point Common, for an interdict restraining the Government from granting the land to the Harbour Board, for an order of ejectment against the Board, for a declaration that the plaintiff Council and inhabitants of Cape Town are entitled to the free and unobstructed use of and access to the foreshore, for an order compelling the Board to remove a fence placed round the land and for damages against both defendants.

The plaintiff's claim to the control over and ownership of the land in dispute is based on the free, continuous and uninterrupted user from time immemorial by the inhabitants of Cape Town and upon the different statutes by which the rights of the plaintiff Council and of its predecessors, as formerly constituted, were from time to time extended and defined.

The defendants, by their joint plea, deny any uninterrupted user by the inhabitants, and they also deny that the land now in question ever formed part of the Green Point Common or of any land vested in the Council by the different statutes relied upon by the Council. The defendants more especially rely upon the fact that the land in dispute forms part of an area as to which a guarantee was given in 1840 by the Colonial Government to the Imperial Government that no buildings would be suffered to be erected thereon. This guarantee appears in a grant made by the Governor on 1st June, 1840, to the officers of Her Majesty's Ordnance of the Laboratory, with a small portion of ground surrounding the same, the effect of the guarantee being to create in favour of the Imperial Government a servitude upon the area just mentioned, preventing its owners or occupiers from thereafter erecting any building thereon.

The defendant Board filed a claim in reconvention demanding payment of £12,000 as compensation for improvements in case it should be decided that the Council is entitled to eject the Board from the land in dispute. After the arguments had been completed I understood it to be agreed between counsel that the Harbour Board should remain in possession of the land in dispute and pay to the Council such compensation as should be settled by a referee, the only matter left for future argument being the name of the referee. I did not accordingly, enter fully into my reasons for holding that the land in dispute was vested in the Council subject to the servitude in favour of the Imperial Government and I gave no judgment on the defendant's claim in reconvention which obviously would fall to the ground if the order of ejectment was not made. It is clear that if the order of ejectment had been made the Board, which had all along acted in perfect good faith, would have been entitled to full compensation for the improvements made by it to the extent of the enhanced value of the land. In referring the value of the land in dispute to a referee the judgment excluded any portion of the land that may have been reclaimed by the Board from the sea and it also excluded the value of any other improvements made by the Board. I added that in estimating the value of the disputed piece of land the referee would have to bear in mind the fact that the Council would not have been entitled to erect buildings thereon or sell it for building purposes but it was not necessary to give a special direction to that effect to the referee.

In the consideration of this case it was necessary to assume the validity of the servitude for two reasons, viz.: Because the Imperial Government was no longer a party to the suit and because no steps had been taken to set aside the grant of 1840. I am by no means satisfied that, even at that time, the Colonial Government had the right to issue the grant in the form in which it was issued. From very early times there had been a governing Municipal body for Cape Town with a right of control over waste lands within the Municipality. From and inclusive of the ground afterwards used as cemeteries, the land between Lion's Rump and the sea was an open space to which the burghers had rights of access as well as grazing rights. Within that large open space forts and other military buildings were from time to time erected and of course the successive municipal bodies exercised no control over them. Among these forts was the Kijk in de Pot battery, which was afterwards known as Fort Wynyard, and which stood within the area subjected to a servitude by the grant of 1840. When, at different times, grants of portions of the waste lands were required to be made, the practice was not quite uniform. Sometimes, as on 23rd October, 1827, two members of the Burgher Senate, acting with the consent of the Government, would make the grant and, at other times, as on 9th February, 1802, the grant would be made by the Government. The latter was the strictly correct course because the nominal title to all ungranted land remains with the Crown, but where a public body has a statutory title to land there would seem to be no valid reason why such body should not, acting with the approval and under the authority of the Crown, pass a valid title to others. In fact we find that in all the statutes vesting waste land in municipal bodies there is always a provision that they shall not be allowed to alienate without the consent of the Crown. This provision is mainly due to the desire of the legislature to prevent alienations except for legitimate public purposes, but it may also have been partly due to the necessity of upholding the doctrine that every title of land should originate with a grant made by the Crown or with the consent of the Crown. Coming next to the land known as the Green Point Common, the documentary evidence satisfies me that even before 1840 the Common included the land now in dispute. With the exception of Holm, the old witnesses could not speak to what took place before 1840, but as far back as they could remember the land was considered part of the Common on which the cattle of the inhabitants grazed and over which people freely went for the purpose of having access to the seashore. As to Holm, who is 70 years of age, he says that he remembers the Laboratory and used to play in the neighbourhood as a child. "The Common," he said, "was open right from the cemeteries to Three Anchor Bay. The Municipality regulated all the Common. One could not take a load of sand without a permit." By Ordinance No. 1 of 1840, the Municipality was re-modelled, but the Commissioners were not deprived of the rights which had been exercised by the Burgher Senate and subsequent Municipal governing bodies. Not long after the passing of that Ordinance the Government made the grant of 1840, and this fact has been relied upon as shewing that the Municipality had no right over the land. It should be remembered, however, that the only land actually granted was the land on which certain Government buildings stood and over which the Commissioners could claim no right of control. The so-called guarantee included a much larger area around the land granted and the Government may well have believed that it was quite safe in giving the guarantee, seeing that, without the consent of the Government, the Commissioners could not have disposed of the land for building purposes. The guarantee could not, however, deprive the Municipality of its rights in respect of the waste land not granted to the Imperial Government. That land remained under the control of the municipal body, established in 1840, and afterwards under the control of the municipal bodies which succeeded it. The evidence given on behalf of the plaintiff Council is conclusive on this point, and there is practically no evidence to contradict it. The neighbouring land on which the Somerset Hospital was built has been admitted by the Government to be land vested in the Council. The land in front of the Somerset Hospital and immediately abutting on the strip of land in dispute was actually hired by the Harbour Board from the plaintiff Council. Much reliance has been placed on behalf of the defendants on the fact that the Council raised no objection to portion of the land in dispute being granted to the Cape Canning Company, but any admission which may have been impliedly made by the Council in the course of the correspondence on this subject cannot affect its legal rights in respect of the rest of the land in dispute. The correspondence between the Board and the Council in 1887 shows that at that time the Council was regarded by both parties as the owner of the land between Gallow's Hill and the boundary of the Board's property. In 1893, when the Act establishing the present Council was passed, the land now in dispute was still treated as part of the Green Point Common over which the plaintiff had control and by means of which the inhabitants had free access to the seashore. It is true that the Board tipped some clay and rubbish on to part of this land in the same way as some of the inhabitants seem to have done, but it does not appear that the plaintiff Council was made aware of the fact. For the rest the ground around Fort Wynyard was open and was used for sporting purposes as well as for the grazing of cattle. People wandered about there freely and used to go over it for the purpose of bathing and fishing in the sea. Such was the state of affairs when Act No. 26 of 1893 was passed. The 111th section of that Act vests in the Council all property previously vested in the Commissioners, but even if that section had not been applicable, I am clearly of opinion that under the 110th section of the Act the Council can make good its claim. That section vests in the Council the property of and in the Green Point Common so far as it is situated within the Municipality. The land in dispute was part of the Green Point Common and was situated within the Municipality. Since 1893 the Harbour Board has enclosed the land and has expended considerable sums of money on it but there is no proof of such acquiescence on the part of the Council as to deprive it of its undoubted rights to protect the interests of the inhabitants whom it represents. The Imperial Government appears to have waived in favour of the Board the right to prevent building on the land but, such waiver cannot confer on the Colonial Government the right to transfer the land itself to the Harbour Board in contravention of the statutory rights which the legislature has conferred on the plaintiff Council. The grant which was made in 1840 and which has never been set aside must be respected but the terms of that grant are quite consistent with the retention by the Council of the ownership of the portion of land not specially granted. The interests of all parties will be safeguarded if the land now in question, no part of which has been so granted is declared to be the property of the Council subject to the servitude in favour of the Imperial Government. The obvious consequence would under ordinary circumstances, be that the Government would have to be interdicted from carrying out its avowed intention of transferring the land to the Board. The parties, however, have agreed that the Board shall remain in occupation subject to the payment of compensation to the Council and any over valuation will be prevented if the referee bears in mind that the Council would not have had the right to sell the land for building purposes and that reclaimed land and the value of improvements made by the Board must be excluded. The defendants will pay the costs of the action.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Nightingale) for appellants. Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Mr. McGregor) for respondents.

Sir H. Juta said that the land in question was vested in the Governor and not in the Town Council. It had never been granted to the Town Council, unless it was granted under section 110 of Act 26 of 1893 or under section 111 of the same Act, which was in terms similar to certain sections in earlier Acts, and granted all the waste lands in the Municipality to the Town Council. It was not granted under that Act. Section 110 vested Green Point Common in the Town Council, so the question arose: Was this land a part of Green Point Common? Whether this was so or not depended upon what the Town Council in 1893 meant by Green Point Common, because this was a private Act of Parliament, which should be construed as a contract between the Town Council and the Colonial Government. Certain acts of the Council subsequent to 1893 showed conclusively that it never considered this land part of Green Point Common. For instance, it did not object to the grant of part of the land to the Cape Canning Company. Of course, if the Act of 1893 did in fact grant this piece of land to the Town Council there was an end of the matter, but he referred to the action of the Council subsequent to 1893 to show that it did not intend to include this piece of land in Green Point Common when it applied to Parliament to transfer Green Point Common to it. This land could not be vested in the Town Council by section 111, because it was not waste land within the Municipality. It was commonage. Counsel cited Colonial Government v. Town Council (19 S.C., 87). Prescription ran against the Crown if the land could be alienated, but where the land was reserved for military purposes prescription could not run against the Crown. Blankenberg's case (11 S.C., p. 90) and Municipality of French Hoek v. Hugo (2 J., 230) were quoted. There was no evidence of prescription against the Crown.

Mr. Searle (for respondents): In the Court below the Chief Justice decided that the Town Council were entitled to the commonage both under Section 110 and 111 of Act 26 of 1893 (see 16 C.T.R., 137, and judgment p. 140).

[Buchanan, J.: I do not see that the land was vested in the Commissioners.]

I shall show that that is so. The Chief Justice found that the Town Council had a claim to it under Section 110.

[Buchanan, J.: I do not see it.]

The whole of the Green Point Common was vested in the Burgher Senate by Ordinance 34 of 1827. From time to time grants of portions of it were made by the Burgher Senate to Government and to certain trustees. All the land which the Harbour Board got was alienated by Government with the consent of the Burgher Senate, see Ordinance 1 of 1840. The other side admit that the surrounding land was municipal land, and it could not be that unless it was vacant land under Act 26 of 1893. We had all the land save that on which the buildings stood. The Ordinance survey shows that the land in question was waste land, and as such vested in the Council. See Section 111 of Act 26 of 1893. Till 1893 there was no authority in the Council to open out waste land. The Burgher Senate lasted till 1827, and by Ordinance 34 of 1827 its property was transferred to trustees.

As to the formation of the Burgher Senate see Mr. Leibbrandt's evidence (p. 40 of the record). See also Ordinance 4 of 1839, Section 152, as to Green and Sea Point, cited in the Court below. In 1832 a grant of land for a cemetery was made by the Senate to the English Church, and in 1840 to the Ebenezer Church; both of these grants speak of the land granted as being bounded by waste land. All the evidence showed that the commonage extended from the cemeteries to Three Anchor Bay; but in view of Section 110 it is not necessary to labour that point.

[Buchanan, J.: Was not some kind of compromise arrived at?]

The Chief Justice suggested that the question of the Harbour Board being compensated for improvements might be referred to arbitration (16 C.T.R., 139), but no referee was appointed. The Government seem to think that as they had paid compensation they could grant part of their land to the Cape Canning Company. By their letter of January 17th, 1896, they show that they had some knowledge as to their rights. We do not claim the Canning Company's land, but we do claim the foreshore in front of the Somerset Hospital. There can be no doubt that this is vested in the Council. Various Acts from 1839 to 5 of 1895 show that Green Point Common was the property of the Council. The Council always treated the ground as a quid integrum, as one plot. Relief is not always granted on the ground of error. In Heath v. Colonial Government (5 Juta, 353), the Government never meant to sell the cottage, but the Court would not grant them relief.

[Sir H. Juta: No, but there there was no justus error.]

Anyhow, they did not mean to sell the cottage. We do not now dispute the ownership of the magazines, but we do not admit that the ground was rightfully alienated.

[Hopley, J.: Is commonage waste land?]

Yes, commonage is always referred to as waste land. The case of Colonial Government v. Town Council of Cape Town (12 C.T.R., 96), only decides that land reclaimed from the sea is not waste land. As to prescription, the evidence is very clear in our favour. We do not claim the right to oust the military, but we claim by prescription, see paragraph 8 of the declaration. The letter of April 15, 1887 (p. 56 of the record) shows that the Government recognised the right of the Town Council to this land. See Blankenberg v. Colonial Government (4 C.T.R., 61). This case does not altogether apply, because here the whole of the property was not fortified. There were no guns there in 1840.

Sir H. Juta (in reply): The argument for the respondents seems to treat the case for the Crown as if we were the original plaintiffs and the onus was upon us to prove our case. That is not so, they were the plaintiffs. Waste land is not commonage, but land to which nobody has a title. In the case of Cape Town Town Council v. Table Bay Harbour Board (12 C.T.R., 159), my learned friend quoted all the leading cases. Land which is marked off ceases to be waste land. The surrounding land which was not demarcated may have been waste land, but in 1893 the Harbour Board had been working on this land for six years, and therefore it could not be waste land (16 C.T.R., 138). Holm was only four years old at the time the things took place to which he refers in his evidence. If in 1840 the Crown granted a servitude over the land to the Military the land must have belonged to the Crown if the servitude was worth anything.

[Hopley, J.: The Government calls it a guarantee.]

We cannot get rid of legal consequences by calling things by different names. The grant was a servitude and nothing else.

Buchanan, J.: This action was brought to declare the rights of the parties in the suit in respect of certain portion of ground within the Municipality of Cape Town. A grant was made by the Governor of the Colony in 1840 of a portion of this land to the officers of Her Majesty's Ordnance on which there was erected the old laboratory, in which cartridges were loaded, together with a limited area around the same and with all the military buildings and fortifications erected thereon, with a guarantee to the grantees that no buildings whatever should be allowed to be erected on a specified extent of land round the magazine. It is portion of this larger extent on which, what has been called, a right of clearance exists that is in dispute in this case. This right of clearance seems to mean that there should be no buildings erected upon this ground, or, if any buildings have been erected, that these buildings could be removed. When the grant was made, it does not appear that there were any buildings upon this surrounding land. When the case came before the Court of first instance, this reservation—this right of clearance—was construed to mean a servitude imposed by the Governor upon the rest of the ground therein situated within the specified area in favour of the officers of the Ordnance. There has been no appeal against this part of the judgment. But an appeal has been brought against the portion of his lordship's judgment which declares that the dominium in this land is now vested in the Town Council, subject to the servitude. It is claimed, on behalf of the appellants, that the property in this land is vested, not in the Town Council, but in the Governor. In this country, in theory, all lands are vested in the Crown in the first instance, and private ownership can always be traced back to some specific grant from the Crown. But there may also be a statutory grant of Crown property. It appears that as far back as 1839 the Municipality of Cape Town was first formed, and in 1840 an Act was passed which vested in the then Municipality certain specific properties named, and also waste lands situated within the Municipality, which had been vested in or committed to the administration of the then late Burgher Senate, and it is said that the whole of these lands had been subject to the control of the Burgher Senate. But we find, in 1849, shortly after the Ordinance was passed, several grants were made by the Governor of the Colony of portions of the ground within the Municipality, and the ground now in dispute was also granted after this Ordinance of 1840 was enacted.

It is alleged on the part of the Council that the Act of 1840 and subsequent Acts are in effect statutory grants of these waste lands, which were formerly within the Municipality under the administration of the Burgher Senate. If this land had been transferred out and out by the statute from the Crown to the Municipality, it is certainly inconsistent with any such transfer that the Governor should still issue titles direct from himself, not on behalf of the municipality, but from the Crown of a number of different portions of ground. These grants have been in existence since 1840, and are not now in question, and I think that now it is too late to say that these grants are now invalid in consequence of competing rights. The municipality are quite willing that the specific property granted in 1840 to the officers of the Ordinance shall remain vested in the military authorities, and they make no claim in respect of the specific property so granted, but they claim, by virtue of these different statutes, the other property over which only a servitude was created, but which was not granted away by the Crown. The Ordinance No. 40 was passed for a period of 20 years, and in the renewing Act of 1861, similar words were used as to waste lands in the municipality. In 1882, in the next municipal Act passed, similar words are again used. In 1893 the present Act was passed. This present Act goes further than any of the previous Acts. It contains in the 110th section words which are not to be found in the other Acts. The 111th section is a repetition of the previous Acts, and refers to the ground vested in the Burgher Senate, but the 110th section expressly vests in the Council all lands, streets, roads, and open places to which the inhabitants of the municipality have acquired a common right, "and in the Green Point Common in so far as it is situated within the municipality," as well as of certain portions of the foreshore." Now, neither the ground upon the common nor the foreshore was mentioned in the previous Acts, and I read this section as removing any doubt which might before have existed as to whether the Green Point Common was now vested in the Town Council. By this Act of 1893 it is clear, I think, that the Parliament of the country vested the common in the Town Council. The question then arises, is the portion of the ground now in question part of the Green Point Common? In the Court of First Instance evidence was led showing that this land was so regarded for a number of years, and there is evidence of user on behalf of the inhabitants of this particular ground. In the plaintiff's declaration there is a claim of prescriptive rights, but it is not a claim to the dominium in the ground in question, but only of the right of use thereof. The evidence led in support of this right, I think, is useful in this case, and was so found by the Court of first instance as showing that the ground in question was part of the Green Point Common, situated within the municipality. If that evidence is satisfactory as showing that it is part of the common within the municipality, then it seems to me to indisputably follow that the 110th section vests this ground in the Corporation of Cape Town. It is said that certain acts were permitted, and suffered by the Town Council and that certain rights were exercised by the Government, which were inconsistent with the right of property now set up. But even if those acts were inconsistent with the rights of the municipality, that does not cancel the Act which transferred the property to the municipality. It may be that the municipality, after the passing of the Act, were not fully aware of the rights conferred upon it. But there is nothing to show why the Court should read this Act in any way otherwise than as the words actually used by the Legislature evidence its meaning. It may well be argued that this very land in question was by the various earlier statutes vested in the municipality before the Act of 1893 was passed, but I think, after the passing of the Act of 1893, there can be no doubt whatever that the Parliament of this country has transferred this Government property which was within the municipality, and over which a servitude was created in favour of the Ordinance officials to the municipality. His Lordship the Chief Justice, in giving judgment, said that while it would be declared that this land was the property of the Council, the interests of all parties would be safeguarded, and his declaration was coupled with the condition that the ground was granted to the municipality subject to the servitude in favour of the Imperial Government. It seems, therefore, no injustice was done. All rights have been carefully safeguarded, and, with the Acts before us and with the different statements as to the user of this property, I think there can be no doubt that the decision of the Court of first instance is correct, and that this appeal cannot be allowed. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

ADMISSION. { . 1906.
 } July 14th.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for the admission of Henry August Peter von Holdt as an attorney and notary.

Application granted, and oath administered.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

NIMMO V. STURCK.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £150, with interest and costs.

The defendant appeared in person, and read an affidavit, in which he stated that he was induced by misrepresentation of a third party to purchase certain shares, and the note was signed in consequence of this. It would be impossible for him to settle the debt if judgment went against him, except by small monthly sums.

Order granted.

STEYN V. PRETORIUS.

Mr. Van Zyl was for the plaintiff, and Mr. Louwrens was for the defendant. Mr. Van Zyl moved for provisional sentence for £60 on a promissory note, less £42 10s. paid on account. The defence was a counter-claim for board and lodging, etc., which extinguished the balance claimed.

Order granted, with costs. His Lordship added that the defendant could still go into the principal case when the question could be tried.

ESTATE HIGGS V. RUCK.

Mr. Inchbold moved for provisional sentence on two mortgage bonds for £200 and £100, with interest and costs, and that the property be declared executable.

Order granted.

KATZ AND OLSWANG V. SEPEL.

Dr. Greer moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £1,000, with interest and costs, and that the property be declared executable.

Order granted.

Mr. Bailey moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £200, with interest, and that the property be declared executable.

Order granted.

CENTRAL NEWS AGENCY V. ZEEMAN.

Mr. Upington moved for a decree of civil imprisonment on an unsatisfied judgment of the Supreme Court. The defendant (counsel said) sued the plaintiffs, and claimed £4 for salary and £2,000 for malicious prosecution. The jury found that the plaintiff was only entitled to £2 10s. 4d., which was tendered. The plaintiff was ordered to pay the costs of the action, and there was a return of nulla bonis.

The defendant appeared, and said he was without work, and had a wife and four children to keep. He was unable to pay anything. The costs in the case amounted to £319.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You would have done much better by keeping the money and avoiding the law?—Yes, my lord: there are a lot of uncertain points in law.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: He had a life policy for £250, which was pledged with the S.A. Mutual for £24. He had sold everything.

Mr. Upington then said, in face of the evidence, he could not press for a decree.

De Villiers, C.J., said at present there would be no order, but if at any time the defendant got property, the plaintiffs could renew the application.

THE MASTER V. WINTERBACH.

Mr. Howel Jones moved for an order compelling defendant, as tutor testamentary, to file an account in the estate.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan moved for judgment, under rule 329d, for £38 15s. 7d., for goods sold and delivered.
Order granted.

HORNE V. HORNE.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for an order of restitution of conjugal rights. The plaintiff was allowed to embody her evidence in an affidavit, which counsel now produced. The evidence set out that the parties were married at Ladismith, in October, 1901. The parties afterwards resided at Cape Town, where the defendant maliciously deserted the plaintiff.

The defendant was ordered to restore conjugal rights by the 1st August, failing which to show cause, on the 31st August, why a decree of divorce should not be granted; the rule to be served as in the previous order.

REHABILITATION.

{ 1906.
July 14th.

Mr. Van Zyl moved, under the 117th section, for the discharge of Johannes Jacobus Pretorius, jun., from insolvency.
Application granted.

GAUPOULOS V. HARRIS AND DICKSON.

Ship—Attachment—Bodily fear.

The Court refused to order the attachment of a certain ship, ad fundandam jurisdictionem, at the suit of a fireman on board, who claimed a balance of wages due and cancellation of his contract of service on the ground that he went in bodily fear of certain members of the crew.

Dr. Greer moved, as a matter of urgency, for an order attaching the S.S. Heath Glen, to found jurisdiction in an action to be brought against the owners by the applicant for the payment of wages. Counsel said that the applicant was a fireman, and he was engaged in Antwerp in August, 1905, for three years. On the same vessel there were two Belgians and a Hollander, and they disliked the petitioner, who was a Greek. One of them violently assaulted the petitioner, and the captain ignored his report. They had repeatedly threatened to kill petitioner, and he feared when the ship went on to the high seas, they would carry out their threats. The applicant was quite willing to carry out his contract, but it was not incumbent upon him to do so. He claimed payment of £24, balance of wages, and cancellation of his contract. The ship was about to leave Table Bay. There was a supporting affidavit from another of the crew, in which he stated that he honestly believed there would be murder on the high seas.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Should not the Court assume that the master is not going to allow this thing to happen. What have the owners got to do with this? Surely a man is not entitled to break his contract if one of his fellow-workmen make a threat.]

Dr. Greer: The petitioner believes he is in danger of his life.

De Villiers, C.J.: I do not think there are grounds for attaching the ship. It is too absurd to think that the captain will allow a thing like this to be carried out. The application must be refused.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

STEWART V. STEWART. { 1906.
 { July 14th.

Dr. Greer moved for a decree of divorce and forfeiture of the benefits of the marriage, in default of defendant's compliance with an order of restitution of conjugal rights.

Order granted as prayed.

RAY V. RAY.

Mr. Benjamin moved for a decree of divorce, in default of defendant's compliance with an order of restitution of conjugal rights.

Rule absolute.

Ex parte SOUTER.

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan moved for a certain rule nisi, authorising payment of certain money to petitioner, to be made absolute. It was stated that the opposition of petitioner's husband had been abandoned.

Rule absolute.

INSOLVENT ESTATE BOTHA V. COETZEE AND SCHNEIDER.

This was an application for an order expunging the objections to certain liquidation and distribution account framed by the applicant as trustee.

Mr. Benjamin said that the objections had now been withdrawn, and he had merely to apply for costs.

Order granted for costs against respondents.

Ex parte QUINN.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for leave to pass transfer of certain property.

Order granted as prayed, subject to any valid objections raised by the Registrar of Deeds to the issue of a certified copy.

DIXON V. DIXON.

Dr. Greer moved, on the petition of Mary Kate Dixon, for an extension of return day of certain rule nisi until the 21st August.

Application granted.

Ex parte CROESER.

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan moved, on the petition of G. J. H. Croeser, on behalf of his minor son, for an order authorising amendment of the minor's name upon a certain deed of transfer of landed property at Malmesbury and registration of a bond of £300 upon the said property. It was stated that the land had been given to the minor by his godfather.

Order granted as prayed, except that petitioner is to act as father and natural guardian, and not as curator ad litem, as set out in the petition.

Ex parte GROENEWALD.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for an order authorising transfer to one Piensaar, of certain property at Graaff Reinet, which was shown on a certain diagram as a street. Counsel said that the ground had never been used as a street since 1822. The Registrar of Deeds took up the position that he could only pass transfer as a street, and not as private property, seeing that it was not specifically mentioned as private property in the order granted by the Court under the Derelict Lands Act. Petitioners said that by prescription he had become the owner.

Order granted authorising transfer of the property without including the term "street."

DE VILLIERS V. PHILPOTT AND OTHERS.

This was an application upon notice of motion for an order invalidating a certain School Board election at Uitenhage.

Mr. Howel Jones (for respondents) said that the notice had not yet been received by the respondents' attorneys in Cape Town. The usual period for allowing service at a place like Uitenhage was seven days, and as a matter of fact service in this case was only on the 9th. Mr. Cloete (for applicant) had informed him that he would raise no objection to the matter standing over until Monday, July 23.

Ordered to stand over accordingly.

INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY V. VILLET.

Mr. Benjamin moved for the removal of respondent's name from the roll of conveyancers by reason of the irregularities disclosed at the third meeting of the creditors in the insolvent estate of Henry Arthur Villet and Manuel Ferreira Villet, trading in Cape Town as Richard Villet, where it appeared that trust moneys had been used for the purpose of speculation. Mr. T. H. Hazell (the trustee), in his affidavit, said that he was authorized at the second meeting to prosecute respondent for fraudulent insolvency. None of the creditors, however, were willing to make the necessary affidavits, and up to the present no further action had been taken.

De Villiers, C.J., asked why no prosecution had been taken. It was, he remarked, most extraordinary that this man was alleged, in fact, to have stolen money, and yet there was no prosecution.

Mr. Benjamin: The matter has been left with the creditors, and they have taken no action. Perhaps if the matter had been brought to the notice of the Attorney-General a prosecution would have been instituted.

De Villiers, C.J.: I suppose somebody will now bring it to the notice of the Attorney-General. The man does not appear to defend, and I suppose he admits that he has been guilty of this act. It is a matter that should come before the Public Prosecutor. An order will be granted for removal of respondent's name from the roll.

Ex parte SILBERMAN.

This was an application for leave to sue in forma pauperis for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce.

Mr. Lewis now produced a further affidavit in proof of domicile.

The matter was ordered to be mentioned before the learned Judge before whom it was mentioned in the first instance.

Ex parte MINNAAR.

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan again mentioned the application of petitioner, a minor residing at Stellenbosch, for an order authorising payment of a sum of £154 odd in the hands of the Master. Counsel now produced an affidavit by a minister in Stellenbosch in support of the application.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte THE COLONIAL TIMBER CO., LTD.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan mentioned the petition of the Colonial Timber Company, Ltd. (Kynana) for leave to reduce the company's capital from £3,500 to £875, by making the 3,500 shares 5s. each, instead of £1 as heretofore. Counsel now produced an affidavit showing that a resolution had been passed by the shareholders to make the necessary alterations in the articles of association. Order granted as prayed.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDOERP.]

MATARE, BRUNS AND CO. { 1906.
V. MOSSEL BAY MUNICIPALITY. { July 16th.

Mr. Searle, K.C. (for the defendant Municipality), applied for a fresh day to be fixed for the trial of this suit before a jury. The case, he said, had been set down for the 21st August, but it was found that a jury trial had already been set down for hearing on the preceding day, and that that case was likely to extend beyond one day. Counsel, therefore, applied for the case to be set down for the 15th August.

Mr. Sutton (for the plaintiffs) acquiesced.

The case was accordingly set down for trial on the 15th August, costs to be costs in the cause.

Ex parte GANIE.

Mr. Roux moved, as a matter of urgency, for an order upon one Lalsan Doovey to place the petitioner in possession of a certain shop, which he had carried on at Salt River, and restore to petitioner the books which had been taken from the premises.

De Villiers, C.J., said that the Court could not grant an order at the present stage.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D).]

FRYER AND CO. V. WELCH. { 1906.
 { July 17th.

This was an application to make absolute a rule nisi calling upon the respondent to show cause why he should not be interdicted from conducting any sale by auction on the stand of applicant firm on the Grand Parade, No. 15, of the Municipal Chart, with costs. Mr. Alexander was for applicants, Harry Fryer and Co.; Dr. Greer was for respondent, Charles Stockford Welch.

Voluminous affidavits having been read,

Mr. Alexander submitted that after the notice which had appeared in the "Cape Times" on the 21st June, at the instance of respondent, stating that the agreement between the applicants and himself had been cancelled, and the evidence contained in the affidavits of his intention on the 23rd June, to hold a sale on the Grand Parade on their stand, they were bound to come into court for an interdict. He inserted an advertisement in the paper, in which he said that the business would be carried on by him, and he did not recognise any liability at all. Now, apparently, according to his own statement, he wanted to sue for breach of agreement, while, according to the advertisement, he had himself broken the agreement. He submitted that it was quite clear that respondent was not a partner of Fryer and Co. There was no question of his being a partner. He was simply a remunerated assistant, and it was quite clear that he had acted on commission. In view of the fact that the rostrum had been placed on the Parade by respondent's instructions, and the statement that he had made to applicants' attorneys, and to various witnesses, the applicants, counsel submitted, were entitled to come to Court and they were now entitled to have the rule made absolute.

Dr. Greer submitted that the grounds which were alleged in the petition upon which the rule was granted had not been clearly made out. It was said that respondent was going to conduct a sale on the Parade at stand 15 on the Saturday, but there was a distinct denial of that by respondent. This rule was granted on the 21st, and yet the Court was asked to confirm that rule upon the strength of something which was alleged to have taken place two days later, when it was said the rostrum was placed on the stand. It seemed that respondent had omitted to give his contractor notice not to take the rostrum there. The respondent said that he was going to adopt a different remedy for the breach of agreement which he said had been committed. Under the circumstances, counsel submitted, applicants had not made out a clear ground for the interdict.

De Villiers, C.J.: It is clear the agreement between the parties that, at the time the applicants engaged the services of the respondent, the applicants were the holders of the stand No. 15 on the Grand Parade. It is clear also, when the agreement was put an end to, not only was notice given by the applicants that the agreement was put an end to, but the respondent himself issues an advertisement to the effect that "the agreement heretofore existing between the undersigned and Messrs. Fryer and Co. has been cancelled," he says, "by me." Well, one would have supposed that the respondent would thereupon have told his contractor in future not to put the rostrum on that stand. Anyhow, we find that the rostrum was again placed there. Now, that in itself was an indication of an intention on the part of the respondent to continue to hold sales upon that stand. Then we have the affidavit of the attorney for the applicants (Mr. W. G. Coulton), who states positively that on the 21st June he met the respondent, when the respondent acknowledged having received the previous letter, but that the respondent further expressed his intention of ignoring the letter, and was determined to conduct the sales upon the stand on Saturday, the 23rd June, and he knew he did so on his own account. That is a definite statement by the attorney for the applicants. The respondent, in his affidavit, denies that statement, and he produces the statements of several witnesses to the effect that the respondent had told them that he did not intend to continue sales on that stand, but statements of that kind cannot counterbalance any statement to the effect that he did intend holding a sale upon the stand. A man is charged with the crime, say, of murder, and witnesses are called to show that he had said he intended to commit the deed. The fact that he has told others that he did not intend to commit the deed cannot affect the question. The respondent may have told some people that he did not intend to carry on the sale, but if he had told others that he did intend, then the ground for the interdict is made out. Now, it is not only Mr. Coulton who makes the statement, but there are other witnesses. In the replying affidavits, amongst others, Ritevsky says: "On the 20th inst., I met Welch on the Parade. He said he intended selling on Fryer's stand on the Saturday on his own account, and would pay out in cash immediately after the sales." It is said what motive could Welch have had in saying this to Ritevsky? That motive is supplied at once, because he says that Welch asked him to give him his sales. After that, by leave of the Court, the respondent was permitted to put in fresh affidavits to answer the new matter. Well, this was new matter, but it is not answered. The only answer is to Bull's statement with regard to the rostrum, but he says nothing with regard to Ritevsky's statement as to the intention to sell on his own account. Upon the whole, therefore, I am satisfied that the respondents have shown good ground for the application. There was an intended breach—at all events, statement of an intended breach—by the respondent of his duty, and, consequently, the applicants were entitled to apply for an interdict. The rule will be made absolute, with costs.

Water—Public perennial stream —Furrow—Right of entry on land of upper riparian proprietor for the purpose of repairing furrow.

This was an action brought by Hendrik Johannes Mulder, M.L.A., and Johannes Jacobus Mulder, against Willem Gerhardus Olivier and others for a declaration in regard to water rights in the Armoed Division of Oudtshoorn, and for £2,000 damages in favour of the first plaintiff, and £1,000 damages in favour of the second.

The declaration was as follows:

1. The plaintiffs are registered owners, together with the defendants other than Willem Gerhardus Olivier, of a certain defined portion of the farm Armoed, situated in Oudtshoorn, and the defendant Olivier, hereinafter styled the defendant, is the registered proprietor of certain other parts of the farm.

2. A public perennial stream, the Kandelars River, flows over the farm, and the parties are riparian owners.

3. Upon the 9th of December, 1880, a certain award of arbitrators was made a rule of Court, to which the parties to this suit, or their predecessors in title, were parties, and by the said award provision was made respecting the use of the water in the river by means of certain watercourses. To avoid prolixity, the plaintiffs do not set forth the terms of the said award, but beg to refer to the same when produced from the records of this Honourable Court.

4. The land of the defendant, hereinafter referred to, is below the lowest watercourse provided for in the award, and the land of the plaintiffs, hereinafter referred to, is situated below that of the defendant.

5. Notwithstanding the provisions in the award concerning the watercourses and the uses of water thereby, a stream of water, capable of common use, flows and has flowed in the river below the lowest watercourse aforesaid.

6. In 1883, the defendant constructed on his land a weir and a furrow, by which he diverted part of the water flowing as aforesaid below the lowest watercourse. The point of intake was at Zeekoegat in the river from which part of the overflow was diverted into the furrow, and used for the irrigation of a small area of land, which was all that was capable of irrigation under the furrow, and the water diverted was only a small proportion of the water at the intake.

7. In 1886, the plaintiff, Hendrik Johannes Mulder, owned, besides other parts of Armoed, lands lying below the aforesaid land of the defendant, but thereafter, upon his wife's death, their joint estate was dissolved, and her heirs became entitled to her half of the estate, including half of the lands. These heirs are the other plaintiff and the defendants other than Willem Gerhardus Olivier.

8. Transfer has been passed to the heirs, and a sub-division has been agreed upon: sub-divisional transfers are being prepared, and all occupy in accordance with such agreement, but the plaintiffs in this action are entitled to all the land belonging to the joint estate below the defendants' land, irrigated from the watercourse hereinafter referred to. The defendants, other than Willem Johannes Olivier, are joined to complete the record in this suit.

9. The defendant continued from 1883 to 1886 to divert and use water as set forth in paragraph 5, and in 1886, the plaintiff, Hendrik Johannes Mulder, on behalf of himself and his successors in title, entered into an agreement with the defendant whereby, for value, the plaintiff acquired, as against the defendant, the right to all the water available at the intake of the furrow, and the defendant further bound himself at all times to permit the weir and furrow to be used for the purpose of diverting and leading water from the river for the use upon the lands of plaintiff, to which he, and the plaintiff, Johannes Jacobus Mulder, are now entitled as aforesaid, and it was also agreed that the plaintiff, Hendrik Johannes Mulder, and his successors in title, should at all times have the right to maintain and repair the weir and furrow as occasion might require.

10. The plaintiff accordingly extended the said furrow on to his land, and up to the year 1892 exercised and enjoyed the rights aforesaid in respect of the weir and furrow on the defendants' land.

11. In 1892 portion of the furrow of defendants' land was washed away, and therefore, in consideration of receiving and enjoying the use of water taken out as aforesaid sufficient to irrigate $1\frac{1}{2}$ morgen of land, the defendant further agreed that the plaintiff might divert the course of the furrow on the defendants' land, and it was diverted accordingly, save as aforesaid the plaintiff retained his rights under the agreement mentioned in paragraph 9, including the right as against the defendant, to all the water available at the intake with the exception of the water sufficient to irrigate the said $1\frac{1}{2}$ morgen of land.

12. In 1903 the defendant acting wrongfully and unlawfully, and in breach of the agreement, by means of a pump, worked by a steam engine placed above the weir, pumped out the water in the river, especially in times of scarcity of water, and used the water to irrigate land not included in the $1\frac{1}{2}$ morgen aforesaid.

13. The method adopted by the defendant was to pump out the water from the Zeekogat so as to keep the water below the level of the overflow from the Zeekoegat into the furrow, and so deprive the plaintiffs wholly of the water which they were entitled to, and the plaintiffs say that thereby the defendant acted wrongfully and unlawfully, and took and used water which he was not entitled to take and use under the agreement.

14. As an alternative and independently of the said agreement, the plaintiffs say that by so taking and using the water as aforesaid, the defendant made an unlawful and unreasonable use thereof, and wrongfully and unlawfully deprived them of the use of the water to which they were entitled.

15. Notwithstanding repeated protests by the plaintiffs, the defendant has continued since 1903 to make such wrongful, unlawful, and unreasonable use of the water by the method indicated in paragraph 13.

16. In July, 1905, the defendant wrongfully and unlawfully caused the furrow on his land to be blocked up with sand and silt, so that the plaintiffs were deprived for a time of the use of the water to which they were entitled.

17. In September, 1905, the furrow was washed away and partly silted up owing to floods, and the defendant wrongfully and unlawfully refused to allow plaintiffs and their servants to repair the same, and prevented them from so doing, whereby the plaintiffs lost the use of water to which they were entitled.

18. By reason of the premises the plaintiffs have sustained damages in the sums of £2,000 and £1,000 respectively, and are entitled to the relief herein-after prayed for.

Wherefore the plaintiffs pray for: (a) A declaration that they and their successors in title are entitled to make use of and keep in repair the said weir, and furrow on, and across the said defendant's land, and to lead water from and across the defendant's said land; (b) a declaration that the said defendant is not entitled to pump water out of the weir as aforesaid, save for the irrigation of the land aforesaid, amounting to $1\frac{1}{2}$ morgen, or, as an alternative to (b); (c) a declaration that the said defendant is not entitled to pump out of the said weir more than a reasonable quantity of water; (d) an interdict restraining the said defendant from violating the rights of the plaintiffs and their successors as declared, or from preventing or interfering with their enjoyment and exercise of the said rights; (e) judgment for £2,000 by way of damages in favour of the plaintiff, Hendrik Johannes Mulder; (f) judgment for £1,000 by way of damages in favour of the plaintiff, Johannes Jacobus Mulder; (g) other relief; (h) costs of suit.

The defendant's plea was as follows:

He admits paragraphs 1 and 3 hereof.

2. As to paragraph 2 thereof, the Kandelaars River flows on to the farm Armoed, and discharges itself into the Olifant's River, on the said farm. The lots belonging to the defendant are riparian to the Kandelaars River, but the lots of the plaintiffs are not, that is, they do not abut upon the river, though they were by the award of 1880 in the water distribution awarded water out of both the servitude furrows.

3. As to paragraph 4 thereof, the defendant's ground is situate below the two servitude dams mentioned in the award, but the two furrows from the said dams flow through his ground. The plaintiffs' lands are situate below the defendant's.

4. As to paragraph 5 thereof, there is, in ordinary seasons, water percolating in the bed of the Kandelaars River below the lowest servitude dam, but in dry seasons there is none. Save as above, he denies paragraph 5 thereof, though he says that at certain times there is surplus water, after he has used what he requires.

5. As to paragraph 6 thereof, the furrow called the Klein Sloodje was constructed by the defendant about 1883. The dam was partly on the defendant's ground, and partly on the ground of one C. J. Nortje, and he (defendant) diverted there all the water that there was at that spot, except in case of floods. The intake was at a deep pool or "Zeekoegat," but this has now disappeared. In ordinary seasons there was usually not enough water to fill the furrow. Save as above, he denies the allegations in paragraph 6.

6. As to paragraph 7 hereof, at the date of the agreement in paragraph 8 hereof referred to, the plaintiff Hendrik Johannes Mulder owned one lot of ground, a portion of which could be irrigated by means of the Klein Sloopje, but thereafter he acquired certain other lots from E. F. Olivier and P. J. S. Meiring. Save as above, he admits paragraph 7 thereof.

7. As to paragraph 8 thereof, he has no knowledge, and craves leave to refer to such proof thereof as plaintiffs may adduce.

8. About the year 1884, in consideration of four head of cattle handed over by the plaintiff H. J. Mulder to the defendant, the defendant agreed to allow to flow down to the plaintiff such surplus water in the Klein Sloopje, if any, as he (the defendant) did not require. The furrow was then about 3 feet wide, and the defendant informed the plaintiff, as part of the arrangement, that it should not be made wider, but that the surplus water as aforesaid could be made use of by the plaintiff and his children after him. It was agreed that both plaintiff and defendant should contribute men to clear the furrow, and that defendant should make a gate to enter by, and plaintiff should make two stiles, which, however, plaintiff failed to do. Save as above, he denies paragraph 9 thereof.

9. He denies paragraph 10 thereof. The plaintiff did widen the furrow, but without having any right so to do, and without the defendant's consent, and in spite of defendant's objection thereto. In consequence of the widening of the furrow, the furrow has been damaged and broken by flood water, and portions of it entirely washed away.

10. He denies paragraph 11 thereof.

11. As to paragraphs 12 and 13 thereof, he admits that he, without objection on the part of the plaintiff, erected a pump in or about the year 1897, and used the same for three years and a half, until his horses were taken away under martial law, and about 1903 he erected another pump, and used all the water obtained by means of pumping whenever he liked, but in or about September, 1905, the pool disappeared, owing to the very heavy floods, which caused much damage to the river and its banks. Save as above, he denies the paragraphs.

12. As to paragraphs 14 and 15 thereof, he denies plaintiff's right to make the claim alleged, or that he has made any unreasonable use of water, and says that the ground which the plaintiff H. J. Mulder acquired from Meiring, and upon which he claims to lead the water from the Klein Sloopje, was not given out in the sub-division as arable land, but as "veld," and that the other ground for which the said right is claimed was arable land, to be irrigated according to the said award of 1880, from the servitude furrow therein mentioned. Save as above, he denies the paragraphs. All the ground for which water is claimed by plaintiff out of the Klein Sloopje is now irrigated out of the sloop called Brak Sloop.

13. As to paragraph 16 thereof he admits that in July, 1905, he blocked up the furrow, but at the time of the blocking the water in the furrow was flowing into the Kandelaars River through a breach in the furrow higher up than where the furrow was blocked and no damage was caused by the furrow being blocked. Save as above, he denies the paragraph, and says that it was not owing to the blocking of the furrow that the said breach was caused.

14. As to paragraph 17 thereof he admits that in September, 1905, the furrow was partly washed away and silted up, and that he objected to the plaintiff entering upon his (defendant's) ground to execute repairs to, or to relay the furrow without notice, and without any arrangement having first been come to between himself and plaintiff as to the manner of executing such work. Plaintiff claimed the right to come thus upon defendant's ground which defendant denied. Save as above he denies the paragraph. A portion of the Klein Sloopje cannot now be constructed upon the old site unless it be made about 30 feet wide and defendant objects to such width and also to the manner in which defendant throws silt on to the banks of the furrow.

15. He denies the allegations in paragraph 18 or that plaintiffs have sustained any damage for which he (the defendant) is responsible.

16. The said furrow was destroyed by an act of God or vis major, namely, excessive floods, for which defendant is not responsible, but defendant is willing to abide by the terms of the agreement made with the plaintiff H. J. Mulder as in paragraph 8 hereof set forth, provided that the furrow can be reconstructed on the same spot without damaging defendant's property, and provided that it is not constructed to a greater width than three feet.

Wherefore he prays that plaintiffs' claims may be dismissed, with costs. For a claim in reconvention the defendant, now plaintiff, in reconvention says:

17. He craves leave to refer to the matters above pleaded.

18. By reason of the defendant in reconvention H. J. Mulder, having widened the said furrow on the ground of plaintiff in reconvention, thrown the soil therefrom on the lucerne lands and damaged them, cut down branches and dug into a portion of the ground of plaintiff in reconvention and under his licence and otherwise damaged his property he has suffered loss and damage in the sum of £500.

Wherefore the plaintiff in reconvention claims: (a) The sum of £500 as damages; (b) alternative relief; (c) costs of suit.

The replication was general.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Sir H. Juta, K.C.) for plaintiffs. Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Mr. Howes) for the first defendant.

Mr. Schreiner said that there were seven defendants in the case, and six were joined formally to complete the record. Of the defendants, five had been barred, and nothing was prayed against the sixth, counsel holding a consent paper on behalf of defendant number 4. Counsel said that it would be an interesting point as to whether a man could take water out of a public perennial stream by artificial means, and continue to take it to ground where it would not flow in the ordinary course of gravity.

Hendrik Johannes Mulder, M.L.A., first plaintiff in the suit, stated that in the scarce time the furrow took out continuously all the water. He was not aware that the defendant between 1886 and 1892 irrigated any of his ground under the Kleinslootje. In 1892 part of the suit on the defendant's land got washed away, and a deviation was necessary. It was agreed that the sluit was to be relayed farther away from the river, and the defendant was to have some of the water for his irrigation, but he had to supply some of the men to help in the reconstruction. Except on one occasion the defendant failed to contribute towards the work. The first pump was not so effective as the second one erected by the defendant. The first pump did not do witness any actual damage, but the second one, which was constructed in 1903, was of a different complexion, and witness, when he returned—the pump had been erected during his absence—most strongly objected to it. Immediately after that, witness took advice at once on his legal position.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: He denied that he said he had no right to turn out the Kleinslootje, and that Olivier, if he chose, could close the dams. Witness's son was an invalid, and was not able to manage his own affairs. Witness took up the position that the defendant must not pump the water at all out of the river.

Jacob Cornelius Breytenbach, J.C.'s son, farmer, Oudtshoorn district, stated that in 1886 he was working on the plaintiff's ground, which was watered by the Klein Sluitje. He was there when the Klein Sluitje was extended. Before that time the defendant had taken out the sluit. Witness drew the plaintiffs' attention to the defendants' suit. The defendants' furrow was from one to two foot wide, and witness worked at widening it. The defendants did not give any men to assist in the work. On Olivier's ground he worked to make it the same width as on the plaintiff's ground. The defendant did not offer any objection to witness widening the sluit. Twice in the time witness was there the water did not reach him.

Abram Reintjes having given evidence,

Jacob Cornelius Breytenbach, A.'s son, farmer, was called. He said that he had known the Klein Sluitje ever since it was made. It was taken out from a dam just below the Zeekoegat. The water to the Zeekoegat came from fountains right up towards witness's house. When the water to the Zeekoegat got a certain height, it overflowed. It always flowed over the road. After the Klein Sluitje was made, he spoke to Mr. Olivier about his receiving certain oxen from Mr. Mulder. Mr. Olivier told him that he had exchanged oxen with Mr. Mulder. In consideration of the latter giving him young oxen, Mr. Olivier let him have certain of the water. At that time things were very bad in Oudtshoorn. Money was scarce, and produce and feathers were cheap. It would not cost much to make a furrow such as they had there. After the exchange between Mulder and Olivier, he saw the sluit when it was widened from the road. The sluit was now about 4 or 5 feet wide, about the same width as he saw it after the exchange had been effected between Mulder and Olivier. In January, 1905, witness was asked to take particular note of the pump working on the Zeekoegat above the road. The portion where the road was pumped dry. While the pumping was going on no water was going down the Klein Sluitje. None of the land above the Klein Sluitje could be irrigated from the Klein Sluitje, for the reason that the ground was too high. In August last, on going to the dam, he found that the watercourse had been blocked up. The water could not run well, as there was about a foot of soil in the course. The water ran over a little below the intake. If the sluit had been properly cleaned all the water could have come down that day. On the 28th May this year, on going to the spot again, he found that the sluit was still in order, but in some places the bank had been washed away. He had not at any time found the sluit wider than four or five feet. Witness spoke to the cleaning of the water sluit, and denied that any damage was done to Mr. Olivier's land, stating that the material was put on the banks. Witness had been sued in the Circuit Court by Willem Andries Olivier for £500 damages for going on to his land to inspect. Witness tendered £3, and Magistrate Court costs. Judgment was given for that amount, and the plaintiff in that case was ordered to pay the costs. The Klein Sluitje would bring a good deal of water down if left undisturbed. Mr. Mulder's ground was good for lucerne and ostriches. Last year witness made, out of a little less than a morgen of ground, by lucerne, £36 13s. 3d.; he pressed the lucerne, and cut it three times. The average amount that one could get from a morgen of land was about £25 worth of lucerne, and they could also run ostriches on the ground. In the Oudtshoorn district they had a plucking and a half a year from the ostriches. The average value of a plucking would be about £4 per bird. Feathers were making good prices this year. After two years they could pluck the birds three times a year. When he had gone up the sluit, he had found that Olivier's land irrigated from the pump was fine, but Mr. Mulder's land was dry. It was possible to put the bank of the sluit right again without going 30 feet on to Olivier's ground; there would be no particular difficulty in putting it right again. The dam would present no difficulty; a couple of people could put the dam right in a few minutes.

Cross-examined: Witness was not aware that there was anything between himself and Mr. Olivier as a result of the Circuit Court action. He had not seen places where the silt had been taken out of the sluit and thrown upon Mr. Olivier's ground. He did not know that it would be necessary to make the sluit deeper than before. He did not think that, if the sluit had to be constructed, it would be necessary to take it 5 feet deep on Mr. Olivier's ground. He could put the sluit right, and make a dam wall, not above 2 feet 6 in. high, and yet enable Mr. Olivier to lead out water to his land. He had had no personal experience of this sluit.

V. Rhede, farmer, and part owner of Armoed, stated he was on good terms with both the parties to the suit. In 1887 witness and his father worked some of the plaintiffs' ground under the Kleinsloutje. The sluit at present was the same width as in 1887. Witness used to clean the sluit, and went right up to where the dam was. The defendant's people had never helped him. In March last year he inspected the plaintiffs' lands, and found them dry. There was nothing growing. The lands that the defendant irrigated with the pump were good in March of last year. The pump was worked in March and May of last year, with the result that no water came down to the plaintiffs. The stream that he saw running he estimated from nine to twelve inches. In February he inspected the extent of land of the plaintiffs and the defendant, and agreed with what the witness Breytenbach had said.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: With six inches of water, he could irrigate about a morgen a day. The ground was not cultivated before he came there in 1887. He did not ask the defendant's men to clean the furrow. As far as he could see, the flood had not washed out the bed of the sluit. To repair the furrow, it was not necessary to encroach upon the defendant's land.

Re-examined by Sir H. Juta: About three times a year he irrigated.

Andries Louwrens van der Westerhuizen stated that from 1887 to 1889 he occupied lot 43, which was sold to the plaintiff. Cornelius Breytenbach irrigated land from the water out of the sluit. When the defendant worked the oil pump on the 3rd March, he had a nice flow of water, but nothing went down to the plaintiffs' land. Last year, from his 60 morgen, witness sold 100,000 lb. of lucerne at 4s. a 100 lb., and the ostrich pluckings were each worth between £5 and £6.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: In March, 1905, there was a stream of about nine inches on the Zeekoegat. In May this year there was a good stream of water in the river. Witness crossed below the dams "a" and "c," and there was no water. Witness was a tenant under Mr. Mulder. Mr. Mulder asked him to go and make an inspection of the sluit.

Re-examined: Witness paid £200 a year to Mr. Mulder as rent, but with the earnings from his land, he had no difficulty in paying his rent, and he was not indebted to Mr. Mulder. Witness had often acted as arbitrator in water cases in the Oudtshoorn district.

Cornelis Michiel Johannes Breytenbach, farmer, said that he formerly lived at Armoed. In 1894 he was there with Mr. Andries Olivier (defendant's son), who was then farming Mr. Mulder's land, which took water from the Klein Sluitje. In 1898 he went to Mr. Olivier, sen., and, after remaining with him for a year, he returned to Mr. Olivier's son, with whom he lived until 1904. Mr. Olivier, jun., had most of the ground, and he used most of the water. Piet van der Westhuyzen also had land, and he took some of the water from the sluitje. Witness had cleaned the furrow on several occasions, but he had never seen anybody else clean it except those interested in Mr. Mulder's ground. While he was with defendant he did not irrigate on the land below from the Klein Sluitje. He only once took water from that sluit for defendant's land. Andries Olivier (defendant's son) stopped him from leading water on to his father's land. After the oil pump had been put up, there was no water in the Klein Sluitje, all the water being taken away. The water thus taken out did not come back to the Klein Sluitje, but went to other ground, keeping that land in a good and flourishing condition. The pump was often worked in the summer months. It took the water out of the Zeekoegat, so as to dry the road. Witness considered that Mr. Mulder's ground was, on an average, as good and valuable as that at Zeekoegat, except for the water. He was employed by Lipschitz and Co., and superintended about 1,800 ostriches.

Cross-examined: Witness had no ground now that he farmed in his own account. While he had ground under Mr. Andries Olivier witness became insolvent. He was not on good terms with Mr. Olivier, because he thought the latter was, to some extent, to blame. Witness had had an ostrich camp between the Zeekoegat and the Oliphant's River, but during that time he did not take water from the Klein Sluitje, but from the brak sluitje. During the time he was there, he never saw Mr. Willem Olivier's men cleaning the sluit. While he was with Andries Olivier, there were no complaints of an insufficiency of water. He remembered on one occasion he took away 140 ostriches or more to the grass veld in the George district. At that time they had no water on the farm. It was not correct that every season they had difficulty about water in the Klein Sluitje.

Re-examined: Witness took away the ostriches in 1896. That was an exceptionally dry year. In winter time the birds were usually kept in the veld. Apart from that year, the land Andries Olivier had from Mr. Mulder was good ground, and the ostriches used to thrive.

Saul Peterson, of Oudtshoorn, said he was formerly in Mr. Ockert Oliver's service at Armoed. Mr. Ockert farmed ground of his own, and also ground owned by Mr. Hendrik Mulder. He was with Mr. Ockert about 1893 or 1894, and stayed in his service three years. Mr. Ockert used the Klein Sluitje for the land he hired from Mr. Mulder. Witness used to work at the furrow, look after the water-leading, and clean the furrow. Mr. Willem Olivier's people did not attend to the cleaning of the furrow. When the furrow was deviated, Mr. Willem Olivier's people worked at it, but that was the only time he had seen them working there.

Cross-examined: Mr. Willem Olivier's people might have worked at the furrow some time when witness had not seen them.

James Alex. Foster, M.L.A., said that he was an attorney, practising at Oudtshoorn, and he was the plaintiff's local attorney in this matter. He was consulted by the plaintiff about the end of 1903 or the beginning of 1904. He had to leave Oudtshoorn to be in Cape Town for the session of Parliament in February, 1904, and he did not return to Oudtshoorn until July. Between July and the end of that year he made efforts to bring about a settlement between the parties. They were both friends of his, and he tried to effect an amicable settlement. Witness kept the minutes of two meetings of certain heirs, which had been put in. He had no recollection of any mention at the meetings, on the part of Mr. Mulder, of the Klein Sluitje. It was not until after Mr. Olivier had erected his oil pump that witness took action, in 1903 or 1904.

Mr. Searle: Mr. Andries Olivier says that he would not sign, and that you brought him back to sign, because he refused to do so on account of this matter of the Klein Sluitje.

Witness: If that is what he says, I will go so far as to say that it is not so. An incident like that I should well remember.

[Maasdorp, J.: What was that?]

Witness: That Andries Olivier would not sign because the water had not been distributed, and that I forced him to sign.

Mr. Searle: No, no; he says that he showed reluctance in the matter.

Witness: That I do not remember. I think it is extremely improbable, because I should remember a matter like that.

Mr. Schreiner closed his case.

Willem Gerhardus Olivier (defendant) stated he had land on the Kandelars River, besides that which was shown on the plan. Shortly after the award of 1880 he made the dam, and took out the furrow called the Klein Sluitje. The dam he made was about 10 or 12 yards below the road. In the first instance, the morgen and a half was cultivated from the dam. In some years the pool was very low. After the furrow was constructed, he made an arrangement with the plaintiff. The plaintiff came to witness's house, and said it seemed to him that the water was good, and he asked for surplus water, which was allowed, the plaintiff promising four young oxen. Witness made a condition that the sluit should remain as large as it was then, and no other person was to have anything to do with it but witness, plaintiff, and their children. The plaintiff said to witness that he (witness) could turn the water into the river, and witness replied: "If I do so, you can cut my throat." He had used the water from the Klein Sluitje from 1882 until the present, and used it on different lands. After the arrangement was made with the plaintiff, witness had kept the furrow in order up to 1891, except when the plaintiff came to widen it. Everyone of the farmers knew that there was not much use to be got of the "dead" water. It was in 1892 that the furrow was widened for the first time, and witness asked the plaintiff for an explanation, but the plaintiff merely shrugged his shoulders and made no reply. Witness's people repaired the dam when it was broken. The furrow, which was 4 feet wide, was now 7 feet, and the widening of it had encroached on witness's land. Part of the sluit was washed away, and that was the cause of the widening of the furrow. He believed it was in 1887 that witness and the plaintiff took out the Braksluit, which was their best sluit. When the plaintiff first spoke to him about the water, there was only a small piece of land under cultivation. There was a better stream of water where the Kandelars ran into the Oliphant's than at the Kleinsluitje. In March, 1899, he placed a pump near the dam, which he worked with horses. For about two years he worked the pump. Martial law was then proclaimed, and as the military took his horses, he had to cease working. There was never any objection offered to this pump by the plaintiff. If his horses had not been taken away he would have continued to work the pump, and he preferred it to the oil pump, which was not always in order. In 1903 he put the oil pump near the river on David Olivier's ground, which was higher up than the first pump. The reason it was fixed higher up was because there was no other suitable place. From the pump he watered lands that he could and could not have irrigated from the Klein Sluitje. The water he pumped out was too weak to be led on to the plaintiff's lands. Supposing witness took none of the Klein Sluitje water, the plaintiff could barely water ten morgen in a good year. In February, 1904, the plaintiff came to witness's house and objected to the pump, because he said it was taking his water. The working of the pump was very unsatisfactory at first.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He pumped out seven inches, and he knew that the water down below was only three inches. Immediately after the arrangement with the plaintiff the sluit was not widened. In 1892, for the first time, the sluit was widened. Both the parties were experienced irrigators. He did not feel aggrieved because the plaintiff gave him two Grasveld oxen instead of Transvaal oxen; he thought it rather queer. Witness sued Bretenbach in the Circuit Court for £500 damages for trespassing on his ground. The defendant tendered £3 and Magistrate's Court costs, which was all was allowed. Witness had to pay the other costs. Bretenbach came at the instance of Mulder to inspect witness's property. As to the widening of the sluit, witness protested to one of the plaintiff's men. That was in June, July, and August, 1892. The plaintiff kept on increasing the width of the sluit. In 1891 there was a heavy rain that washed away part of the sluit. The plaintiff never consulted him about deviating the sluit, and at that time he was on good terms with the plaintiff. Witness could not explain to the Court why the plaintiff should adopt such a strange course. When witness complained the plaintiff said: "What is it; I have the rights." Eight years ago the plaintiff suggested that in partnership a pump should be put up, and witness offered no objection to the plaintiff putting up one for himself. After that witness erected the pump, and the plaintiff never raised any objection. If the plaintiff had complained, witness would have left the pump at once. If the plaintiff had objected to the oil pump before it was erected, witness would not have erected it. The plaintiff had no opportunity of knowing that the pump was going to be erected. If the plaintiff paid him the expenses of the pump, he was willing to submit to an order of the Court that he must not pump any more. If the plaintiff had kept cool, that arrangement might have been come to. Of the pair witness was the cooler. The deviation of the furrow was carried out before the widening.

Maasdorp, J., then suggested that some arrangement might be come to, as it was a pity to see people at law who had been on the best of terms all their lives.

Mr. Schreiner: And closely connected by marriage. The Brak Sluit had not been repaired since 1895, and he attributed the inaction of the parties interested to the dispute. The first pump was as effective as the second one. Sandy soil was fearfully bad for lucerne. Even if you had water, the wind blew the sand over the lucerne, and prevented its growth. The ten morgen which his son purchased for £2,800 was better ground than that of witness or the plaintiff. He could not say whether J. J. Mulder was in good health or not; he had heard from Mulder's wife that Mulder suffered from epilepsy. Witness did not recently try to get Mulder to sign a document in connection with this case. He did not know that Mulder was a man of weak mind, or that his father managed his affairs. Witness and plaintiff had to work together on the watercourse, but the latter would not condescend to speak to witness with regard to a sluit. The deviation was made without witness's consent.

Re-examined by Mr. Searle: It would be impossible to put the furrow in order without taking a great deal of witness's ground to make the embankments. Mr. J. J. Mulder was able to talk sensibly about things. There had been an alteration in the level of the river above the Kleinsluitje dam, owing to the last flood, the effect of which was to make it more level above the Kleinsluitje dam. The widening of the furrow was commenced in 1892, and finished in 1894.

Andries Hermanus Olivier, son of the defendant, and a son-in-law of the plaintiff, said he was born and brought up on Armoed, and was thoroughly acquainted with the farm. He had been Field-Cornet of the district since martial law. He was a school-boy when the Kleinsluitje was taken out in 1883. In 1885, before the flood, the ground on the left-hand side was then irrigated from water from the Kleinsluitje. In 1891 and 1892 he had water from the Brak Sluit, sluit C, sluit A, and also from the Kleinsluitje. His father turned off the whole water from the Kleinsluitje whenever he liked. Several times witness conversed with the plaintiff about the Kleinsluitje, and suggested a servitude, as a man who worked on it deserved to get the water. In ordinary summers the water from the Kleinsluitje would not reach these lands. In times of scarcity it would require about twelve inches to be of any service to eight or ten morgen. He remembered the first pump being placed in 1899, and the water it took out could have been of no use to witness, whose farm was below. From March, 1901, after martial law had been proclaimed for a period of a year and nine months, he was unable to get any water on his land from the Kleinsluitje.

Cross-examined: Witness had not sought to make it appear that there was very little water in the Kleinsluitje. The Brak Sluit was the best sluit in the Oudtshoorn district in the summer months. In summer the Kleinsluitje had not water which was worth having. His brother Jan had about eleven morgen under the Kleinsluitje. Mr. Mulder had got, under the Kleinsluitje, about 20 morgen, and his son Jan got about 11 morgen. From 1902 witness farmed practically all the ground under the Kleinsluitje. After 1902 he told his father-in-law that his (witness's) father kept the water a long time on his ground. His father-in-law had then been complaining to him because they did not irrigate the land. Witness considered that his father had the right to use the water on the land where he was using it. He had heard his father say that the sluit was constantly being widened. The widening in 1902 was done by Mr. Ockert Olivier. His father did not complain to him about the men who cleaned the sluit digging under his hedge, and constantly widening the sluit. Some of the widening was done by his men. During 1902 witness had cut part of the hedge away on his father's property in order to widen the Kleinsluitje. His father did not make any complaint to him, but a complaint was brought by Van der Westhuysen. He had never since widened the sluit as he did in 1902. When witness began to farm in 1891 his father-in-law gave him land and about 60 ostriches. In 1901 witness did not make so much money as he had done during some years. He had earned enough to make a living. He had bought land in 1897 or 1898. Witness used to clean the sluitje right up to the dam twice a year.

Re-examined: Witness heard no objection to his using the water from the Kleinsluitje up to 1901. His father-in-law had told him that his father had a right to the water from the sluitje. He had never heard his father-in-law raise the case that he had the right to come and stop his (witness's) father from leading water out of the sluitje.

Philip Rudolf van der Westhuysen (son-in-law of the defendant Olivier) said that during the last four years there had not been enough water in the sluitje to irrigate even the three morgen or land of his father. It was not often there was a depth of more than six inches in the sluitje in the dry season. Witness spoke as to the damage done to the banks of the sluitje by flood.

Cross-examined: Formerly he used to lead water every year from the Kleinsluitje to the land on the left, but recently it was difficult to do so, owing to the sluit being washed out, although it was not impossible to lead water on the left. During 1897 and 1898 was the last time he had led water on the left. With seven or eight inches of water in the winter time, he could irrigate the land on the left, as well as that on the right. The digging out of the sluit was bad business for both the plaintiffs and the defendant. Ockert Olivier commenced the widening of the sluit. He knew of times when the water did not run into the Kleinsluitje before he pumped. Between October and April the water of the Kleinsluitje was too weak for his father or Mr. Mulder. That was since 1892. The Zeekoegat was still deep enough in parts for a horse to swim in.

Re-examined by Mr. Searle: When he came there in 1890 he could see that lands on the left-hand side, looking down the Kleinsluitje, had been cultivated. He could not remember pumping the water when it would have been strong enough to reach the plaintiffs' lands. In ordinary summer times the water would not run down the Kleinsluitje to the plaintiffs' lands. The pumps were not erected with the intention of irrigating the whole, but only pieces near the homestead. If he used the oil pump all the day, it would cost him £1 10s.

W. G. Olivier, son of the defendant, stated that he formerly worked a portion of the ground now belonging to John Mulder, for which the plaintiffs claimed the water. The plaintiff told witness that he must get the water from the Kleinsluitje or the Brak Sluit; but in the case of the former, he was only entitled to the surface water. He could not now get enough water from the Kleinsluitje to work this land—the water sank into the vlei.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: The crops on the land were bad before he took it, and Bretenbach, the former owner, told witness, if he could get water from another sluit, he might get something in a good year.

Joseph M. Puren, farmer, of Armoed, stated that he hired a portion of land for five years, which he cultivated in 1903, from John Mulder. That was the piece of ground called lot 5. He was to get his water from the Brak Sluit, and he arranged that, by written contract from John Mulder. He was not to get any water out of the Kleinsluitje. He could not get water enough to cultivate the ground. When he complained to John Mulder, the latter said he must speak to the plaintiff about the surplus water in the Kleinsluitje. The plaintiff said he had no permanent water to give, and that the witness must see Andries Olivier. Mr. H. Muller said the water in the Kleinsluitje was only a "permission" water. During the time witness was there, the defendant turned off the water from the Kleinsluitje when he liked. Witness never had a turn in the Kleinsluitje water. He had a fair supply from the Brak Sluit. The Kleinsluitje when it came down came in small streams. When there were no pumping operations, he tried to irrigate some potatoes with water from the Kleinsluitje, but found it insufficient. The water from the Kleinsluitje disappeared in the sandy soil, and the defendant shut it off when he liked. On the instructions of Mr. Hendrik Muller, he excavated on the defendants' land to get the water from the dam. Shortly after the flood witness was asked by the plaintiff to repair it, but found that he was unable to do so. He saw the bushes thrown on the lucerne grounds of the defendant. The furrow could not be reconstructed without doing much damage to the defendants' ground, because the furrow would have to be remade in new places, and that would encroach on the defendants' land. When he went there in 1903, there was no lucerne on his ground. That piece of ground could not keep six ostriches alive.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: With twelve years' knowledge of the ground, he hired it, and expected to get something out of it. Year after year he had seen the crops destroyed by the wind, and yet he hired it. He got the ground fairly cheap, and took it to grow lucerne for his ostriches. He never had any right of water out of the Kleinsluitje. He did not know that the others had turns at the Kleinsluitje.

He had a right out of the Kleinsluitje, but he had to find out what the right was. Mr. Hendrik Muller told him, if he could get water out of the Kleinsluitje, they would have to divide it among themselves. When he hired the ground, John Mulder said he had 24 hours' right from the Brak Sluit, and a little right out of the Kleinsluitje, but he could not say how much out of the latter.

Re-examined by Mr. Searle: When he went to see Mr. Hendrik Mulder about the water coming from the Kleinsluitje dam, the plaintiff said he had no permanent right in that water, but the water Mr. Olivier allowed to come down, they would have to divide among one another.

By His Lordship: The water in the Kleinsluitje was also weak in winter time. Down in his lands they got no water. If there was a thunderstorm, the water might come down for a day or so, but it quickly disappeared. There was no quantity of water in the Kleinsluitje summer or winter.

Further evidence was given on behalf of the defendant by Herculaas Petrus Olivier, Carl Meiring, Nicholas Louwrens Fouche, Petrus Johannes Stefanus Meiring, and Frans Thomas Snygan. The evidence was principally directed to showing the condition of the Klein Sluitje. It was stated that the sluit was washed away so that a stranger was unable to find it in some parts. The level of the ground was 1 ft. 4 in. above the level of the intake.

H. Snyman, cross-examined by Sir H. Juta, said that he had been a day labourer, employed by Mr. H. J. Mulder, and he had been allowed a piece of land.

Sir H. Juta: It would not matter very much whether you got water or not?—No answer.

They were all using the water out of the Klein Sluitje?—Yes.

So that they did not give you much?—Yes, they gave me also a turn, to lead a few days.

You had to get what they would give you?—Yes, they did not give me a turn. Mr. Mulder did not say I could have a turn.

You just had to get what you could get?—Yes.

Mr. Searle closed his case subject to certain evidence taken on commission.

Maasdorp, J., said that he would read over the evidence taken on commission.

Mr. Schreiner said that certain facts were common cause between the parties. They were:

(a) The Kandelaar's River was a public perennial stream.

(b) In 1883 the defendant took water out of the lower end of the Zeekoegat.

(c) At a subsequent date the plaintiff acquired for value rights against the defendant in respect of the Klein Sloopje.

(d) Afterwards there was a deviation of the furrow by Willem Rooiberg, the water fiscal.

(e) The plaintiff caused the furrow to be widened.

(f) The plaintiff had for many years used the water from the Klein Sloopje.

(g) That the water flowing into the Zeekoegat became weaker in the summer months.

(h) When the defendant was not pumping water out of the Zeekoegat he still laid claim to irrigate his land out of the Klein Sloopje, in preference to the plaintiff's land.

(i) The defendant blocked up the Klein Sloopje in July, 1905.

(j) In September, 1905, a flood occurred, which damaged the oil pump and washed away the Klein Sloopje, and Mulder's men were prevented by Olivier from repairing it.

Upon those facts he said that he was justified, without going further into the case, in asking for judgment for the plaintiff. The first controversial point was, was there an agreement between the parties in 1892? Olivier did use water out of the Klein Sloopje before and after 1892, but he had no right to do so after the deviation. The evidence and the probabilities were all in favour of an agreement having been come to in 1892. The deviation of the furrow must have been made with the consent and approval of Olivier. The plaintiff had a right to the water from the Klein Sloopje, not merely a right to lead water. Counsel quoted from Farnham on Water and Watercourses (vol. II, pp. 1784 and 1718). The grantor could do nothing to prevent the grantee's enjoyment of the privilege granted. He cited Farnham (vol. III, pp. 2223, 2224, 2235, 2240), and 25, American Reports, p. 125.

Proceeding, Mr. Schreiner said that where a servitude was granted every right incidental to that servitude was also granted—Voet, (8-4-16), Wolfaardt v. Pienaar (C.L.J., vol. I, p. 345), Maasdorp (vol. II, pp. 168, 169), Grotius (2-35-13), 1 Menzies, p. 465, Nathan (vol. I, p. 456). These authorities would indicate the position the plaintiff took up in regard to his right to go on to the land of the defendant to repair the furrow.

Mr. Searle, for the defendant, did not admit that there was no dispute about the ten points which Mr. Schreiner said were common cause. Independently of agreement, the plaintiff had made out no right to the use of the water from the Zeekoegat, because the plaintiff's land was not riparian to the Kandelaa's River at all. Counsel referred to the case of Olivier v. Fourie (9 C.T.R., 309). The real point in the case was, what was the contract between the parties?

He also quoted the case of Lipchits

v. Ferreira (16 C.T., p. 122), and Voet (8, 6, 4).

Mr. Schreiner, in reply, quoted Van Schaikryk v. Haumann (14 S.C., 214), Roberts v. Geynfui District Council (81 L.T., 465), Maasdorp (Vol. II., p. 219).

Cur. Adr. Vult.

Postea (August 30th).

Maasdorp, J.: The main question in dispute between the parties to this case is with regard to their respective rights to the use of a certain furrow, and the water conveyed thereby from the Vandelaar River. It is admitted that these rights depend upon the terms of a contract entered into between them, with respect to which there is a very strong conflict of evidence. This conflict is of such a character that if I had nothing to guide me but the number of witnesses on either side, and the position and character of these witnesses, I should have had great difficulty in deciding between them. But it seems to me that the conduct of the parties during the many years that they worked under the conditions of the contract throws a strong light upon the true character of the agreement. The plaintiff claims that at the time of the grievance complained of, there was an agreement in existence between himself and the defendant whereby it was agreed that they should have the common use of a furrow leading water over the defendants' land from the Vandelaars River, and a joint reasonable use of the water conveyed by the furrow upon such of their lands as can be irrigated by means of this furrow. The defendant, on the other hand, alleges that it was agreed between them that for a consideration to be given by the plaintiff he should allow to the plaintiff the use of his furrow to convey on to his land such water as the defendant did not require for his own use, called the surplus water. I shall endeavour to ascertain first what the circumstances were under which the agreement was made. It appears that in about the year 1880 the farm Armoed, of which the lands of the plaintiff and defendant form portions, was divided by arbitration between the several owners, and water led by means of furrows from the rivers passing through the farm, was assigned for the use of the various sub-divisions. Amongst others, two dams were placed in the upper part of the Vandelaars River, in such a position as to divert by means of two water-courses all the water that was practically available for the irrigation of the farm from that source. I am satisfied that if there were any considerable flow of water in the Vandelaars River below the dams available upon the farm, the arbitrators would have found means of turning it to some use. On the other hand, it has been proved that as the result of percolations from the banks, and ooziings and small springs in the bed of the river, a stream is gradually formed below the dams until it assumes useful proportions by the time it reaches the upper corner of the land of defendant, which abuts upon the Vandelears River. This water, after passing through the deeper reaches of the stream, is at that point obstructed by the natural formation of the land, and rises there in such a way as to become available for use upon the land of the defendant. The defendant, observing this, made a dam across the river, and constructed a furrow three feet wide and one foot deep to lead water on to land suitable for the purpose, which, at the highest estimate, did not exceed three and a half morgen. The defendant says that after he had made the furrow he found that he could only get a small portion of ground irrigated under it, and for some time it was used principally for a little garden made by an old servant of his. The main difficulty of the defendant, after he had completed the furrow, was not in respect of the quantity of water, but the levels of his ground, and he had no means of diverting the water from the river at a higher level. Upon the evidence I come to the conclusion that by means of the furrow in question a fair quantity of water could be obtained from the river during portions of ordinary seasons, and that at times it would become so weak as to be of little use; then, again, in times of freshets, which might be expected annually, the water passing over the upper dams in the river would flow in considerable quantities down the furrow, and would be sufficient to irrigate much larger areas of land than were available on the defendant's ground. I am satisfied that the defendant felt that it was the want of land under the furrow rather than the want of water in the furrow during the course of the year, that prevented it being worth his while to concern himself much about the furrow. It was under these circumstances that the plaintiff, who knew that a good deal of land belonging to him could be irrigated from this water-course, came to interview the defendant. I wish, however, first to make this clear, that I am not influenced much in my decision by the evidence with regard to the weakness of the stream in the dry seasons, of which so much has been made by the defendant, as I am of opinion that during some portions of every year a pretty considerable stream could be taken by the furrow on to the plaintiff's land. The plaintiff states that when he made the first agreement with the defendant, the latter thought so little of the stream that for a consideration he gave up the whole use of it to the plaintiff, whereas the defendant states that he only sold to the plaintiff what he did not require himself. As I have said, this question must be decided by the subsequent conduct of the parties. I think it has been proved that immediately after the agreement the plaintiff set about improving the furrow, and constantly, wherever it was necessary, he sent his men on to the defendant's land to clean and repair the furrow, and that, although it may be quite true that the old Hottentot who used some of the water for a little garden on the defendant's ground did at times work at the furrow, the main work upon and supervision of the watercourse was under the control of the plaintiff. It is unnecessary to decide whether the furrow was once for all widened by the plaintiff to form a five feet or whether it gradually attained that width, but enough appears to show that the plaintiff at once set about making arrangements for diverting a larger stream of water from the Kandelears River, and that whenever the widening took place it took place openly, and to the knowledge of the defendant. The evidence all goes to show that the plaintiff did not merely purchase surplus water, but a considerable share in the use of the watercourse and the water. What precisely the rights of the parties are must be decided under the subsequent agreement of 1892. At that time it was necessary, in consequence of damage from flood to the furrow, for the plaintiff to obtain some concession from the defendant in the reconstruction of the furrow, and the plaintiff says it was then agreed that the defendants, who had disposed of all his rights under the first agreement, should, in consideration of the concession, share in the use of the furrow water. The defendant denies that any further contract was made, and says that as before the plaintiff was only entitled to the surplus water. Here again I must refer to the conduct of the parties in order to ascertain the truth. I find that from this time there is clear evidence of joint user for many years by the parties of the water in the furrow, and I am satisfied that this joint user was in terms of their agreement, which gave to each a fair and reasonable share in the water, it being in the contemplation of the parties that almost three morgen of land was available for irrigation on the defendant's ground, and a considerably larger area on the plaintiff's ground. Now, the question arises, what water was it that they agreed to share. In my opinion it was contemplated by them when the agreement was made that they were dealing with all the water that came down from the upper dams in the bed of the river to the defendant's dam, which was at the disposal of the defendant, and could by means of that dam be conveniently directed on to the land of the defendant and plaintiff in the furrow, as it was constructed in 1892. I also find that practically the furrow before the late flood was in the same condition as in 1892. The injury complained of by the plaintiff as done to him by the defendant in derogation of his grant in that the defendant erected a pump in the river above the dam, and used the water diverted from the river by that means to irrigate ground which could not have been irrigated from the furrow in dispute. The defendant admits the use of the pump, and says that by means of it he took all the water he could obtain whenever he liked. He asserts a right to use the water in this manner, but upon the evidence it was sought to prove that even if he had no such right he did no injury that caused damage to the plaintiff, because at the time he used the water by means of the pump there was so little water in the river that it could not have reached the plaintiff's land to be of any use to him. It follows from my finding as to the true conditions of the contract that the defendant had no right to use the water in this way in such quantities as to deprive the plaintiff of a reasonable share of it. I am also of opinion that although the water was weak at the time defendant used the pump, there was still sufficient to render the diversion a cause of some danger to the plaintiff. The question also arose at the trial whether the plaintiff, and his son, the second plaintiff, are claiming the servitude in respect of land in connection with which it was originally granted. It seems to me that although the plaintiff did not at the time of the agreement hold the land by precisely the same title as that under which it is now held by himself and his son, he had at that time sufficient right of ownership in the land to acquire a servitude in favour of it over the land of the defendant. I may also mention, although the question was not raised upon the pleadings or in argument, that it was not merely a personal servitude granted to plaintiff by the defendant, for the defendant admits that it was to pass to the children, but was a grant of a servitude against the land of the defendant in favour of the land then held by the first plaintiff, and now held by the two plaintiffs. In September last the furrow was partly washed away, and silted up owing to floods, and the plaintiffs complain that upon their setting about repairing the damage upon the land of the defendant, he refused to allow them to proceed with the work. The defendant justifies his action in this respect by the contention that the plaintiff has no right to enter upon his ground to execute repairs or relay the furrow without notice, and without any arrangement having first been come to between himself and the plaintiff as to the manner of executing the work, and even now the defendant will only consent to the furrow being repaired provided it can be re-constructed in the same spot without damage to the defendant's property, and provided that it is not constructed to a greater width than 3 ft. I am of opinion that the width of the furrow, which is on an average from 4 to 5 ft., is practically the same now as it was in 1902, and was so made with the consent of the defendant, and that the plaintiffs are therefore entitled to go upon defendant's land to repair the furrow, and restore it to the state it was in before the flood of September last. The plaintiffs do not now claim any right to make any deviation in the furrow or to do anything in the re-construction of the furrow, which might damage the plaintiff. If the furrow cannot be re-constructed, as it was before, and if the plaintiffs are entitled to preserve their servitude by making deviations in the course of the furrow, for which they might have to pay compensation to the defendant, that matter would require a different form of action. While the plaintiff is entitled in cleaning the furrow to place the soil on to the bank thereof, as was done in the past, without doing any damage to the defendant's land, I do not now hold that if material is required for repairing the extensive damage done by the flood, that the plaintiffs are entitled to use such material from the land of the defendant without his consent. As to the defendant's claim in reconvention, I come to the conclusion that it has not been proved that any damage was done by soil being thrown on to his lucerne lands out of the furrow by the plaintiffs or their servants. It seems to me that when the defendant diverted the water by means of his pump, the quantity in the river was such that the plaintiff would not have benefited largely by the use of the water, and the plaintiffs sustained no serious damage. The Court will make a declaration in terms of prayers (a) and (c) of the declaration, and award the sum of £25 to each of the plaintiffs. Judgment is given for the plaintiffs on the defendant's claim in reconvention. Defendant is ordered to pay the costs.

Mr. Lourens applied for the plaintiff to be declared a necessary witness.

Maasdorp, J., said that a declaration would be made accordingly.

Mr. Howes (for defendants) said he was instructed that plaintiff was all the time of the trial in Cape Town in connection with his Parliamentary duties.

Maasdorp, J.: The Taxing Master will deal with that point. The Court only declares that the plaintiff was a necessary witnesses.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

ADMISSION. { 1906.
{ July 19th.

Mr. Pohl moved for the admission of Michiel Jacobus Pretorius as an advocate.

Application granted, and oath administered.

Ex parte KOTZE.

Mr. Burton moved as a matter of urgency, on the petition of Johannes Erasmus Petrus Kotze, of Vredenburg, division of Malmesbury, for an interdict against one Pieter Hermanus Loubser. Petitioner said that he was the owner of certain land marked No. 37, situate at Vredenburg. On June 12 last Mr. Loubser, who was the present registered owner of the farm Wittaklip, which adjoined the village of Vredenburg, wrongfully and unlawfully cut the fences enclosing petitioner's said property, and drove with his cart over both the erven numbered 36 and 37, and through the gardens and cultivations of petitioner, leaving the fences open behind him. Petitioner had instructed his attorney to call upon the said Loubser to refrain from so trespassing upon his property, and to re-erect the fences so cut down by him on the said erf; but respondent had refused to re-erect the fences or refrain from trespassing on the property, saying that he had a right of way through it. Petitioner denied that the respondent had any right of way through his property, and also said that he (Loubser) could get into the village of Vredenburg without passing through his (petitioner's) property. He prayed for an interdict restraining Loubser from cutting down the fences enclosing the erven Nos. 36 and 37, Vredenburg, or any of them, or from trespassing thereon, pending decision of an action to be instituted by petitioner for a declaration of the rights in regard to the matters in dispute. Counsel said he thought that at the present stage he could apply for a rule nisi.

De Villiers, C.J., said that it might save expenses if he granted an interdict, and gave leave to respondent to move to have it set aside. An order would be granted as prayed, action to be brought by petitioner during the August term, with leave to respondent in the meantime to apply for the discharge of the order.

BAUERMEESTER V. BACK.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Assistant Resident Magistrate of the Paarl in an action brought by appellant against respondent for £20 damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of respondent improperly, negligently, and carelessly driving a cart and knocking down petitioner in Lady Grey-street, Paarl, on March 23 last. The decision of the Court below was absolution from the instance, with costs.

The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, said that from all the evidence before him, both from plaintiff's and defendant's side, it was very evident that at the time of the accident defendant was driving at a very moderate and reasonable pace—in fact, Mr. Doornbrack, who was one of the chief witnesses for plaintiff, said that defendant drove at a sharp walk. It was also admitted on both sides that plaintiff nearly got run over by a bicycle ridden at the time by a certain Baartman. In order to avoid a collision with this bicycle, plaintiff, according to all witnesses and her own evidence, went towards the middle of the street, which was very narrow at the time owing to certain repairs being in progress there. "I heard the case very carefully," the R.M. added, "and, considering all the circumstances I cannot but come to the conclusion that this was a pure and simple accident, which it was quite impossible for defendant to have avoided. . . . I must add that I consider that defendant gave his evidence fairly, and acted humanely in fetching and guaranteeing to pay for a doctor in this matter. . . . In my opinion, the plaintiff absolutely failed to prove any negligence on the part of the defendant in this matter."

Mr. Benjamin was for appellant (Magdalena Bauermeester); there was no appearance for respondent.

Mr. Benjamin submitted that the way in which this accident occurred was that plaintiff, in order to avoid the bicycle, which came upon her unexpectedly, ran into the middle of the street, and she was driven over by the defendant, who at the time was not looking where he was driving the cart. From the evidence it seemed to be perfectly clear that defendant was looking towards a shop at the side of the street, and was not looking ahead. It was very difficult, therefore, to see how the Magistrate, on the evidence before him, came to the conclusion that this was a "pure accident."

De Villiers, C.J.: I see no reason for disturbing the decision of the Magistrate. The accident occurred at a place where there were excavations on both sides of the street. A man named Baartman came up on a bicycle in an opposite direction to that in which the defendant was driving, and as nearly as possible drove over this elderly lady. As usual, in these cases, with elderly ladies, she got confused, and did not know exactly which way to turn, and in the meanwhile, the defendant's cart was coming on at a slow trot, and, in my opinion, there is quite sufficient evidence to justify the view of the Magistrate, that there was no negligence on the part of the defendant. Of course, it is just possible that with the exercise of extreme skill and care he might have avoided the accident, but what is required of a driver is ordinary care and diligence, or, as some say, reasonable care and diligence. That certainly was exercised by the defendant in the present case. There is some conflict as to the distance at which the defendant was from this old lady, when first his attention was called to her being in the road, but I am satisfied that the first he knew of it was when he could not well have avoided hurting her. It is said, however, that two witnesses stated that the defendant was looking at the time towards a fruit shop, and not looking in the road. Well, even if it is true that two witnesses stated that, I should have thought that the defendant would have known better which way he was looking than the two witnesses, and he said that he was looking in the direction of the road. The man himself would certainly know better than others which way he was looking, and he states that he was looking down the road, and the Magistrate apparently believed his evidence. So that, on the whole, therefore, however much one might sympathise with this lady, it lay upon her to prove negligence on his part. Prima facie, of course, the very fact that the old lady was hurt would be evidence of negligence, but defendant has rebutted that by his evidence and the evidence given on his behalf. The fact that the defendant offered to pay the doctor, I think, should not be used against him. It was pure kindness of heart, he was sorry for the old lady, he heard that she was poor, and he offered to pay her doctor's expenses. That circumstance should not weigh in this case one way or another. A man may be perfectly innocent of any negligence, and yet he may feel that he has had a share, or some part in the accident, and say he would assist her. The Magistrate's decision seems to have been carefully considered, and I see no reason for disturbing it. The appeal is dismissed.

ADAMS V. MOCKE.

Vindication—Sale by bailee—
Mobilia non habent sequelam.

It is not an unqualified rule of law that if any one to whom a thing has been lent or otherwise entrusted, alienates it without authority, the owner has no action against the person who has obtained it by a just title and in good faith.

If, however, the thing has been so entrusted under circumstances which might reasonably lead others to believe that the ostensible owner was the true owner, or had authority from the true owner to dispose of it, the owner cannot claim it from a person, who has acquired it in such belief and for value, without tendering to repay such value.

A., being the driver of a post-cart owned by the plaintiff, who was a post contractor, left one of the plaintiff's horses, which became disabled on the road, in the charge of B., and borrowed a mule from B. to prosecute the journey. B. sold and delivered the horse to the defendant.

Held on appeal, that in the absence of proof of such circumstances as just stated, the Magistrate erred in granting absolution from the instance.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Acting Resident Magistrate of Fraserburg, in an action brought by appellant against respondent for delivery of a certain horse, or its value, £20.

From the record, it appeared that a certain iron grey horse, belonging to appellant, had been used for post-cart work. It was sent out with a driver from Beaufort West to Loxton, and the driver returned without the horse, but a mule was occupying its place. It was explained that the horse became ill at Loxton, that it was left there to be cared for, and a mule was brought back in its place, and this mule was substituted for another mule at Slangfontein. When the driver returned to Beaufort he was sent back to get the horse. He exchanged the second mule for the first mule at Slangfontein, but he failed to get the horse at Loxton. The man at Loxton, Mr. Esterhuizen, took up the position that he exchanged the first mule for the horse.

The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, said that, in granting absolution from the instance, he was of opinion that before proceeding for the recovery of the horse in question from the defendant, the plaintiff should have taken steps to settle the dispute, which had arisen between himself and one Esterhuizen, of Loxton, in the district of Victoria West, from whom Mocke purchased the horse. It was clear, from the evidence of the plaintiff himself, that Esterhuizen claimed the property himself by an exchange of a certain mule. It also appeared that this mule was returned several times to Esterhuizen, but on each occasion he refused to accept it, and eventually it was sent to the commonage with other animals belonging to plaintiff. All this went to show that such a dispute did exist, and it should have been thrashed out by plaintiff in an action against Esterhuizen.

Mr. Louwrens was for appellant, Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers was for respondent.

The record of evidence led for the plaintiff was read, no evidence having been taken for defendant.

De Villiers, C.J. (to Mr. De Villiers): Is it your contention that the property passed to Mocke?—Yes.

[De Villiers, C.J.: If the statements made in evidence are true, is not the plaintiff entitled to vindicate his horse?]—Esterhuizen, I admit, had a bad title, but the defendant took the horse bona fide and for value. If a man entrusts his goods to a bailee, the question is, can he vindicate them from a man who has received them from the bailee bona fide and for value?

De Villiers, C. J.: I only want to know your position.

Mr. Louwrens (for appellant): See Noonan v. Meyer (15 C.T.R., 281), where the law as to vindication is fully stated in your lordship's judgment. The defendant should have called on Esterhuizen to defend his title. The Magistrate gave absolution from the instance, and therefore did not consider that the plaintiff was in the wrong. The Magistrate considers that the plaintiff ought to have sued Esterhuizen, but had he done so he might have found that Esterhuizen or any other middleman was a man of straw. The record does not show how respondent became possessed of the horse. The Magistrate ought to have decided on the evidence before him, Coetzee v. Beukes (11 C.T.R., 78).

De Villiers, C. J.: In a case like this the better course would be to remit to the Magistrate to take evidence for the defendant, or to make Esterhuizen a co-defendant.]

I do not see how we could make him a co-defendant.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The difficulty is that the plaintiff still has the mule.]

Plaintiff, defendant, and Esterhuizen are in three different magisterial districts.

Mr. De Villiers (for respondent): Julius, the driver, deposited the horse with Esterhuizen. There was clearly a contract of deposit. An owner cannot vindicate from a bailee. Groenewegen De legib. abrogatis (4-1-16). He teaches that if an owner baile his goods, he must suffer from the dishonesty of the bailee.

[De Villiers, C.J.: That is on the ordinary principle that if I put a man in a position to commit fraud, I must suffer.]

Yes, but here Adams, the owner of the horse, by his agent Julius, deposits the horse with Esterhuizen. Mocke buys in good faith. Hol. Consultat (Vol. 4, No. 178) bears on the subject.

[De Villiers, C.J.: English law makes a distinction between a factor and an ordinary agent.]

Our law knows no such distinction. Even if Adams has a right to vindicate, he must first tender to Mocke what he had received for the horse.

Mr. Louwrens in reply.

[De Villiers, C.J. (to Mr. De Villiers): Is there any proof of valuable consideration and of good faith on the part of Mocke?]

Mr. De Villiers: There is proof of consideration, but not of good faith.

Curr. Adv. Vult.

Postea (July 30).

De Villiers, C.J.: The plaintiff was a post contractor at Beaufort West, and he authorised his post-cart driver to hire horses or mules in case any of his horses should become disabled on the road. One of the horses did become disabled at Loxton, whereupon the driver hired a mule from one Esterhuizen, but no terms as to the amount payable were agreed upon. According to the driver's evidence, it was arranged that Esterhuizen should be allowed to use the disabled horse until his mule was returned. Esterhuizen exchanged that horse with the defendant for another horse. The plaintiff returned the mule to Esterhuizen, who refused to accept it, and who was unable to return the horse in consequence of the exchange, whereupon the plaintiff sued the defendant for a return of the plaintiff's horse or its value. It would appear from the correspondence between the plaintiff and Esterhuizen that the latter justified his parting with the horse on the ground that the driver had not hired the mule from him, but had exchanged the mule for the horse. The driver, however, denies having effected such an exchange, and the plaintiff positively stated that the driver had no authority to sell or exchange any of the cattle in his charge. After the plaintiff's evidence had been closed, in the Court below, the Magistrate granted absolution from the instance on the ground that "before proceeding for the recovery of the horse in question from the defendant, the plaintiff should have taken steps to settle the dispute between himself and Esterhuyzen, from whom the defendant had purchased the horse." If in law the plaintiff was entitled to vindicate his property, the fact that Esterhuyzen set up an untenable claim could not affect the plaintiff's right. The defendant, upon being sued for a return of the horse, should have called upon Esterhuyzen to defend the suit, and, even if Esterhuyzen did not join as co-defendant, any defence which he legally had could have been set up in the suit. No evidence whatever was given to show that the driver did exchange the horse for a mule, or that he had authority to make such an exchange. In the absence of such evidence, it is clear that the plaintiff never lost his property in the horse, and that he is consequently entitled to recover it, even from a person who was ignorant when he bought the horse that it belonged to the plaintiff.

In support of the Magistrate's judgment, counsel for the respondent relied upon a proposition of law laid down by Groenewegen (Ad. Inst., 4-1-15), to the effect that if any one to whom a thing has been lent or otherwise entrusted sells or in any other manner alienates it without authority, the owner has no action against the person who obtained it by a just title and in good faith. In support of this view he quotes a Dutch proverb, which, literally translated, runs thus: "Such a skipper should you choose, Ship and goods you'll have to lose," and he cites a decision of the Supreme Court of Holland, as reported by Neostad, (decision 85) in support of his proposition. On reference, however, to the case itself, I find that Groenewegen's general statement of the law is not by any means justified by the facts of that case. It was a case in which the owner of merchandise on board a ship entrusted it to an agent, with authority to sell the merchandise in a foreign port. The agent was arrested for a debt of his own, and in order to meet the claim he sold the goods and devoted the proceeds to the payment of his debt. The former owner of the goods sought to recover the money, but the Supreme Court of Holland held that he was not entitled to succeed, on the grounds that he had entrusted the free administration to the agent, and that there was no right to vindicate the proceeds in lieu of the goods themselves. Van Leeuwen, in his "Censura Forensis" (4, 7-15-17) does not agree with Groenewegen, and points out that according to the decided cases, including the one reported by Neostadius, the owner only loses his vindictory action where he has entrusted his goods to a person having the ostensible authority to sell them; as, for instance, where the owner or charterer of a ship has given full control to the master over the ship and cargo, or where the owner of merchandise has entrusted it to his institor— that is to say, his agent, for the sale of his goods. Van Leeuwen seems, however, subsequently to have altered his opinion, for, in his Commentaries (4-12-4, Koetze's translation), he lays it down broadly that "in order that no one should in future be defrauded through the fault or omission of him who has entrusted his property to a dishonest person, it has been established that if a person has without authority sold, pledged, or in any other way alienated property entrusted or lent to him, the owner of such property shall have no further right against him who has bona fide acquired the same than that of redeeming the property at the price for which it has been sold or pledged." I have, however, been unable to find any decided case in the Dutch courts which supports this unqualified statement of the law. In the case of Gerritz v. Dionys (Boel's Loenius Dec., cas. 42), decided in 1629, it was held that the owner of goods who has delivered them for sale to a hawker was entitled to claim the goods from a third person, to whom the hawker had sold and delivered them in payment of his own debt, but the decision seems to have proceeded on the ground that the buyer knew that the goods had been entrusted to the hawker for sale. In the subsequent case of Colen v. De Boert (Boel's Loen. Dec., cas. 80), it appeared that the plaintiff, a goldsmith at the Hague, had given two valuable bracelets to one Gilles to sell. Gilles handed over the bracelets to the defendant in payment of his debt, and the Court held that, in the absence of any collusion between Gilles and the defendant, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the bracelets from the defendant. Another case reported by Boel (Boel's Loen. Dec., cas. 9) was that of a merchant who had placed merchandise in the hands of his factor in Amsterdam to sell. The factor converted the goods to his own use, and it was held that although the factor might be held to have stolen the goods, the merchant was not entitled to recover them from a third person, who had acquired them by purchase or otherwise, and that the merchant had only a personal action against his factor. This was found by the evidence of a large number of expert witnesses to be a custom of the city of Amsterdam, the reporter adding that the reason of the custom was that the merchant had entrusted the goods to his factor. Voet (Com. 6-1-12) discusses the question with some fulness, and he points out that under the Roman law, there was a right of vindication of stolen property, even if the theft had been committed by persons to whom the owner had entrusted the property, such as borrowers, bailees, hirers, and the like. He then refers to the maxim of the Dutch law mobilia non habent sequelam as having, in the opinion of many, the effect of depriving the owner of his vindictory action, where he has thus entrusted the goods to others. He admits that in the case of agents for the sale of goods and factors (institores ac prozencle) it is almost everywhere observed as a practice that if such persons sell or pledge goods entrusted to them the owners are not entitled to recover such goods without returning the price or paying the debt. Van der Keessel, who is the latest writer on the point, says (Thesis, 183): "The true owner of a thing, whether movable or immovable, which has been alienated without his consent, not only by one who has stolen it, but by one to whom it has been lent, given in deposit or let, or by any other like person not having authority to sell, may legally claim it from anyone who is in possession of it without making restitution of the price paid by him. In his dictata that learned author elaborates the thesis, and maintains the accuracy of the proposition of law there laid down. It is unnecessary to quote from the several other authors and cases treating on the subject. They are in hopeless disagreement with each other; and even upon the question whether a person who has entrusted to another a negotiable instrument payable to bearer is entitled to recover it from a third person, who has obtained it bona fide and for value there is no complete agreement. In this Colony this last question was finally set at rest in Woodhead, Plant and Co. v. Gunn (11 Juta, 4). It was there held that as the owner, by placing such an instrument in the hands of another, leads others to believe that the holder is entitled to deal with it as cash in currency, it would be in the highest degree inequitable that he should be entitled to recover the instrument from a person who has honestly and for valuable consideration received it as cash. I cannot agree with those Dutch writers who have extended the principle of the decision reported by Neostadius to every case in which goods are entrusted by one person to another. But the underlying principle in that and in all the other cases I have found is this, that it would be inequitable that an owner, who has led others into the reasonable belief that the person to whom he has entrusted his goods is entitled to dispose of them should be allowed to recover such goods from a person who has acquired them honestly and for value, unless the owner tenders to repay such value. It must be admitted that this view is not consistent with the maxim of the Dutch law, mobilia non habent sequelam, if that maxim is to be regarded as a fixed rule Matthaeus, in his exposition of the maxim (paragraph 7), states that it had been introduced in the Netherlands in the interest of trade and commerce. He admits, however, that, in so far as it deprives owners of goods of the right to vindicate such goods wherever found, it constitutes a serious departure from well-established principles of law, and that it should not be extended beyond the limits which have been sanctioned by custom or Statute. In this colony the maxim has been frequently applied to pledges of movable property—and it has been held that the pledgee loses his hypothec after parting with the possession. As applied, however, to the owner's right to follow up his goods into the hands of persons who have not acquired the same from him, the maxim is certainly more honoured in the breach than in the observance. The rule rather is that the owner has the right of vindication, and the cases where he is deprived of this right are really exceptions to the general rule. One of these exceptions is where the owner of money or of a negotiable instrument, payable to the holder, seeks to recover the same from a person who has obtained it bona fide and for value. Another exception is mentioned by Matthaeus (par. 7, 17), in the case of the owner of goods, which having been stolen from him, have been publicly sold sub hasta without his knowledge, for he could only recover the goods on payment of the price. It is not necessary now to decide whether the exception would apply to judicial sales of movables in this colony, where the formalities to secure the greatest amount of publicity are not so elaborate as they were in the Netherlands, or as they are here in the case of sales in execution of immovable property, although I would by no means suggest that our law differs from the law as thus stated by Matthaeus. In regard, however, to the case of a person who has lent, or let, or otherwise entrusted his goods to another, I am clearly of opinion that he does not lose his right of vindication if the goods are improperly parted with, unless he had so entrusted his goods under circumstances which might fairly and reasonably induce third persons to believe that the ostensible owner was the true owner, or had authority from the true owner to dispose of the goods. The burden of proving that such circumstances do exist lies upon him who resists the owner's right of vindication. In the present case, no such circumstances have been proved to exist. The fact that the plaintiff entrusted the postcart horses to his driver could lead no one reasonably to believe that the driver had the right to sell or exchange the horses. As to Esterhuyzen, there is no evidence whatever before the Court that he had ever acted as the agent of the plaintiff, or that he was a dealer in horses, or that the defendant had any other valid reason for believing Esterhuyzen's statement that he was the owner. The Magistrate, therefore, ought not to have granted absolution from the instance, but should have called on the defendant to sustain his defence. If the defendant had proved such circumstances as I have indicated, the Magistrate would have been justified in rejecting the plaintiff's claim, except on payment by the plaintiff of the consideration paid by the defendant or its value. The appeal will be allowed, and the case remitted to the Magistrate for hearing and for judgment on the merits. The costs of this appeal and in the Court below will abide the result.

ESTATE BAUMANN AND ANOTHER V. DU PLESSIS AND ANOTHER.

Execution debtor—Ownership— Delivery.

Sheep bearing the mark of an execution debtor and found in his possession were attached by the messenger. P. claimed the sheep as his, on the ground that they were the progeny of sheep which 18 years before had been leased to the debtor.

Held, that in the absence of satisfactory proof of P.'s ownership, the sheep were liable to attachment and sale in execution.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Ceres in a certain interpleader action to determine the ownership of certain property found in the possession of the execution debtor one Esterhuizen. Dr. Greer was for appellants; Mr. Close was for respondents.

Dr. Greer said that there were really two records in this case. The appellants, as plaintiffs in the Court below, sued one A. P. Esterhuizen and got judgment against him, and certain goods were attached. Then one Izak du Plessis claimed two mules and 52 sheep, and his brother, Jacobus F. du Plessis, claimed a wagon, seven mules, 11 bags of corn, and a set of harness. Evidence was taken in each case, and the Magistrate declared that the goods were not executable. The appellants' case was that this was simply a collusive arrangement, these persons being brothers-in-law.

The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment in the case of Izak du Plessis, said: In this case the documentary evidence and the evidence which was produced, in my opinion, was satisfactory.

There was bona fide delivery. In the case of Jacobus F. du Plessis, he said: In this case the evidence produced by applicant was given in a straightforward manner, and, although the witnesses were put to a severe cross-examination, I was of opinion that their evidence was not shaken, and that the transaction was bona-fide, and that the documents "A," "B," and "C" show that to be so. I was also satisfied that there was delivery.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

De Villiers, C.J.: In the case of Izak du Plessis there is evidence of delivery of the articles alleged to have been sold. The things were in the possession of Izak du Plessis for some time, and the property had passed, and he, therefore, is entitled to claim the property as his own. In regard to the sheep, however, I am not satisfied as to the ownership. It relates to a transaction dating as far back as 1888. The evidence is very vague upon the point, and there is this important fact, that Esterhuizen, the man in whose possession the sheep were, had his own mark upon the sheep, instead of that of Du Plessis. Izak du Plessis should have taken care in his arrangements with Esterhuizen that these sheep which belonged to him should be duly marked with his mark, but at present the proof is very inconclusive as to the sheep belonging to Izak du Plessis. Therefore, in the case of Izak du Plessis, the appeal will be allowed to the extent that the sheep are declared to be executable. In the case of Jacobus du Plessis, there is no evidence that the wagon, mules, and set of harness were ever delivered to Jacobus du Plessis. They were delivered to Wolfaardt. Wolfaardt sold to Jacobus du Plessis, but there is no delivery to Jacobus du Plessis. Esterhuizen, in his evidence, said that he sold to Jacobus du Plessis. That is a different version to Wolfaardt's. He does not say that he delivered to Jacobus du Plessis. Now, these things were found in the possession of Esterhuizen. They were, therefore, liable to execution, unless any person could show that the property was his, and it lay upon Jacobus du Plessis to show that these things belonged to him, and his evidence is not satisfactory upon the question of ownership, and, therefore, in his case the appeal will be allowed to this extent, that the wagon, harness, and span of mules are declared to be executable. As to the corn, well, if the evidence is correct, and the Magistrate believed that evidence, then the corn was brought there for somebody else, I think for Abel, so that that will remain. In the one case, the mules will remain the property of Izak du Plessis, and in the other case, the corn will remain the property of Jacobus du Plessis. As to the costs, at all events the costs of appeal should be paid by the respondents.

respectively. The only question is as to the costs in the Court below.

Having heard counsel on the question of costs in the Court below,

De Villiers, C.J., said that the order would be that costs of appeal be paid by respondents respectively, but appellants must pay costs in the Court below.

Ex parte WOOD. { 1906.
{ July 19th.

Mr. Benjamin moved, as a matter of urgency, on the petition of Robt. Wood, for an interdict restraining the Auctions and Estates Co. from parting with the sum of £79 10s. to one Alexander Sinclair Mackinnon, of Plumstead. The respondent Mackinnon described himself as a mining engineer, and instructed the applicant to proceed to Mossel Bay to examine some manganese in the district. The applicant disbursed £25 7s. 4d., and he was entitled to £1 a day during the time he was away. In May applicant lent respondent £25, of which only 10s. had been paid. There was a sum of £59 10s. due, and there was an advertisement in the "Cape Times" that Mackinnon was putting up for auction his movable property and household effects. Petitioner understood that Mackinnon intended leaving the Colony with the object of delaying and defeating his creditors. In addition to the £59 10s., counsel also applied for £20 by way of costs.

An order was granted restraining the Auctions and Estates Company from parting with £79 10s., with leave to the respondent to move to set the order aside.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

ESTATE SHAYLER V. { 1906.
DEVENISH. { July 20th.

Executor—Ordinance 104 of 1833, Sec. 32—Recovery of money improperly paid by executor.

The firm of S. & Co., of which the plaintiff was a partner, was indebted to the defendant in a sum of money. The other partner died, and the plaintiff was appointed executor. The plaintiff, believing the firm to be solvent, paid the debt as surviving partner.

Held, that the plaintiff was not entitled, as executor of the deceased partner, to recover the amount from the defendant under the 32nd section of Ordinance 104 of 1833.

This was an action brought by Edward John Tannock, of Prieska, in his capacity as executor dative in the estate of the late John Leonard Shayler, against John M. Devenish, farmer, division of Prieska, to recover a sum of £225 alleged to have been erroneously and improperly paid by plaintiff to defendant.

Plaintiff, in his declaration, said that he was executor dative in the estate of the late John Leonard Shayler, of Prieska, and he sued in his capacity as such, and the defendant was a farmer residing at Omdraais Vlei, in the division of Prieska. The deceased died intestate on or about the 15th May, 1903, and plaintiff was appointed executor-dative by letters of administration granted on the 23rd October, 1905. Previous to the death of the deceased, he (Shayler) and the plaintiff carried on business in partnership as forwarding and general agents at De Aar and Prieska, under the style or firm of Shayler and Co., and at the date of the deceased's death, the said firm was indebted to the defendant in the sum of £200, with interest thereon at 8 per cent. per annum, under a certain promissory note. The said firm continued to carry on the said business until shortly before the death of the deceased, when the said business was sold, and the said partnership dissolved. In or about the month of April, 1904, the plaintiff, as executor dative of the deceased's estate, erroneously and improperly paid to the defendant out of the assets of the said estate the sum of £225, in settlement of the said promissory note, with interest thereon, the plaintiff, in doing so, acting in the bona fide belief that the proceeds of the estate would be found sufficient to satisfy all the just and valid claims to which it was liable, and that it was in the best interests of the estate that the said debt should be paid in order to save further accumulation of interest thereon. Owing to the impossibility of realising several outstanding accounts due to the said firm, the proceeds of the estate had been found insufficient for the payment of all the just and valid claims to which it was liable, as would appear from the administration and distribution account annexed to the declaration. The plaintiff was liable to pay to the creditors specified in the said account the amounts which they respectively would have been entitled to receive in respect of their said claims, if he had not paid the said sum of £225 to the defendant, and which said amounts the said creditors demand that the plaintiff should pay. The Master of the Supreme Court, acting in the interests of the creditors, had refused, and still refused, to accept the administration and distribution account. Amongst the claims of creditors other than those referred to in the annexed statement, were some claims based upon accounts against the said partnership, but the estate of the plaintiff, in his personal capacity, was provisionally sequestrated as insolvent, on or about the 4th April, 1905, and the final adjudication thereof was ordered on or about the 27th April, 1905. The plaintiff "was entitled, in his capacity as executor dative in the estate of the deceased, to recover from the defendants the said sum of £225 so erroneously and improperly paid as aforesaid, in order that the same may be brought up in the assets of the said estate and distributed pro rata amongst the various creditors thereof, including the defendant, but the defendant refuses to pay the said sum or any part thereof." Plaintiff claimed repayment of the said sum of £225, with interest a tempore morae and costs.

Defendant, in his plea, denied that the partnership between plaintiff and Shayler was dissolved before Shayler's death, and he said that he did not receive notice of the alleged dissolution. He said further that he received the payment of his money from plaintiff, not as executor of Shayler, but as surviving partner in the firm of Shayler and Co. The assets of Shayler were sufficient to satisfy his liabilities, but he alleged that plaintiff in his personal capacity, or as partner in Shayler and Co., had allowed the estate to deteriorate in value through failing to collect the outstanding accounts, etc. He also said that plaintiff was solvent at the date of the payment of the sum of £225, and Shayler's estate was also solvent.

Mr. Burton (with him Mr. Roux) was for plaintiff; Mr. McGregor (with him Dr. Rainsford) was for defendant.

Mr. Burton stated that the matter had already been before the Court on an exception taken by defendant that the plaintiff's declaration showed no good cause of action. The Court, however, without deciding the question gave leave to defendant to raise the point at the trial.

Edward John Tannock (the plaintiff) said that he was an enrolled agent at Prieska. Prior to May, 1903, he was carrying on business with Shayler as a general and forwarding agent between De Aar and Prieska. On the 9th May, Shayler and Co. disposed of the assets and business to Mrs. Wilson. On the same day the partnership was dissolved. They did not draw up a deed of dissolution at the time, and before a deed could be drawn up Shayler died, as a matter of fact, six days after the dissolution. Witness drew up an inventory. Printed circulars were sent out at the time of the dissolution to the old customers. Witness produced copies thereof. Upon the dissolution of Shayler and Co., witness and Mrs. Wilson entered into partnership, and carried on the business as Wilson and Tannock. He was sure a copy of the circular was sent to Devenish. In February, 1903, the firm of Shayler and Co. incurred a debt of £200 to Devenish upon an advance. They gave a promissory note to Devenish, which matured in February, 1904. Witness published notice to creditors and debtors of Shayler's estate. Witness brought up a schedule of claims lodged within the time specified in the notice. Defendant had not filed his claim, but witness had his promissory note in his possession.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Did defendant at any time file his claim?]

Witness: No. Continuing, witness said that the promissory note fell due in February, 1904. Defendant asked for payment. Witness paid defendant by cheque for £225 given in the name of Mrs. Wilson. The cheque was made out to executor estate Shayler, but Mrs. Wilson afterwards altered it at the request of defendant to Shayler and Co. Witness's letters of administration were at Prieska at the time, and Mrs. Wilson altered the cheque for the convenience of the defendant, to enable it to be cashed at Britstown. At the time witness thought there would be sufficient assets to meet all the liabilities of the estate. Many of the debts were disputed. Witness did not take pro-

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

DE VILLIERS V. PHILPOTT { 1906.
AND OTHERS. { July 23rd.

School Board election—Illegal regulation.

At a School Board election, the applicant, being one of the candidates, had 92 less votes than the lowest successful candidate on the list. One of the Government regulations under which the election was held stated, contrary to the provisions of the School Board Act, that lessees would not be entitled to vote. In an application to set aside the election, about half a dozen persons who would have been qualified to vote, but whose names were not on the voters' list in consequence of the invalid regulation, stated that they had intended to vote for the applicant but did not vote at all in consequence of the regulation.

Held, that in the absence of prima facie proof that the applicant's defeat was caused by the invalid regulation, the applicant was not entitled to the relief sought.

This was an application by Abraham Peter De Villiers, of Uitenhage, upon notice to the Civil Commissioner and members of the Uitenhage School Board, to show cause why the election held on the 15th December last shall not be declared invalid and illegal, and why the same shall not be set aside and a fresh election ordered to be held.

Mr. Close was for applicant; Mr. Howel Jones was for respondents.

Affidavits were read on behalf of the applicant, to the effect that he was one of 22 candidates nominated at the recent School Board election at Uitenhage, and that he was unsuccessful. The special voters' roll on which the election was conducted contained only the names of owners of property in the said district, and not the names of oc-ceedings to enforce payment. The outstanding debts amounted to about £120. Witness filed his account in Shayler's estate with the Master, but the latter refused to allow it to go in until the dispute with Devenish was settled.

Mrs. Wilson and the defendant gave evidence.

Mr. Burton having been heard in argument, Mr. McGregor was not called upon.

De Villiers, C.J., said that under certain circumstances, executors who had paid accounts of deceased persons, which they ought not to have paid, might recover back the money so paid. It was an anomaly of the law that any person who had paid a debt that was due should recover the amount paid from the creditor, but if the present case had fallen within section 32 of Ordinance 104 of 1833, then the plaintiff, as executor, could have recovered. But it was necessary for the executor to show that the money had been paid by him as executor. As to the question whether Tannock paid as executor or as the surviving partner, the best proof of the capacity in which he paid was the cheque itself. The cheque given by Mrs. Wilson was not in favour of the plaintiff as executor, but in favour of the firm of Shayler and Co., of which he was a partner. There was certainly an alteration of the cheque, but Mrs. Wilson could give no explanation as to when she made the alteration. The defendant said that it had already been made when the cheque was handed to him. The Court is satisfied that the payment was made by Tannock as surviving partner, he at the time believing that the estate was solvent. The question of undue preference does not now arise. That was a question for the creditors of Tannock. Judgment would be given for the defendant, with costs.

Mr. McGregor asked that defendant be declared a necessary witness.

Defendant was declared a necessary witness accordingly.

[Plaintiff's Attorneys: Mostert and Son; Defendant's Attorney: P. de Villiers.]

supiers. He called attention to the affidavits of four persons, who said that they were on the Divisional Council voters' list as occupiers. Applicant lodged a protest with the returning officer on the day of polling on the ground that the voters' roll had not been framed in accordance with the terms of Act 35 of 1905. He said that the four persons in question would have voted for him, but for the omission of their names from the roll, and that others, it had come to his notice, would also have voted for him but for this reason. It was further stated that the Divisional Council voters' list for 1905 contained 2,310 names, and that the list prepared for the School Board election contained only 1,235 names.

The affidavits of Mr. Lundie, vice-chairman of respondent School Board, and others, to the effect that applicant had produced no proof that, had occupiers as well as owners been allowed to vote, he would have been elected. The lowest number of votes recorded for any successful candidate was 312, and Mr. De Villiers was nineteenth on the poll, with 220 votes. Deponents believed that at none of the polling stations were votes tendered by Divisional Council ratepayers for any one of the candidates refused.

Mr. Close, after calling attention to the decision of the Court in the recent case of the Stutterheim School Board, went on to point out that the provisions in regard to the framing of the voters' list in the matter of School Board elections differed from the provisions governing the framing of lists for other elections, Parliamentary, Divisional Councils, Municipal Councils, and Harbour Boards, and that in this case no opportunity was given to those whose names did not appear on the lists to object and have the lists revised. Thus in regard to School Board elections a person may be disqualified from coming forward and saying that he should be on the list of voters. On that ground, counsel continued, the applicant should be granted relief in this matter.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Should you not produce some proof that if the law had been followed in particular, your client would have been elected?]

Mr. Close: I submit that it is not necessary. I submit that the fact of one-half of the voters having been kept off the list speaks for itself.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Yes, but they might have voted for the other candidates.]

Mr. Close: We have certain men who would have voted for one candidate.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But should not you produce 93 who would have voted for your client, and thus elected him?]

Mr. Close: That would raise a very great vista of questions. In this case, I submit that it is not necessary for the applicant to show that he would have been elected. The Court has adopted this power of setting aside an election without proof that if the election had been conducted on regular lines, it would have resulted in favour of the applicant. Counsel cited the Port Elizabeth Municipality case concerning the election of an auditor, the Mader v Fraserburg Municipality (16 Supreme Court Reports, 505), and the Claremont Municipality Case (13 Supreme Court Reports).

Mr. Jones submitted that applicant had not shown sufficient ground or reason for upsetting the proceedings at the election altogether. It had been stated on previous occasions that the Court would not be likely to interfere with a corporate body unless very strong proof had been given that if the election had been otherwise held—there were, no doubt, irregularities in this case—the result would have been different. He submitted that the Court would not go into the possibilities or even the probabilities of what would have happened had occupiers been allowed to vote as well as owners. Furthermore, after the lapse of such a length of time, when the School Board had been at work for about seven months, it would require some very strong proof before the Court would upset the election, that the poll would have had a different result, and in this case there was not even an allegation in the applicant's affidavit or any other affidavit before the Court that the applicant would have been elected, or that there was any probability that he would have been elected. If the four persons in question did not vote in this election, it was their own fault, because they did not come forward and object. The applicant himself was a party to their laches, because it was a natural inference from the affidavits that he did not protest before the election took place. Applicant should not have lain by and taken his chance at the poll, but he should have protested before the poll was taken.

Mr. Close having been heard in reply.

De Villiers, C.J.: The School Board Act of 1905 contains no provision for the framing of voters' lists for School Board elections, but the 14th section of the Act provides that, in order to carry out the provisions of sections 10 and 11, it shall be lawful for the Governor, by Proclamation in the "Gazette," to frame and issue regulations for the elections of members of School Boards. Under this section, the Governor has published certain regulations for the election of members. The Court has already decided in the case of Tierpin v. Stutterheim School Board (16 C.T.R., 289, 295), that one of the provisions contained in the regulations was not in accordance with the provisions of the Act, and that is the provision which declares that only owners of property are entitled to vote in Divisional Council areas, and that lessees or other occupiers are not so allowed to vote. In that case it was clear that the applicant would have been elected in case the law had been complied with, because he was only two votes behind the last on the list of elected members and it was shewn that more than two qualified voters whose votes had been rejected would have voted for the applicant. In the present case, the applicant does not anywhere in his affidavits state what the number of votes was which had been given to the elected candidate standing lowest on the list, but the deficiency has been supplied by the affidavits made on behalf of the respondents, which show that the applicant was 92 votes behind the lowest successful candidate, and if, therefore, in the present case, the applicant had produced 93 duly qualified electors to prove that they had tendered their votes for the election, that their votes were rejected, and that they would have voted for the applicant, then clearly he would have been entitled to relief. The question now is, whether he is entitled to relief in consequence of the general illegality, as it has been called, which has been occasioned by reason of the regulations framed by the Governor. I find in these regulations that provision is made for the framing of the voters' list, but that voters' list is not final: it is not final in the same way as the voters' lists for Parliamentary elections are final. The twenty-seventh regulation, which has been cited, provides "that if a voter comes to the poll to vote whose name does not appear on the voters' list supplied to the polling officer by the returning officer, such omission of the voters' name will not debar the voting if the voter can prove to the satisfaction of the polling officer his or her right to have such omission rectified, and in such cases the polling officer will ask the following question, in lieu of question, (2) above specified." Then certain questions are put: "Are you a ratepayer paying rates to this Divisional Council, or now liable to pay rates to this Divisional Council, and as such entitled to be placed on this list of voters, and thus to become entitled to vote, and can you produce proofs thereof to me? If the polling officer is satisfied with such proofs produced he shall proceed to take the vote of the voter as directed in paragraph 29 (B) of these instructions." Now, here, there is no question at all whether he is an owner, but only, "Are you a ratepayer paying rates?" I am inclined to think that the framer must have forgotten that in another part of the regulations the test had been not merely being a ratepayer, but an owner paying rates. Then 29 (B), to which it refers, directs that thereupon the polling officer may: "(1) Add the full name, address, and qualification of the voter to the voters' list supplied by the Returning Officer; (2) assign a number on the voters' list to the voter thus added to such voters' list by giving the voter an a, b, or c, etc." So that the voters' list is not final. In that respect this list differs from the Parliamentary voters' list; it is not a final list, and it can even still be amended when the voter comes up for the purpose of recording his vote. It is clear, therefore, that throughout the School Board elections it would have been quite competent for any lessees or occupiers, whose names had been omitted from the list, to tender their votes, and it would have been competent under the sections I have just read for the polling officer to have taken them. In the case of In re Hoptown Municipal Election (2 Rosc. 46), it appeared that "a Resident Magistrate, who presided at a municipal election, erroneously held that only those voters who had paid their rates could record their votes, and he rejected the votes of those who had not paid their rates. Some voters, hearing of this ruling, abstained from voting. On motion to annul the election, held that the election should not be annulled, as the result was not affected by the erroneous ruling of the Magistrate, and as nothing was said in the notice of motion as to the irregularities at the election." There it was said, in my judgment, that "every one is presumed to know his legal rights, and the rumour which spread in consequence of the erroneous ruling of the Magistrate should not have deterred any one from tendering his vote." The case relied upon on behalf of the applicant, the case of Maden v. Fraserburg Municipality (16 Supreme Courts Reports, 503), in my opinion, does not really affect the point. There it appeared that "owing to the neglect of the chairman of the Municipal Council to give 21 days' notice of the election of Councillors, as required by the 49th section of Act 45 of 1882, the applicants, who had consented, at the request of several voters, to become candidates, were ignorant of the day and place of nomination, and were consequently prevented from being nominated. Ordered, that the election of the two Councillors who were elected unopposed be set aside, and that a fresh election take place." In that case the irregularity went to the very root of the election. Candidates who had been asked to stand were prevented, in consequence of ignorance, caused by the illegality, from appearing as candidates. They were simply ignorant of the day of the elections, they were unable to stand as candidates, and it was held that they were entitled to set aside the proceedings in order to become candi-means of doubtful verbiage. It is true the 12th section of the Act of 1904 enacts that "This Act shall be read as one with the liquor laws, 1883-1893, and may be cited as the Liquor Law, 1904." Here all the laws from 1883 to 1898 are bundled together, and they are all to be read as one with the Liquor Law, 1904. I do not think it can fairly be held that this provision was intended to increase the penalty for a contravention of the Act of 1898, especially in view of the fact that the Legislature in increasing the penalties failed to mention the penalties under the Act of 1898 as the penalties which shall be increased. Therefore, it appears to me that the literal sense of the Act of 1898 should rule the present case. The literal sense of that Act is that a penalty of £25 is the maximum penalty for a first offence, and, therefore, the penalty must be reduced from £30 to £25. As to the question of fact in this case, I think it is a pure question of credibility. The witness Simon swore positively that he had been supplied with liquor, that he was a native, that he was not entitled to be served with liquor, and that he was served with liquor by the barman of the appellant. The defence raised was that it was not this Simon who was supplied, but a friend of his who was entitled to buy liquor. Well, it is not necessary now to decide whether that would have been a good defence, but there certainly seems no hardship in the present case if the Magistrate believed Simon, because it would, to my mind, be an evasion of the law, I do not say it would be a contravention of the law—that is another point—but it would certainly be an evasion of the law if a licence-holder could indirectly supply these persons, who are not entitled to obtain liquor. Persons who are entitled to obtain liquor, who are mere men of straw, who would not mind any imprisonment for the offence if they were found out, would bring in their friends promiscuously taking care that they have been supplied beforehand with the means of buying liquor and then buy liquor and supply their friends and the licence-holder would go scot-free. Then, it is said that it was a busy time, a Saturday, and it would be a great hardship upon a licence-holder that he should inspect persons who enter the bar, and see that they are entitled to buy liquor. But, I do not see that it would be a great hardship if he placed somebody at the door, so as to prevent anyone from coming in and drinking, who was not entitled to buy liquor. But that point does not really arise for decision, because, in my opinion, the Magistrate had sufficient justification for holding that Simon did not only drink the liquor at the bar, but that he also bought it from the barman employed by the appellant. So that the appeal will only be allowed to this extent, that the penalty is reduced from £30 to £25.

REX V. FORSYTH (2).

Liquor Law Acts—Second conviction—Appeal.

Under the 75th section of Act 28 of 1883, the penalty for a first conviction of a certain offence is £25, and for a second conviction £50. The appellant was convicted of the offence and appealed, and before the appeal was heard he was again convicted of a similar offence subsequently committed.

Held, that notwithstanding such appeal, the Magistrate properly treated the second conviction as subjecting the appellant to the increased penalty.

This was another appeal brought by the same appellant as in the last case. He had been convicted by the Resident Magistrate of Woodstock of selling liquor to two native women, in contravention of the terms of his licence, and had been sentenced to pay a fine of £50.

Mr. Burton, for the appellant, argued that the conviction was against the weight of evidence.

Without calling upon counsel for the Crown,

De Villiers, C.J.: In this case I do not wish to hear Mr. Jones, because this is also a case in which the credibility of the two witnesses for the prosecution is the main question. Well, it is said that there was some contradiction between these two witnesses as to the amount of money which Margaret had in her possession after she had returned from the bar, but, of course, Margaret would know very much better than her friend how much money she had in her possession. A contradiction on a point of that kind would not be fatal to the credibility of these two witnesses. She might have had a different amount in her possession from what her friend said, but that would not make either of the two guilty of swearing falsely. But, upon the main point, the two are agreed that the liquor was bought by Margaret. No doubt, that is denied by some of the witnesses for the defence. One of the witnesses is a very disreputable character, and as to the barman—well, naturally, he would be very busy at the time, and all his inclination would be to support the defendant, whose barman he was. But the evidence is very clear that was given by these women that the purchase was made by Margaret, and, as she was admittedly a native not entitled to buy liquor at that time, the conviction must be confirmed. I see that one of the points raised on the record is that, in sentencing the defendant, the Magistrate took into consideration the previous conviction, which conviction had not at that time become final, and that it had not been approved by a judge of the Supreme Court. Mr. Burton very properly does not rely upon that as a ground of appeal, because the conviction stood. The fact that it had not yet been approved by a judge of the Supreme Court did not prevent it from being a conviction so long as it stood. Of course, if at any time afterwards the conviction was set aside, then that would be a ground, no doubt, for the Governor remitting the penalty, but in law this conviction stood until it was set aside, so that that will not be a ground for altering the penalty. The appeal must be dismissed, and the conviction confirmed.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

GENERAL MOTIONS.

In re THE GRAND JUNCTION RAILWAYS. 1906. { July 24th.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., moved for certain orders and for the confirmation of the second report of the Receivers of the Grand Junction Railways. Counsel asked the Court to affirm the action of the receivers in having paid a dividend of 5s. in the £ to the creditors transferred to the admitted list. These persons did not get the first dividend of 5s., their claims having been disputed, and as the dividends were withheld through no fault of the creditors, the Receivers asked for leave to pay interest on the amounts. The money had been lying in the A.B.C. at interest. In regard to Mr. Hills's expenses, it was now asked to extend the amount to £3,487 18s. 10d. on the production of vouchers. After providing for certain contingencies, there was a balance of £31,545, which was sufficient to pay a further 1s. in the £ to all creditors on the admitted list, and the receivers also asked for authority to pay this.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Will not the dividend be largely increased after the judgment of the Privy Council confirming the judgment here?]

Mr. Schreiner: Yes, my lord. As regards the remuneration to the liquidators, that will be left in the hands of the Court. It is usual to allow them 2½ per cent. on the receipts, which have amounted to £10,784 14s. 9d.

De Villiers, C.J.: It is not necessary to go into all the items in the report. It will be sufficient to say that the Court will confirm the report on all of these proposals, with orders as applied for on the different points.

ALLEN V. LIQUIDATORS B.S.A. ASPHALTE CO.

This was an application on notice of motion calling on the respondents to show cause why they should not be ordered to accept as proper claims against the liquidators of the company certain two bills of costs for £18 16s. 6d. and £127 3s. 6d., incurred on behalf of the company by Attorney A. J. MacCallum.

The affidavit of Andrew Allen set out that prior to the liquidation and thereafter he acted as managing director of the company. A. J. MacCallum was engaged to act as legal adviser. Prior to the date of the final order the company incurred certain costs to MacCallum amounting to £127 3s. 6d., and costs between attorney and client, and acting under instructions from deponent, A. J. MacCallum sent the bill to the liquidators. The directors instructed A. J. MacCallum to take the necessary steps to oppose the provisional order being made final, and the Court made the following order: "Provisional order made final, costs to be costs in the liquidation." The liquidators objected to pay on the ground that these costs were not included in the order.

Mr. Burton was for the applicant and Mr. Moltano was for the respondent.

Mr. Moltano said the applicant had no locus standi in the matter. The affidavit of Mr. Gibson set out that A. J. MacCallum was engaged by the applicant in his private capacity, and not by the company.

Mr. Burton submitted that both bills of costs should be accepted by the liquidators, and were fairly chargeable against the company. As far as the first item was concerned, there was really no defence.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But Mr. MacCallum is the creditor of the company.

He has done this work for the company. Why does he not bring this application?]

Mr. Burton: The reason is that Mr. Allen, as the managing director, guaranteed personally to Mr. MacCallum the payment of any balance.

Mr. Molteno said he took up the position that the applicant had no locus standi, and he had no right to ask the Court for an order of payment of debt for which he was not a creditor.

De Villiers, C.J.: The applicant in this case (Andrew Allen) calls upon the respondents to show cause why they shall not be ordered to accept as proper claims against the liquidators of the company two bills of costs incurred by the company to Attorney A. J. MacCallum. He does not state either in the notice of motion or in his affidavit, nor does Mr. MacCallum either, state that he (Allen) has paid these accounts, nor is there any statement that Mr. MacCallum has ceded his claims to Allen. Accordingly, there is a preliminary objection to this claim. The claim is brought by a person who has no locus standi whatever. The fact that he has guaranteed the payment does not give him a locus standi. Unless he has actually had the accounts or received cession of the debt as against the company, he has no locus standi to bring any claim for accounts against the company. Upon this simple ground, I think the application ought to be refused. But, assuming now that the application had been made by MacCallum himself, it is by no means clear to me—I won't express an opinion upon it—it is by no means clear that he would be entitled to have both these bills accepted as claims against the company. He would have to prove, so as to establish such a claim, that the work he did as attorney was work done for and on behalf of the company, and any work which he did for Allen so far as Allen's interests were opposed to those of the company would not be work for which he could make any charge against the company. But I have no doubt that a large proportion of the claims made in these bills of costs is in respect of work done by MacCallum for the company, and if he makes his claim I have no doubt that the liquidators will consider such a claim, and award to him a dividend in respect of such claim. So far as the bill of costs is taxable, the bill of costs ought to be taxed after due notice, not to Allen, but to the liquidators of the company. In the present case it appears that the only person to whom notice of taxation was given was Allen, and the persons primarily liable were left out of account altogether. It is an extraordinary proceeding, and that in itself, supposing Mr. Allen himself were proceeding, would be an objection to this claim being allowed.

Mr. MacCallum now says that he had no objection to a retaxation, but that ought to have been considered before the application was made. It ought to have been made perfectly clear in the bill of costs that the Bill had been taxed in the manner required to be taxed, viz., after due notice to the persons who were to be primarily held liable. But I do not wish to pre-judge now any questions which might arise as between Mr. MacCallum and the liquidators. All I wish to remark is this, that any account which Mr. MacCallum might fairly charge as against the company, whether it be between attorney and client or otherwise, ought to be allowed by the liquidators when a claim is duly made against them. The present application must be refused, with costs.

WILLIAMS V. WOOD AND	{	1906.
WILLIAMS, LTD.		July 21th.
		" 27th.
		" 30th.

Director—Dismissal by co-directors—Articles of association—Company.

By one of the articles of association of a company it was provided that if any director should owe the company £100 or upwards, he shall forfeit his seat. The plaintiff was a director and chairman, and the defendants were his co-directors. The defendants, without giving the plaintiff previous notice, resolved at a meeting, that as he owed the company more than £100, his seat was forfeited. In fact the plaintiff owed the company less than £100.

Held, that the resolution should be set aside.

Dr. Greer moved for an order declaring the proceedings of a certain meeting of two directors of Wood and Williams, Ltd., as null and void, requiring their removal from the minute-book, declaring the petitioner was chairman and remained trustee of the company until removed from such office by a special resolution of shareholders, or by the order of a Court having competent jurisdiction, and for an order restraining the Standard Bank from acting upon the resolution adopted at the meeting. The petition set out that the petitioner was instrumental in forming Wood, Williams and Co., Ltd., which acquired certain assets of A. J. Coleman and Co., Ltd., of which the petitioner had been managing director. In September, 1906, it was decided to reconstruct the company, in order to reduce its capital, and a new concern was formed, and registered under the name of Wood and Williams, Ltd. He was the principal shareholder in the company until recently, holding over 8,000 out of 13,000 shares, the capital of the company. The reduced capital rendered it impossible to handle certain proprietary rough goods, whereupon the "Importing Syndicate" was formed, on an arrangement with David Ayr and Co., of Dundee. Ayr and Co. were the European buyers, and Wood and Williams the distributing agents here. Ayr and Co. nominated G. H. Rubenstein as their representative on the syndicate, and he was to receive 1 per cent. commission on the turnover of the syndicate, and a one-half per cent. out of the two and a half per cent. charged by Ayr and Co. as buying commission. The syndicate commenced operations in February, 1906, and the applicant, being satisfied that the arrangement was not to the best interests of the shareholders of Wood and Williams, Ltd., early in July notified Rubenstein that it was not his intention to renew the agreement with the syndicate, when it expired at the end of July, 1906. Rubenstein and Wm. Seale Wood had sole control of the syndicate, and were interested in continuing the agreement. Pursuant to the articles of association, of Wood and Williams, Ltd., petitioner was appointed chairman of the directors, and also trustee, for the purpose of holding the assets of the company and protecting the interests of the shareholders, the other directors being Wm. Francis Wood and his son, Wm. Seale Wood. Owing to the refusal of the petitioner to continue the agreement with the syndicate, and owing to other matters, there had been friction with W. S. Wood and G. H. Rubenstein, who brought pressure to bear upon W. F. Wood, the third director. On Wednesday, the 18th July, 1906, petitioner was in the company's offices until four o'clock, when he left as usual. On the morning of the 20th July, petitioner received in a registered envelope what purported to be a resolution taken by two of the directors of Wood and Williams, Ltd., after petitioner had left business on Wednesday, the 18th, deposing him from the directorate, depriving him of the appointment which he held as trustee for the shareholders, and proposing other arrangements with the bank. On Saturday morning, at eleven o'clock, petitioner called at the company's office for the purpose of attending the meeting of directors, which he had convened. Mr. Wood, sen., referred him to Mr. Wood, jun., but that gentleman refused to attend the meeting, and threatened applicant with violence if he did not leave the room at once. The door of the Board Room was locked, and the name of petitioner erased therefrom. On Saturday, July 21, Mr. Wood, sen., came to petitioner's house, when the matter was discussed, and on being asked why he became a party to these proceedings, he said that owing to his deafness he did not understand what was happening, and that the minutes as adopted were produced by his son, who, it appeared, had framed them in consultation with Rubenstein. The meeting of directors, of which petitioner had no notice, it appeared, was held surreptitiously, after the usual hours. The last account rendered to petitioner from the firm, showed a balance in their favour of £12, and no account had been rendered since for goods which he, like the other directors, purchased from the company. He denied that he was indebted to the firm in over £100, and he was prepared to pay anything that could be found due. He took exception to the charge that he was issuing false balance sheets in connection with the company. He was apprehensive steps would be taken to carry out the arrangement with the syndicate which was not in the interests of the shareholders, but was manifestly to the profit of Rubenstein and Wm. S. Wood. Counsel submitted there should be a rule nisi in the case. It was clear that the two directors had gone beyond their powers. They held the meeting in a surreptitious manner, after the petitioner had left the office. It was not in the power of the co-directors to remove the applicant; that was only in the power of the shareholders.

De Villiers, C.J.: It would have been better if notice had been given the directors, but a prima facie case has been made out for the interference of the Court. Under the Articles of Association, the first directors are to be William F. Wood, Edwin James Williams (who shall also be chairman), and William S. Wood. The applicant was duly appointed chairman. Under the 8th article any director who shall be indebted to the company for goods supplied, or otherwise, in the sum of £100 or upwards, shall forfeit his seat on the directorate. It appears when the applicant was not present after he had left the meeting, the remaining directors at a meeting decided he owed £100, and that he should forfeit his seat on the directorate. It seems a very strong measure without giving the man any notice of forfeiture that such a resolution should be carried; at all events, there is prima facie ground for the interference of the Court. It is quite possible that the directors may put a different complexion on the case, but, as it now stands, I think certainly the onus lies upon the remaining directors to justify the course they have taken. There will be a rule granted calling on the directors of Wood and Williams, Ltd., to show cause on Friday why the resolutions arrived at by them on July 18 should not be set aside, the rule to operate as an interdict in the meantime, restraining the respondents from carrying out such resolution, a copy of this rule to be served on the manager of the Standard Bank, as well as on the respondents.

Postea (on the return day July 27).

Mr. Benjamin appeared for respondents to show cause.

Dr. Greer said that applicant had that morning been served with answering affidavits, and he (counsel) had to apply for a postponement in order to enable replying affidavits to be filed. The parties desired to have this matter settled as soon as possible, and, if convenient, he would suggest that it should be postponed until Monday.

Mr. Benjamin said that he should raise no opposition to the application, provided that the order could be suspended so far as the Standard Bank was concerned, so as to enable the directors to draw on the funds to meet current expenses, salaries, and so on.

De Villiers, C.J.: If it has to stand over, matters must remain statu quo. I could not very well set aside a part of the order. The matter will stand over until Monday.

Postea (July 30).

Dr. Greer was for applicant, Mr. Benjamin was for respondents.

Voluminous affidavits were read, and several witnesses were called.

Having heard counsel in argument on the facts,

De Villiers, C.J.: In this case the Court has already made a rule calling upon respondents to show cause why a resolution which was arrived at in regard to the summary dismissal of the applicant shall not be set aside. It appears that, without giving due notice to the applicant that the question of his directorship was to be considered, he was dismissed apparently on the ground that he owed a debt to the company in excess of £100. One of the Articles of Association of the company is to the effect that no director shall be indebted to the company for goods supplied or otherwise, and if there be at any time outstanding accounts against any director, and owing to the company a sum of £100, or upwards, he shall forfeit his seat on the directorate. Well, it is a serious matter for a man to be summarily dismissed from a directorate, but his two co-directors dismissed him from the chairmanship as well as from the directorate without giving notice that the question was to be considered, and without clear proof that £100 was owing by him. The Court has gone into the question as to this amount, and it would appear that on the 18th July, when the resolution was passed, the applicant was indebted to the company in the sum of £101, and if that item stood by itself, no doubt he had just exceeded the amount for which he could be indebted to the company. But then, it further appears that at that time there was owing to him a sum of about £28 for his fees as director. It is true that he had got two cheques for the amount, but those cheques had not yet been paid, and when the cheques were presented for payment, owing to some informality, the cheques were dishonoured. So that in all fairness, considering in what amount the applicant was indebted on the 18th July, and that these two cheques had not been cashed, the £101, did not represent the amount of indebtedness. He had not been paid by the company the amount he was entitled to be paid, so that there was not £100 owing by him to the company. Then it is stated that there was some other transaction between him and the company which would have justified the respondents in declaring him to be indebted over and above the sum of £100. The entries upon which reliance is now placed had not yet been made on the 18th July. The entries were made in the books after this action had been commenced, and those entries, in my opinion, upon the evidence as it stands, ought not to have been made as against the applicant. There were fruit transactions apparently between plaintiff and Rubenstein. The applicant, however, says that, so far as he was concerned, he did not wish to act independently of the company, and he would have been bound to account to the company for any profits made from those fruit transactions. Well, if that is so, the company could not now charge against him the amounts which the company have paid in respect of these transactions. The company would have taken all the profits of the speculation, and therefore the amounts paid on behalf of the company were fairly paid. The cheques were drawn for the fruit upon the company's assets in the bank. The counterfoils of those cheques would show that these cheques had been so drawn. The entries were duly made in the books at the bank as having been payments made by the bank, so that it would have been quite impossible ultimately for the applicant to have said that he alone should have the profits and not the company. The transaction was on behalf of the company, the company would have made all the profits, and therefore the company would not have been entitled to claim this amount as it did as owing by the applicant to the company. Then the suggestion was made by Mr. Rubenstein in giving his evidence—his somewhat voluble evidence—that these entries must have been made after the applicant knew that the speculation was a failure. Now, there seems to be no justification whatever for this suggestion, as the books, so far as one can gather, are in form, there was nothing to show that these entries were made after the date of the failure, and in any case the counterfoils of the bank-book would have been there to show that the payments were made on behalf of the company, and that the applicant was not entitled to claim the profits. For these reasons, I am of opinion that there is no ground whatever for this high-handed proceeding on the part of the remaining creditors in dismissing the applicant without giving him a hearing, and without proper evidence to satisfy them that he had contravened the regulation, and owed the company £100. The rule must, therefore, be made absolute, with costs.

On the application of Dr. Greer, and with the acquiescence of Mr. Benjamin, the rule was made absolute, with costs against Mr. F. Wood and W. S. Wood, the other director (Mr. Gardiner) having taken no part in the proceedings.

Mr. Lewis said leave had been granted to the applicant to sue in forma pauperis. He had been instructed to apply for leave to issue process in the usual abbreviated form.

SMITH V. TRELEAVEN.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Resident Magistrate of Woodstock, in which the appellant was sued for £1 for a premium of insurance, and £3, interest due on a mortgage bond. The plea was that he had paid the capital amount, and judgment was given for the plaintiff. The defendant pleaded that the bond was null and void, as it had already been paid to the plaintiff's agent. The capital had been paid to one Villet, and the Magistrate held that the defendant did not exercise sufficient care in paying the money to Villet, that the bond was still of force and effect, and that the plaintiff was entitled to receive the interest. Dr. Greer was for the appellant (defendant in the Court below), and Mr. Van Zyl was for the respondent. Counsel pointed out that, in the first instance, the defendant would have had the impression that Villet was acting for an undisclosed principal, because the defendant went to him in order to raise the money. There was no mention in the bond where the capital had to be repaid.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Is this the same Villet the Law Society moved against the other day?]

Dr. Greer: I believe so.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Has he been prosecuted?]

Mr. Van Zyl: I believe he has disappeared.

De Villiers, C.J.: This is certainly a very hard case for the defendant. He apparently thought that Villet was the agent for the plaintiff to receive the capital of the bond, and when he was in a position to pay the amount — probably hard-earned money—he pays it over to this agent, and finds that the agent has appropriated it to his own use. The question is, whether it is quite clear that Villet was the agent for the plaintiff to receive the capital? He had been employed by the plaintiff to receive the interest, but it does not follow he was entitled to receive the capital. Now, what the defendant ought to have done when he paid the £50 was to see that the bond was handed over to him. That is what any business man would have done, and then he would have discovered Villet was not in possession of the bond. No doubt Villet gave some fraudulent excuse. The defendant ought to have kept the money in his own pocket until he got the bond. Therefore, it is his own fault, and he will have to suffer. The plaintiff took good care that Villet did not have the bond. The regret in this case is that the man who has committed this gross fraud upon the poor defendant should escape scot free. Some time ago an order was made striking him off the roll of conveyancers, and the Court intimated at the time that the matter ought not to rest there, that an example should be made of a delinquent of that kind, but a prosecution, it would appear, has not been undertaken, if it is said now he has disappeared. It is to be hoped he disappeared before the remarks were made by the Court, and that they did not lead him to make his escape. I hope some steps will be taken to arrest him elsewhere. There is a very gross fraud upon the unfortunate defendant. The appeal will be dismissed, with costs.

UPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.)]

Ex parte THE FEDERAL SUPPLY COLD STORAGE CO. OF SOUTH AFRICA, LTD. { 1906.
July 25th.
" 27th.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., moved, as a matter of urgency, for leave to sue by edictal citation the Pietermaritzburg Cold Storage Company, Limited, and Sparks and Young, Limited, of Durban. The petitioners said: (1) That your petitioners, together with the Imperial Cold Storage and Supply Company, Limited, Sparks and Young, Limited, of Durban, Natal; the Port Elizabeth Cold Storage Company, Limited; the Pietermaritzburg Cold Storage Company, Limited, of Pietermaritzburg, Natal; and McArthur, Atkins and Co., Limited, entered into a certain agreement to form an association called the Cold Storage Association, inter alia: (a) To protect the interests of cold storage concerns in South Africa from undue competition, so as to ensure the earning of reasonable profits on behalf of the shareholders and the proprietors thereof; (b) to provide machinery for regulating competition between members of the association for contracts and ordinary trade without causing undue interference with the trade of each, and the constitution of the association is set forth in certain deed dated 28th October, 1905, and signed by the representatives of the parties thereto. (2) That the office of the association is at Cape Town, and it is provided that the committee, in whom the management of the association is vested, shall meet at Cape Town at least once a month. (3) That your petitioners are desirous of bringing an action in this Honourable Court against the other parties to the said association for the purpose of having it declared that the said association is an illegal association, or, otherwise, that the same, if legally entered into, has been conducted for illegal purposes, and that your petitioners are entitled to retire therefrom, or otherwise. (4) That they are entitled to retire therefrom on the grounds that their co-partners have refused them the rights and privileges of partners, or that they are entitled to retire therefrom on the 16th November, 1906, having given notice as required by the memorandum aforesaid of their intention so to do, and for an order on the other parties to the said association to join with them in stating an account and balance-sheet of the association, and to debate the same and pay to them such sums as may be due to them. (5) That the said Sparks and Young, Limited, and the Pietermaritzburg Cold Storage Company, Limited, are companies carrying on business in Natal, in which colony their head offices are, and your petitioners are desirous of suing them by edictal citation, in order to join them as defendants in the said action. Wherefore your petitioners pray that your lordship will grant an order authorising them to sue the said Sparks and Young, Limited, and the Pietermaritzburg Cold Storage Company, Limited, by edictal citation in the said action and direct how citation may be served. Counsel also presented a further affidavit to the effect that the contract was entered into in this Colony, in order, as he explained, to show that the Court had jurisdiction.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Yes, but must not that jurisdiction be confirmed by an attachment? The mere fact that a contract was entered into in this colony is not enough to give this Court jurisdiction.]

Sir H. Juta: This gives the Court jurisdiction, because one could not very well confirm jurisdiction, unless it existed ab initio. The fact of the contract having been entered into in this colony gives the Court jurisdiction.

De Villiers, C.J., pointed out that there was no statement in the petition that respondents had assets here. The only thing, it seemed to him, that could be attached, would be the office furniture of the association in Cape Town.

Sir H. Juta admitted that there was no statement in the petition that respondents had assets here. He thought, perhaps, it would be better if his lordship would allow the matter to stand over, so as to enable him to produce affidavits in regard to that point.

[De Villiers, C.J.: As they have an office in Cape Town, I suppose they would have some assets here. The matter will stand over, and may be mentioned again later.]

Postea (July 27).

Mr. Searle, K.C., mentioned this matter. A further affidavit had now been made.

Mr. Schreiner said that he was instructed in this matter. There was opposition to the application, and there was a cross-motion, of which notice had been given that morning. There had, of course, been rather a rush from the other side, and notice could not be given sooner, because the affidavits for signature could not be obtained. He was going to suggest to his learned friend that the Court might take the matter some other time. He added that it might be desirable to put the position before the Court. The Federal Company, he understood, was desirous of obtaining an order to dissolve the Cold Storage Association. Now, resolutions to dissolve the association had been passed by the association, the only dissenting party being the Federal. There was no need whatever for dictatorial procedure, because the companies referred to had their representatives in this colony, whereby proceedings could be taken, and service could be effected, if necessary. But what he would like to say was that there was no need for litigation at all on the subject. They were applying to the Court to appoint a receiver actually for the liquidation of the association so that it really would be no use asking the Court to make an order simply on this ex parte application, without hearing what the other people had to say.

Mr. Searle: I have no knowledge about that.

[De Villiers, C.J.: That is all you want. You would not require more than that—the dissolution of this association.]

Mr. Searle: Oh, yes, but that is all new to me. Perhaps the matter had better stand over under the circumstances.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The matter may be mentioned again if the parties are prepared before the Court rises.]

Before adjourning, his lordship asked if the parties were prepared to go on with the matter.

Mr. Schreiner said that his learned friend had not returned into court, and he presumed that the matter would have to stand over.

DU PREEZ V. DU TOIT. { 1906.
{ July 25th.

Promissory note—Holder in due course.

The payee of a promissory note, payable to him or order, not being able to write, got another person to sign his name on the back, which name was wrongly spelt. The payee gave this note, thus indorsed, to the plaintiff for value and before the due date.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the amount from the maker, although the latter would have had a good defence if sued by the payee.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Bredasdorp, in an action brought by appellant against respondent to recover £34, upon a promissory note. Mr. Louwrens was for appellant; Mr. Burton was for respondent.

From the record, it appeared that the note was made by respondent in favour of one Aaron Brower, of Caledon. Brower had sold respondent a horse for £30, and the latter had also incurred a debt of £4. Defendant set up several defences. He said that the mare was not, according to warranty, and the Magistrate found for defendant as regarded the £30, holding that there was want of consideration. Judgment was given for plaintiff for £4, without costs.

Mr. Louwrens said that the effect of the judgment was that there was a breach of warranty between the two parties, and that the plaintiff was affected by it. There was no suggestion whatever that that was a party to or aware of any irregularity.

[De Villiers, C.J.: He took the note before it was due.]

Mr. Louwrens: Yes. Counsel went on to deal with the several pleas set up by defendant, and said that the main question upon which judgment was given, and upon which respondent relied now was the question of consideration. The plea in the Court below was that there was no consideration.

[De Villiers, C. J.: I think, incidentally, the question is raised whether the endorsement was a proper one. The promissory note is in favour of "S. A. Broer." I see, though, that it is endorsed "S. A. Brewer."]

Mr. Burton said that he had the greatest difficulty in contending, as against the holder in due course, which apparently Mr. Du Preez said he was, that the question of warranty could clearly be raised. The only point he could bring before the Court was this question of endorsement. It was true that point was not specifically raised in the plea, but it did appear on the papers. He submitted that the Court would not be disposed to grant the plaintiff more relief than he was absolutely entitled to. Defendant told Aron Brower that he had been cheated, and gave him notice that within 14 days he must return the note, and he would return the horse. After getting that notice, Brower got his brother to endorse the note, and take it from Caledon to Bredasdorp to Du Preez. The Magistrate found that the defendant had been "done." Du Preez gave cash for the note, charging a discount of 6d. in the £. The question was whether, upon the facts before the Court, plaintiff was the holder of this note in due course. He submitted that plaintiff was not the holder in due course. "S. A. Brower" was the endorser; the note was made to "S. A. Brower." This man's name was Aaron Broer. There was no partnership between the two Browsers in this transaction.

Mr. Louwrens said that both the Browsers went to the plaintiff to negotiate this promissory note, and that proved conclusively that they were in partnership. The defendant was precluded from denying the capacity of Brower to negotiate the bill. He thought if any man had been deceived, the defendant himself was to blame for his own negligence.

De Villiers, C.J.: The plaintiff is the holder by endorsement of a promissory note made by the defendant. The promissory note is made in favour of "S. A. Broer," and it is endorsed by "S. A. Brower." The main defence in this case was want of consideration inasmuch as the note had been given as the purchase price of a horse guaranteed to be sound which proved to have been unsound. This would have been a good defence, no doubt, as against Brower, but it is no defence as against the plaintiff if he was the holder of this promissory note in due course. There is nothing to show that he was not the holder in due course. He took the note before it fell due, and the endorsement is, on the face of it, in order; it is endorsed by "S. A. Brower." True, the spelling is not exactly the same, but practically the pronunciation of the word would be the same. Then it is said now—a defence is raised which was not raised in the Court below—that this endorsement by Brower is not the endorsement of the man in whose favour the note was made. But the evidence of Brower himself is that it was his endorsement. He did not write his name himself, but he told his brother to write it. Aaron Brower said: "I reside at Caledon. I am a horse dealer. My brother and I, as partners, had a promissory note signed by D. P. du Toit, G. son. I cannot write. My brother endorsed the promissory note. It was endorsed over to H. R. du Preez about 10-12th March, 1906. We were both together; my brother, Samuel Brower, gave it over to Mr. Du Preez. We sign as A. S. Brower or S. A. Brower in all transactions. I cannot write. I can sign my name." No doubt that is a very slovenly way of doing business, but the point is, has the payee of the promissory note done everything necessary to pass his ownership in that note to the holder? That is the sole point. Clearly he has done everything. Supposing that the maker of the note is unable to pay, and Brower as endorser were sued upon that note, he would have no possible defence to such an action. Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that the Magistrate entirely erred in this case. He seems to have assumed that, because, as between Brower and the defendant, the defendant had a good defence, therefore his defence equally availed as against the bona fide holder for value. If it had been shown that plaintiff took the note after it fell due, or if anything else had been shown to the effect that the plaintiff was a party to a fraud, that would, of course, have put a different complexion on the case. The appeal must be dismissed, with costs in this Court and the Court below, and judgment entered for plaintiff for the amount claimed.

BRAUDE V. LOUW. { 1906.
{ July 25th.

Liquid claim—Magistrate's jurisdiction.

A summons in a Magistrate's Court on a promise to pay the sum of £44, with the feathers of certain ostriches, claimed the amount and further claimed delivery of the feathers.

Held, that although so far as the summons claimed the sum of £44, it was within the jurisdiction, yet, as it further claimed delivery of feathers exceeding £20 in value, an exception to the jurisdiction had been properly taken.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Calvinia in an action brought by appellant against respondent to recover a sum of £44 on a promissory note, and also a sum of £5.

In the Court below, exception was taken to the first portion of the claim that the promissory note was not a liquid document, and, consequently, that it was beyond the Magistrate's jurisdiction. The exception was upheld. The item of £5 was not disputed, and judgment was given for that amount, with costs.

The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, said that the promissory note was for £44, or payment for certain 22 ostriches, according to the value of the feathers. The summons prayed for delivery of the sum or for delivery of the ostrich feathers. In his opinion, there was a distinct condition in the note, and that was that the payment might be varied according to the market value of the feathers at the time stipulated in the note. He maintained that the document was not, on the face of it, a liquid one, upon which judgment could be pronounced, without calling extrinsic evidence.

Mr. Close was for appellant, J. D. Braude. There was no appearance for respondent, Abraham Johannes Louw.

Mr. Close submitted that the test really was as to whether, in a case of this sort, the Supreme Court would give provisional judgment. The Court had, in similar cases which it had had before, given provisional sentence. Counsel relied on Lettersteit v. Watney (1 Menzies, 16), and Koomans v. Van der Walt (1 Menzies, 37).

[De Villiers, C.J.: If you had confined yourself to the payment of the money, I think your argument would have been conclusive; but your summons prays for the payment of £44, or delivery of the ostrich feathers.]

Mr. Close: Yes; but even supposing that a wrong prayer is put in, if there is a right prayer, a prayer on which we are entitled to get judgment, I submit that we are entitled to judgment on that prayer, and the Magistrate should have ignored the other.

De Villiers, C.J.: The action was brought upon an acknowledgment of debt, which is in the following terms: "The undersigned acknowledges to be indebted to J. D. Braude in the sum of £44 sterling, for value received. Promises to pay with the feathers of twenty-two ostriches (seven cocks and fifteen hens), according to the value of the feathers, to be delivered in April next, 1901, with the full crop of feathers." This is signed by defendant. If in this case the plaintiff had confined himself to the claim of £44 on the ground that there had been no tender of feathers in April, 1901, then the decision of this court in the case of Norgub v. Fryer (2 Juta, 218) would have been applicable. But the summons goes further, and prays not only that the defendant may be adjudged to pay the sum of £44, but also that he do deliver the ostrich feathers. Well, I suppose that is in the alternative for not paying. But in so far as the claim is for delivery of the ostrich feathers of a value exceeding £20, it is beyond the Magistrate's jurisdiction. On exception to the jurisdiction having been taken, the plaintiff could have amended the summons by striking out these words, "or deliver the ostrich feathers." On the face of the summons there was a prayer for more than the Magistrate could possibly have ordered and therefore I think, although the Magistrate's reasons are not exactly the same as those of this court, the Court should now dismiss this appeal.

Mr. Close having been heard on the question of costs,

De Villiers, C.J., said that the Magistrate had given costs in the Court below against defendant. The judgment of the Magistrate was for plaintiff for £5, with interest and costs. The appeal would be dismissed.

FORTUIN V. STEVE. { 1906.
July 25th.

Summons — Exception — Use of two languages.

A summons in a Magistrate's Court for slander set out the words actually used in the Dutch language and contained an innuendo as to the meaning of the words, although not a literal translation.

Held on appeal, that the Magistrate had erred in allowing an exception to the summons, on the ground that it was partly in English and partly in Dutch.

This was an appeal from a decision of the A.R.M. of Robertson, upon an exception taken to a summons that it was partly in the English and partly in the Dutch languages. The summons was for £20 damages for an alleged slanderous statement spoken of the defendant by the plaintiff, and three exceptions were taken to it. The first was that the defendant was wrongly described, secondly that the summons was partly in English and partly in Dutch, and thirdly that the words did not bear the construction put upon them by the plaintiff. The second exception was upheld. The Assistant Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, stated that section 2 of the Act 21 of 1884 was not in force in the district, and that according to it any summons, notice, or document not wholly in the English language must have a proper translation.

Mr. Burton was for the appellant, and there was no appearance for the respondent.

Counsel said it was a curious objection. It was quite clear in that locality that the vernacular would be perfectly understood. It would have been better, no doubt, to have appended a proper translation of the whole thing. The point of the exception, counsel submitted, was rather far-fetched. They did not seem to complain of not having a translation, and not having been told what the words meant.

De Villiers, C.J.: The summons was for damages and slander, and sets out the slanderous words in the language which was spoken at the time when the words were used, viz., the Dutch language. There is an innuendo as to the meaning of these slanderous words in the English language. At the trial an exception was taken to the summons that it was partly in English and partly in Dutch. Well, they could not set forth the words in the original without using the Dutch language, and therefore the Magistrate, in my opinion, was wholly wrong in allowing this exception. Even if there had been a translation annexed to the summons of the words used, the exception would still have applied, because it would have been a summons which was partly in English and partly in Dutch. At the trial, no doubt, the parties will be quite prepared to give a literal translation of the words which were used, and perhaps it would have been better to insert such translation into the summons, but the exception was not that there was no translation of the words. The exception was that two languages appear on the summons. The appeal must be allowed, and the second exception overruled, with costs in this Court and in the Court below.

FRANCIS v. RUDMAN.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Resident Magistrate of Uitenhage, in which the appellant (plaintiff) unsuccessfully sued for £8 8s. for cart hire and cash paid on behalf of the defendant's wife. From the evidence it appeared that the defendant's wife informed the plaintiff that her husband had thrashed her and turned her out of the house, and the plaintiff took her by cart to Klein Poort, and subsequently to Steytlerville, for legal advice. There was 8s. paid to a boy on another occasion to go to Klein Poort, when there was an attempt to break into the house during the husband's absence. The defendant did not dispute his liability, but said the charge was too much. The defendant and his wife had since become reconciled. For the defence, absolution from the instance was claimed, on the ground of non-liability, and this was allowed, with costs, by the Magistrate. The Magistrate, in his reasons, said that the plaintiff was not justified in entering into an agreement with the defendant's wife to hire the cart after being warned by the defendant.

Dr. Rainsford was for the appellant, and there was no appearance for the respondent.

Dr. Rainsford said the only portion of the expenditure which the defendant had previously repudiated liability for was the hire of the cart to Klein Poort. The Magistrate should not have granted absolution without calling on the defendant to deny the allegations of cruelty, and also his admission of liability.

De Villiers, C.J.: The plaintiff made a certain statement, which, if true, would have entitled him to judgment. He states what he had done for the wife; he had given her a cart, lent her money, the account coming up to eight guineas. "A few days afterwards," he said, "I saw the defendant with reference to my account. He promised to pay me in three weeks' time." Well, if this statement is correct, then the judgment ought to be for the plaintiff. It is quite possible that the defendant might contradict this statement, but, so far, there is no contradiction. Therefore, I think the Magistrate ought not to have granted absolution from the instance. The appeal will be allowed, and the case remitted for trial on the merits, respondent to pay costs of appeal, costs in the Court below to abide the result of trial in the Magistrate's Court.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

ESTATE SCHOLTZ v. (1906.
CARROLL. (July 27th.

Messenger of Court—Interdict—Attachment—Removal of goods—Contempt of Court—Costs.

The respondent, the messenger of a Magistrate's Court, on executing a writ against the goods of an execution debtor, was informed by the debtor that the Supreme Court had issued an interdict at the suit of the landlord against the debtor, as tenant, restraining the removal of the goods. The respondent attached and removed the goods, which were sold in execution.

Held, that as the interdict was in a suit between the landlord and tenant, the respondent may have reasonably believed that he was not bound by it, but that it was his duty not to proceed beyond attachment of the goods after being informed of the interdict against their removal, and that he should, at all events, pay the costs of the application for attachment as a penalty for contempt of Court.

This was an application brought by Agnes Judith Scholtz, as executrix testamentary of estate late Dr. Charles Wm. Scholtz, upon notice to the Messenger of the Resident Magistrate's Court, Cape Town, to show cause why he should not be attached for contempt of Court, and ordered to restore 20 chests of drawers and a piano wrongfully removed.

It appeared that the executrix made an application to the Court on the 11th May last for an interdict restraining the removal of any moveables from certain premises in Riebeeck-square, Cape Town, known as Leeds Houses, and occupied by Richard James Jubb. The landed property belonged to the estate Scholtz, and the application was brought in order to enforce the landlord's hypothec, the said Jubb being in arrear with his rent for four months. The applicant's claim amounted at that time to about £183. The matter came before Mr. Justice Maasdorp, who granted an interdict pending the hearing of an action for rent due, with leave to respondent to move to set it aside. Subsequently one Thompson, a deputy of the messenger of the Resident Magistrate's Court, went to Leeds Houses, and, in execution of a writ, he took possession of certain 20 chests of drawers and a piano, and had them removed from the premises. The messenger's deputy said that he had been granted an indemnity by the attorneys of the party for whom he was acting. The chests of drawers were afterwards sold by auction on the Parade. In the meantime certain negotiations had taken place between Jubb and the owner of the property, a certain payment was made to the applicant's estate, leaving £145 still due, and the applicant stayed her hand to enable Jubb to make efforts to liquidate his debt.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., was for applicant; Mr. W. Porter Buchanan was for respondent.

Mr. Schreiner (in answer to the Court), said that, while the messenger was quite correct in attaching the goods, the moment he removed the goods he committed contempt of the order of Mr. Justice Maasdorp.

Mr. Buchanan said that there had been no attachment by the order of Mr. Justice Maasdorp. The messenger acted in this case under judgments obtained in the R.M.'s Court against Jubb. It was found that the piano was not executable, being in the hands of Mr. and Mrs. Jubb under a hire purchase agreement. The chests of drawers were sold by auction, and the proceeds were in the hands of Messrs. Sifret, Goddorton and Low, attorneys. After the order of Mr. Justice Maasdorp had been made, a fresh arrangement was made by the applicant with the debtor, and a summons had not been instituted until quite lately. Counsel went on to read affidavits by the respondent and his deputy and others, in which Jubb's statements that he told them of the order of the Court were denied. It was alleged that Jubb was repeatedly under the influence of drink, and it was impossible to obtain satisfactory evidence of the existence of the alleged order, and that no copy of the order was brought under the notice of those who were acting until June 14, and that the messenger did not see a copy until that date.

Mr. Schreiner read replying affidavits to the effect that the messenger's deputy saw a copy of the order before the goods were removed. Counsel submitted that the order of the Court was not an interdict against Jubb, but it was an interdict against the removal of the goods. It was not a personal order against Jubb; but was addressed generally. The order was in rem. True, the Court granted respondent leave to move to set it aside but it was the usual order, and it might be set aside upon payment of the arrear rent. Respondents said they did not see the order. They did not deny that they knew of the order. But Mr. Jurriz was positive that Thompson came and saw a copy of the order at the Colonial Orphan Chamber before June 14. Applicants did not object to the attachment of the goods by the order of the Magistrate's Court, but the moment the goods were violently removed there was contempt of the Supreme Court order.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I have always looked upon these orders as more than personal. If it has not more than a personal effect, we shall have to consider whether we should not alter the terms of these orders, and interdict not only the respondent, but any person to whom these presents may come.]

Mr. Schreiner said that the position taken up by respondents was that Jubb was not their client, that they were acting against Jubb, and that the interdict of the Supreme Court restrained Jubb from removing the goods.

De Villiers, C.J., said that he did not think the respondents' attitude was wholly unreasonable.

Mr. Schreiner admitted that there was something to be said for respondents' position, but he contended that if others were allowed to remove goods which had been interdicted in protection of the landlord's hypothec, the whole object of such an order would be defeated. Counsel cited In re Price (3 Juta, 139), Domisse v. Theart (4 Juta, 92), Bushing v. Kinnear (5 H.C., 254), Lazarus v. Dose (3 S.C.R., 42). He contended that under all the circumstances the conduct of the messenger was highhanded, that, without any steps being taken to vary the order already granted by the Supreme Court, he should take the law into his own hands and remove these goods. He urged the Court to indicate to the messenger, who should show more respect, perhaps, than the average person for the orders of this court, that such conduct could not be allowed.

Mr. Buchanan contended that they must first consider what was the actual order given in this case. This was not an attachment order. There appeared to have been two orders given. The first seemed to be a short form, thus: "It is ordered that an interdict be granted, pending action, with leave to respondent to move to set it aside." In the other a portion of the prayer of the petition was set out. The order said, "Having read the petition praying for an order restraining the removal from certain promises, etc.," and it went on: "It is ordered that an interdict be granted pending the action, with leave to respondent to move to set it aside." Counsel submitted that there should have been an attachment in this case, otherwise the tacit hypothec, or landlord's lien, was of no use. Under an ad fundam order there was an actual arrest and attachment, so it was in an Admiralty matter, and he claimed that in such a matter as this there must be an arrest and attachment. Counsel quoted from Voet, Groenewegen, Van der Keessel, Bruuneman, and Kersterman, and cited Reed v. Buckley (7 E.D. Court, 12). He submitted that it was clear in this case that a second arrangement had been made between the applicant estate and the debtor, Jubb.

De Villiers, C.J.: It has been the practice of the Court for a great many years, certainly before I came on the Bench, to preserve the landlord's hypothec for rent by obtaining an interdict restraining the removal of the goods, and it was assumed that so long as the goods are in the possession of the tenant the landlord's hypothec is safe. It was never supposed that anyone, who received the notice of the order against removal, would presume to remove the goods because the order was not directed to him. It is a question for the Judges to consider whether in future they should not go further and order the attachment of the goods themselves, or make an order restraining the removal, to be directed not only to the debtor, but to all persons to whom knowledge of the order shall come. That is a matter for future consideration. At present we have to deal with the case which has actually arisen. Now, I am quite satisfied that, when the respondent attached these goods and was informed that there was an order of Court restraining their removal, he would have been perfectly justified in staying his hand and informing the execution creditor that there was a prior order of the Supreme Court restraining the removal of the goods, and that would have been perfect justification for his not attaching these goods. I do not see, therefore, that the respondent was in the very difficult position which he is represented to have been in. His position seems to me to be very simple. He could say: "There is a prior order of Court restraining the removal of these goods, and I now decline to proceed further." It seems, however, he was induced by the attorneys employed in this case to attach these goods, and not only to attach these goods, but to remove them, and send them to the Parade sales, where they were actually sold. Now, I have some difficulty about ordering the return of the goods, for this reason that the execution creditor, whose interests are affected, is not before the Court. But, in regard to the question as to whether there should be an attachment of respondent for contempt of Court, if there had been an attachment of the goods, there would have been no doubt whatever that there was a contempt of Court, and I am satisfied also, that the defendant did not do his duty in disregarding the order of the Court. I will not say that he was guilty, in the strict sense of the term of contempt of Court, inasmuch as the order was not directed to him, but I think there is sufficient reason in the present case, while making no order for his attachment, to show that the Court does not approve of his conduct by ordering him to pay the costs of this application. It was a complete disregard of an order of Court, which had been brought to his notice, but he seems honestly to have believed that, as the interdict was not directed to him, he might legally remove the goods. Well, he occupies an official position, and he ought to have known that, although that order was not directed to him officially, it was his duty not to proceed beyond an attachment of the goods. There will be no order, except that the respondent do pay the costs of this application.

On the question of restoration of the property.

Mr. Buchanan informed his lordship that the amount of money realised by the sale would be paid back.

His Lordship: Very well.

CALEDONIA LANDING, SHIPPING AND SALVAGE CO., LTD. V. EAST LONDON HARBOUR BOARD.

COLONIAL FISHERIES CO., LTD. V. EAST LONDON HARBOUR BOARD.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. W. Porter Buchanan), moved for the appointment of a Commission to take certain evidence. He said that the two cases were pending in the court, and pleadings had been closed. The petition was to take evidence on commission, and he had also to ask the Court to consider the question of date of trial.

Mr. Benjamin appeared to consent to the application.

From the petition and statements of counsel, it appeared that these actions had been consolidated for the purposes of the hearing. A number of witnesses for both plaintiffs and defendants reside in East London, and with a view to saving expense petitioners were desirous of having evidence of such witnesses as they thought fit taken on commission.

De Villiers, C.J., asked counsel what the action was for.

Mr. Schreiner: Damages alleged to have been sustained to certain vessels in connection with a flood that took place in October last on the Buffalo River. It is a very intricate case. Counsel also applied for the hearing to be set down for another date than Friday, August 24. He suggested an earlier day in some week nearer the day of arrival of the steamer from the coast.

De Villiers, C.J., granted an order in terms of petition, appointing the R.M. of East London commissioner to take the evidence of such witnesses as plaintiffs and defendants might produce, costs to be costs in the cause. As to the date of trial, he ordered the case to be set down for the 29th August, and the Grand Junction Railways case to be removed to the 5th September.

BLUMENAU V. NEETHLING. } 1906.
 { July 30th.

Policy of insurance—Acceptance —Premium—Consideration.

The defendant, a farmer, agreed with the plaintiff, an insurance agent, for an insurance on the joint lives of the defendant and his wife, and gave to the plaintiff a promissory note for the amount of the first premium. The Company did not approve of the joint life insurance, and sent to the defendant a policy on his own life alone, crediting the agent, who had paid the premium to the Company, with the difference in the amount of the premium. The defendant returned the policy to the Company without any letter of explanation, and the Company returned it again to the defendant, who left it in his village residence and took no further notice of the matter.

Held on appeal in an action by the plaintiff on the promissory note, that the Court below was not bound to hold that there had been an acceptance of the policy, and that in the absence of clear proof of such acceptance the defendant was not liable on the note.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Montagu. Mr. Burton was for appellant; Mr. Closo was for respondent.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

De Villiers, C.J.: The defendant gave a promissory note, the consideration for which was that a policy on the joint lives of himself and his wife should be handed over to him. He was subsequently informed by the company that his wife's life had been refused. Thereupon he determined to have nothing further to do with the policy. Two months afterwards he received the policy. It seems the letter was returned unopened, but, anyhow, the defendant knew what was in the envelope. The ordinary business man would undoubtedly have written a letter saying that he repudiated the policy and refused to accept it, but he, in his ignorance, thought it would be quite sufficient for him to return the letter, so he accordingly gave directions that the letter should be returned to the company. After that he gets the policy again. Again, in his ignorance, the defendant leaves it lying in his "Zondags huis," in the village, and takes no further notice of the matter. Undoubtedly it was a risky thing for him to do, but I am perfectly satisfied from the evidence that there was no intention on his part to accept this policy. His idea was, that having once returned it, he was not bound to return it again. If the Magistrate had come to the conclusion that the retention was made

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Butterworth. Mr Upington was for appellant; Mr. Benjamin was for respondent.

The defendant, after giving a promissory note to the plaintiff, became insolvent, and afterwards promised the plaintiff that he would pay the amount in full, upon which the plaintiff returned to the defendant some articles which the defendant had pledged with him.

Held in an action on the promissory note, that the promise after insolvency to pay the amount did not revive the note and that the suit should have been on the promise made after insolvency.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Malmesbury in an action brought against appellant by respondent to recover a sum of £12 10s. upon a promissory note.

Mr. Benjamin was for appellant (Johannes Jacobus de Vos); there was no appearance for respondent (Thomas Joseph Smith).

Having heard counsel in argument, Do Villiers, C.J.: The defendant in this suit was sued upon a promissory note made by him before the date of the sequestration of his estate. The Insolvent Ordinance indicates the course which creditors should take upon the insolvency of the debtor, that is to say, they should prove their debts to the satisfaction of the Master. If that rule applies to an ordinary case, a fortiori, it would apply to a debt such as the present one, which was a debt incurred for the purpose of obtaining the sequestration of this estate, incurred, therefore, before the date of the insolvency. The only manner in which the plaintiff could recover the amount of the promissory note was by proving his debt. Instead, however, of proving the debt, he made some arrangement according to his statement with the insolvent, after the insolvency, by which he was to be paid the amount in full. According to his statement, upon the promise being made, he returned to the insolvent a policy and a typewriter which he had received from the defendant. Now, clearly this policy and the typewriter, at all events prima facie, belonged to the insolvent estate. There is nothing to indicate here that these were things which the insolvent was entitled to dispose of. But there is a further objection. If the plaintiff relies upon the promise made after insolvency, then clearly he took the wrong course in seeking to recover judgment upon a promissory note which had been made before the insolvency. The action is not in respect of a promissory note made after insolvency, but it is an action upon a promissory note made before insolvency. The action should be founded upon the promise and not upon the promissory note, which had been made before the sequestration. The Magistrate's attention was not called to the case of Quin Bros. v. Van der Merwe (9 Juta, 217). He relied entirely upon the case of Dick v. Pote (7 Buchanan's E.D. Court Reports, 747), but there it was only decided that "a verbal promise by an insolvent after his insolvency to pay a promissory note made before insolvency gives rise to an illiquid cause of action only, and not to an action on the promissory note as a liquid document." So that, even according to that decision, the plaintiff was wrong in suing upon the promissory note, but he ought to have sued upon that illiquid claim which arose after insolvency. It appears to me, therefore, that the appeal ought to be allowed, with costs, in this Court and the Court below, and judgment entered for absolution from the instance.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

SHERWOOD V. HOWARD AND SCOTT. 1906.
{ July 30th.

Mr. McGregor (for the plaintiff) moved for judgment in terms of referee's report. Mr. McGregor said that the referee (Mr. Ransome) made a small addendum as to the amount still to be due. He was instructed that there was a mistake, and that a certain sum had been omitted, and he would ask the Court to give judgment for the amount found due on that reference.

Buchanan, J., said that judgment would be entered for the plaintiff for £234 17s. 2d.

Counsel having been heard on the question of costs,

Buchanan, J.: Plaintiff is entitled to the ordinary costs of suit, including costs of reference. The only question that remains open is the question of costs of the jury trial. As I remarked at the trial, this was about the worst possible case that could be submitted to a jury. There were some 30 or 40 items in the account, and two questions only were put to the jury. On one question, the jury decided in favour of the plaintiff, and on the other, in favour of the defendants. Judgment will be for the plaintiff, with costs, including costs of reference, each party to pay their own costs of the jury trial.

REX V. HOFFMANN.
 REX V. SAACKS AND HOFFMANN. } 1906.
 MANN. } July 31st.

Accomplices — Arson — Brandstichting — Burning house with intent to defraud or otherwise injure Insurance Company—Ordinance 72 of 1830, Sec. 12.

While it is the duty of a judge presiding at a criminal trial at which accomplices give evidence against the accused, to warn the jury against convicting without corroboration on material facts, the Court will not interfere with the conviction, after such warning, if the jury believed the accomplices, and there was satisfactory evidence aliunde that the offence charged had been actually committed by some one, although there be no other corroboration.

On the trial of the appellant for arson, two accomplices, who had already been convicted, gave evidence that they had been employed by him to set fire to the house, and there was the independent evidence of two constables that there were clear indications of the fire having been wilfully caused.

Held, that there was not sufficient ground for disturbing the verdict.

Semble, that setting fire to a man's own house with intent to defraud or otherwise injure an Insurance Company, constitutes the crime of "brandstichting" or arson.

This was an appeal upon certain points reserved at the trial of appellants on charges of arson and attempted arson at the May Criminal Sessions. There were two sets of prisoners. The first set—William Hoffmann and Blumenthal—were indicted for the crime of arson in setting fire to certain premises known as the Dominion Tobacco Factory, with intent to defraud certain insurance companies. The other two prisoners—Hoffmann and Saacks—were indicted for the crime of attempted arson in trying to set fire to another building with intent to defraud certain insurance companies. Of the first prisoners Blumenthal was acquitted, the jury apparently taking the view that Blumenthal was a sort of innocent agent, not understanding what he was doing, while Hoffmann was convicted. Practically the whole of the evidence which was given against the prisoners was given by two convicts named Bailey and Kline. The point reserved in Hoffmann's case was whether by the law of the Colony, as it at present stands, a conviction can be sustained upon the uncorroborated testimony of accomplices other than the corroboration of the fact that a crime had been committed, and, in case this question were decided against the prisoner, whether there was upon the record such evidence as corroborative evidence. Then there was another point reserved in Hoffmann's case, and it was this: that in order to prove that there was an attempt to defraud the insurance companies, it was necessary to put in the insurance policies. A copy was tendered and it was objected to, but the learned Judge (Mr. Justice Maasdorp) overruled that. The point then reserved was whether secondary evidence of the contents of the insurance policies should have been admitted under the circumstances proven.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Upington) was for the appellants; Mr. Howel Jones was for the Crown.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What has the insurance to do with this case at all? If it is arson, then it is arson at another man's house. The house did not belong to Hoffmann. There is no evidence of insurance required in the case.]

Sir H. Juta: The crime charged is having maliciously set fire to the place, and in order to prove that there was some malice about the whole matter, it had to be shown that there was some reason why it should be set on fire.

[De Villiers, C.J.: If I set fire to another man's place it is presumed to be done maliciously. In this case, according to the indictment, the house was the property, not of Hoffmann, but of Mrs. Hall. Therefore, if the indictment stood as it had originally stood, then the insurance would have been of importance.]

Sir H. Juta: That is so, my lord. Counsel (proceeding) said that, with regard to the other case, the point taken was the same as in the first, viz., that there was corroboration required of the evidence of the accomplices, other than merely the fact that a crime was attempted to be committed. Counsel went on to state the circumstances of the case, leading up to the first indictment. He submitted that on three important points the story of Kline was contradicted by the circumstances of the case. In the first place, the oil was not benzine, as was stated by Kline, and the tins were not there that Kline said he had put there. The oil found there appeared to have been machinery oil. Then there were signs of two persons having been there, whereas Kline said that he was there alone. Again, as to the way in which an entrance had been effected, his story was contradicted by the evidence of the persons who afterwards examined the premises, to see how the place was entered. In regard to the other case, the story was that Kline went up to a house some months later. In order to give due notice to the police, he drove up to the premises about 8 or 9 o'clock, and took benzine with him. The police arrested him.

[De Villiers, C.J.: At all events there is corroboration here. Here they find the benzine in the man's possession.]

Sir H. Juta: Well, he had benzine, it is true, and he drove up to this house, but surely nobody would call that evidence of a crime attempted to be committed—that a man between 8 and 9 o'clock drives up in a cab with some tins of benzine, he puts them into the premises and brings them out.

[Hopley, J.: Your argument is that it was not an attempt to commit a crime, but it was a sort of conspiracy to get somebody else into trouble?]

Sir H. Juta: That is my theory. Proceeding, counsel said that the question rested upon the Ordinance 72 of 1830. That Ordinance, when it was passed, was evidently intended to follow on the lines of the law of evidence prevailing in England at the time.

[De Villiers, C.J.: If this Court has four times decided this point can we go back upon those decisions? There must be some finality in these matters.]

Sir H. Juta: If the question is no longer open, there is nothing for me to say upon this point. I can only say that certainly different views have been taken at different times.

[De Villiers, C.J.: There are very few points of law on which different views are not taken at different times.]

Sir H. Juta: No doubt, but it is because these different views are taken in that way that I submit one can at any rate now ask, as there is a full bench, whether the question is not one, considering the high standing of some of the judges that have held in regard to this matter—

[De Villiers, C.J.: But has it not been decided by a full Court before?]

Sir H. Juta: I am not sure, but I think it has been.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Yes.]

Sir H. Juta: There is no doubt that the later decisions are to the effect that all that is required is proof aliunde of a crime. The question is whether the Act meant that. The main motif that runs through the whole of that Ordinance was to adopt the laws of evidence to those which obtain in England. There is no doubt, although it was not a rule of law in evidence, it was a well-established principle that there must be not only some corroboration, but something which would corroborate the evidence of an accomplice so as to identify or connect the prisoner with the crime.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I think the practice universally adopted by the Judges here is to warn the jury, to caution them against convicting upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice, but if, notwithstanding such warning, the jury found the accused guilty, then the Court is bound under this Act if there is corroboration of the fact that a crime has been committed to confirm the conviction.]

Sir H. Juta submitted that the framers of the Ordinance had in their minds throughout the practice in the English Court. Counsel cited Regina v. De Kock (1 Roscoe, 441), Queen v. Diedrich and Another (3 Laurence's High Court Reports, 359), Queen v. Bitterbosch and Others (3 Laurence's High Court Reports, 495), Regina v. Swart (6 Shiel, 102), Rex v. Tswalatunga (20 Supreme Court Reports, 425), Queen v. Adams (4 Shiel, 122), Rex v. Charteris (21, Supreme Court Reports, 441), and Rex v. Matyolweni and Others (21 Supreme Court Reports, 368). Counsel afterwards argued that there was no corroborative evidence of the commission or attempted commission of a crime. In the second case especially he submitted that there was no proof aliunde of an attempt to commit a crime. Kline could never have made an attempt in regard to the second building to commit arson. To prove crime an overt criminal act must be proved. Queen v. Topken and Another (1 Ap., 471).

[De Villiers, C.J., intimated that they would hear Mr. Jones on the last point.]

Mr. Jones said that he had not come into Court to meet this point. At the trial, the point was not raised as to whether there was upon the record corroboration of the fact that a crime had been committed. This point never arose at all during the trial, and he submitted that, by the Act of 1886, it could not now be raised. On the point of whether aliunde there was proof that a crime had been committed, counsel submitted that there was ample evidence that a crime had been committed.

[De Villiers, C.J., asked counsel to confine his attention to the case against Saacks and Hoffmann.]

Mr. Jones said that Kline took the benzine at the instigation of the accused, and he left the benzine on the premises, 65, Burg-street. The crime was complete, so far as Hoffmann and Saacks were concerned, when Kline went and took the benzine to the premises. If a man gave another man money to commit a crime, and that man made the attempt, surely it was sufficient to convict the instigator.

[De Villiers, C.J.: When was the attempt made to commit the arson?]

Mr. Jones: When he took the benzine to the premises.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But he took the tins out again.]

Mr. Jones: Yes, but he had left them there, and the jury had to consider the whole of the circumstances.

[De Villiers, C.J.: In the other case there was evidence of preparation for arson, but in this case there was no evidence of preparation for arson.]

Mr. Jones pointed out that it was in evidence that Hoffmann paid the expenses of the defence of Kline when he was charged with housebreaking with intent to commit arson.

[Hopley, J.: For breaking into Hoffmann's own property?]

Mr. Jones: Yes.

[Hopley, J.: That is a very curious proceeding.]

Mr. Jones having been heard further, and Sir H. Juta having briefly replied, De Villiers, C.J.: In the case of William Hoffmann the following questions were reserved: "(1) Whether by the law of the Colony, as it at present stands, a conviction can be sustained upon the uncorroborated testimony of accomplices other than the corroboration of the fact that a crime has been committed." I think the form in which the question should have been put is not quite correct, for it should have said, "the crime has been committed," and in that form it will be answered. "And in case the first question is decided against the prisoners, (2) whether there is upon the record such evidence as corroborative evidence." That is again rather awkwardly put, but I take the question to mean this, whether there is upon the record corroboration of the fact that the crime had been committed. "(3) Whether secondary evidence of the contents of the insurance policy should have been admitted under the circumstances proven." As to the first question, the best answer is to quote the terms of the 12th section of the Ordinance 72 of 1830: "And be it further enacted and declared, that it shall and may be lawful and competent for any Court or jury in any case which shall or may be lawfully tried by such Court or jury respectively, to convict any person who shall be tried before any such Court or jury, of any crime or offence charged in the indictment, information or complaint under trial on the single evidence of any such accomplice as aforesaid. Provided always that such crime or offence shall, by competent evidence, other than the single and unconfirmed evidence of such accomplice, be proved to the satisfaction of such Court or jury respectively to have been actually committed. Sir Henry Juta wishes the Court, in fact, to read this proviso as if the words had been added, "actually committed by the accused." Now, that is not what is said by the Legislature, and not a single case has been cited in which it has been held that this corroborative evidence must be evidence to the effect that the accused committed the crime. The Court has continually decided here that it is sufficient to prove that the crime which has been mentioned in the indictment has been committed. The cases which have been relied upon by Sir H. Juta do not, in my opinion, support his contention at all. In the case of Regina v. De Kock (1 Roscoe, 441), I think the remarks of the Chief Justice clearly show that he took the same view which the Court has afterwards taken. There the appellant was a sheep owner, and two of his shepherds were accused by him of taking, one a sheep and the other a goat. They gave information that the appellant, on the mountains in 1865, caught two stray sheep and marked them with his own mark. One Morkel gave evidence that he lost sheep on the mountains in 1865. If Morkel had given evidence that the sheep which were found afterwards with the mark of the accused were sheep which had been stolen from him, the case would have been in point. The Chief Justice, however, was of opinion that the unsupported evidence of accomplices should not be taken as proof of the commission of a crime, and the evidence of Morkel should not be considered as any corroboration. In the case of Queen v. Bitterbosch the learned Judge-President said: "Had these prisoners been tried before a jury, the Judge would have warned them that it was unsafe to convict on such evidence." And because in such a case the jury would have acquitted, the learned Judge-President held that as this was a case before a Resident Magistrate, the judgment should not be confirmed. Mr. Justice Laurence also thought it was the duty of the Magistrate as a Judge, to warn himself, as a juror, that it was unsafe to convict on such evidence as he had before him. He does not say that it would have been illegal for a jury so to convict. The warning mentioned by him is invariably given by Judges where the conviction depends upon the evidence of accomplices, but it has always been held by this Court that, as a matter of law, the jury may convict provided that evidence aliunde is given to prove that the crime charged in the indictment has been actually committed by someone. Such was the effect of the decision of a full Court of three judges in Regina v. Schwartz (6 Sheil, 102), and it is really too late to question the correctness of that decision. Coming to the question raised in the present case, whether there is clear proof that the crime of arson has been actually committed, we have first of all the evidence of Bisset, of the Fire Brigade, who says it was evident that there had been a deliberate attempt to burn this place, and who speaks as to finding bundles of matches upstairs. Then there is the evidence of Grant, the detective head constable, who also was at the fire. He said he noticed footprints and bundles of matches, oil on the ground, and rags attached to the goods, with the apparent object of setting them on fire. Part of the things were actually burnt and traces of the arson were found in other parts. This evidence is quite independent of the evidence of the two accomplices, Kline and Bailey, so that the second question also raised in this case must be answered against the accused. Then there is the third question, as to the insurance policy. Well, I do not think it is necessary to go into that question at all, because evidence of the insurance policy was not required. This was a case in which the accused was charged in the indictment as amended with setting fire to a certain house there situate, and in the estate of the late Annie Sarah Hall, and it was therefore not necessary for the purposes of conviction in that case to prove that it was done for the purpose of the insurance at all. Where a person attempts to set fire to the house of another person he is guilty of an attempt to commit arson, whether there is any intent to fraudulently obtain insurance money or not. Where a person burns his own house the question whether he is guilty of "brandetiching" or arson must, under any law, depend upon the further question whether the deed was done with the object of injuring others (Van der Linden, Inst., 2, 4, 7). If the object be to defraud an insurance company the intent would certainly be to injure another so as to bring the offence within the definition. But here the house itself belonged to another person although the goods inside belonged to the appellant. The two first questions must be decided against the appellants.

Buchanan and Hopley, J.J., concurred.

REVIEW.

REX V. THYS AND OTHERS. } 1906.
Aug. 1st.

Native location—Private property
—Act 45 of 1882.

Hopley, J.: A matter came before me in review from the Special Justice of the Peace of Vosburg, District of Victoria West, in which some dozen or so people who, by their names, I should say, were Hottentots, were charged with contravening Section 15 of the Municipal Act of 1882 in that on a certain day "they made a noise or disturbance upon private property within the municipality, so as to be a public nuisance in the neighbourhood of such property." The evidence is that some police constables hearing a distant noise, went up to a location and found these people shouting and dancing and making a great noise in the location. The first point that occurs to me is the question of whether a location would be private property within the meaning of the section. But that is not the only difficulty with regard to this record. There must be some regulation or other promulgated under the Municipal Act, because certainly the 15th section does not apply to such an offence as this. That section of the Municipal Act deals with persons who may be electors or who may be elected. Under the circumstances it seems to me that with the irregularities in this record, the doubts which it raises are so great that the proceedings must be quashed. Proceedings quashed.

Mr. Alexander (for defendant) submitted that unnecessary costs had been incurred by plaintiff in coming to court to obtain confirmation of the writ of arrest, seeing that defendant had furnished security, and that he intended to defend the plaintiff's claim, on the ground that he had received no consideration for the notes in question.

DRUMMOND V. HAMMOND AND CO., LTD.

Dr. Greer (for applicant) moved for leave to sign judgment against Hammond and Co., for not proceeding with their action within the time stipulated by the Rules of Court.

Mr. Upington (for respondents) said that the respondents had given notice of motion for leave to purge default, and he now applied for leave to file plea.

Affidavits having been read, and counsel heard in argument,

Hopley, J.: The first application I have to deal with is one to remove the bar which has been filed against the plaintiffs proceeding with their action. It would appear that they had more than two months ago summoned the defendant Drummond in an action for debt. For some reason which they have not explained, they allowed the time fixed by the Rules of Court to go by, so that they may be barred, and the defendant become entitled to apply for judgment to be signed against them. He has now set such an application down for hearing to-day, but the original plaintiffs also put down a motion for the purpose of getting their default purged. Now, it is usual in such a case that the plaintiff or defendant, or whoever wishes to purge his default and get rid of the effect of his own laches, if he shows merits and cause for removing the bar, to pay the costs so entailed. I think that the bar in this case should be removed, because, clearly, the plaintiffs have shown good merits and some good reasons why this matter should be reopened, and they should be allowed to purge their default. At the same time they have not given any reasons at all why they were in default. They may have good reasons. Certain things are within the knowledge of the Court, such as, for instance, that the plaintiffs have had to prosecute their local manager and remove their business back to London, and so on, and the circumstances may be such as to give them some sort of excuse, especially when the circumstances were known at the time to the defendant. He has lain by and tried to take advantage of the difficult position of the plaintiffs. Then there is the vast discrepancy between what is upon the documents and what the respondent puts on affidavit. That disinclines me from being too favourable to him in the matter of costs. The order of the Court will be that the bar be removed, and leave given to the applicants to file their declaration, costs to be reserved. The other matter, for leave to sign judgment, will therefore fall away. There will be no order on that application.

COLONIAL GOVERNMENT V. DUBOIS.

This was an application for leave to sign judgment against respondent for not proceeding with his action within the time stipulated by the Rules of Court. Sir H. Juta, K.C., was for applicants; Mr. Pyemont was for respondent.

Affidavits having been read,

Mr. Pyemont said he was instructed to crave the indulgence of the Court, so as to secure an extension of time for the filing of plaintiff's declaration, provided that the case be tried in the October term. He stated that respondent had proceeded to London, with a view of obtaining an appointment in Morocco or Algeria.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

Hopley, J.: In this case, if in any way I could see that according to the Rules of Court or commonsense I should be able to assist the respondent, I should be inclined to do so, because one does not like to make matters more difficult for a person who has a claim against a defendant like the Government, Government which is always here, which is part of the country, and which, unless there were some cogent reason shown, such as the loss of testimony, one cannot conceive, would suffer very much damage by the delay which the plaintiff might be lax enough to allow in the prosecution of his case. At the same time, the Rules of Court are made for everybody, and amongst others for the Government of this country to abide by. If they break the Rules of Court, they suffer for it, and so they also have a right to take advantage of the Rules of Court. The respondent has made a claim for unlawful dismissal, apparently, from the Constantia Wine Farm, where, I think, he was manager, and more than a month after making such claims, by issuing summons to that effect claiming a large sum of money—£5,000—he left this country. It is now explained that he went away suddenly, because he saw some prospect—a prospect only, a hazy prospect, not founded upon anything apparently but hope—that he might get employment in Algeria or Morocco, and so he left this country, as far as one can see, without any definite instructions to his attorneys to proceed in the matter. At all events, nothing has been done, this claim for £5,000 is hanging over the applicants, they want to get rid of it, and they, therefore, come under the Rules of Court and say the requisite time has elapsed, and ask that this claim should be dismissed and judgment should be signed against the plaintiff. It is now said that I should accord some indulgence to him, because he went away for a bona fide purpose, and for the purpose apparently of getting funds to enable him to fight the action. But it is not explained to me Low, if he gets this employment, he is going to be able to fight this action. It seems to me that the fact of getting employment somewhere in the North of Africa would rather have the opposite effect. I think an application like the present is very much strengthened by the fact of the person who is in default actually leaving the country and going thousands of miles away, whence it would be very unlikely that he would return for the purpose of prosecuting a doubtful claim. I do not say that this is a doubtful claim, but at all events there are always two sides to a case. So that, rather than let this matter be hanging on, I think this application should be acceded to. Of course, this won't debar Mr. Dubois when he comes back to this country, if he gets funds, from bringing his action afresh. He will then, I suppose, have to pay the costs incurred up to this stage, but he may start his action de novo. It seems to me that all the law, the procedure, and the equity of the case is in favour of acceding to the present application. Judgment, therefore, will be signed against the plaintiff (Mr. Dubois) as prayed.

Mr. Pyemont asked if leave would be granted to the plaintiff to move to set aside the judgment, instead of proceeding de novo.

Hopley, J., said that he did not see how any advantage would accrue to plaintiff if he gave such leave. The application of the Government would be granted, with costs.

Ex parte VAN LITSENBORGH.

Bail—Charge of murder.

The Court admitted a woman charged with murder to bail; the Crown consenting thereto.

This was an application upon notice to the Attorney-General for an order for the release of petitioner on bail. Mr. Burton was for petitioner; Mr. Nightingale was for the Crown.

Mr. Burton said that the applicant had been arrested on a charge of child murder. Her daughter had given birth to a child. The daughter had also been arrested on a charge of concealment of birth, but she had been released on bail. Counsel also applied for the release of applicant on bail.

Mr. Nightingale consented to the application, and suggested that bail should be fixed in personal recognisances of £500 and two sureties of £500 to the satisfaction of the Resident Magistrate of Piquetberg.

Order granted for release of applicant on bail, of her own recognisances of £500 and two sureties of £500, to the satisfaction of the Resident Magistrate of Piquetberg.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

COOPER V. MEYER. { 1906.
 { Aug. 1st.

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan moved, in terms of consent paper, for the removal of trial to the ensuing Circuit Court to be held at George.

Application granted in terms of consent, costs to be costs in the cause.

ALGOA MILLING CO. V. BELL AND CO.

This was an application by the Algoa Milling Company for leave to purge default and file plea in an action brought against them by respondents, which is set down for hearing on the 10th August.

From the affidavits, it appeared that there had been correspondence between the parties with a view to a compromise, but that this had not been arrived at, and that eventually applicants were barred from pleading.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Upington), was for applicants; Sir H. Juta, K.C., was for respondents.

Mr. Schreiner said it was really extraordinary that opposition should be offered to such an application as this, and he asked that the Court should mark its sense of the attitude of respondents by ordering them to pay wasted costs. It was impossible, after the breaking off of negotiations to communicate with applicants, who were at Port Elizabeth, in a case of such a detailed and commercial nature within the time allowed by the Rules of Court. The case involved an important point of commercial law in regard to a c.i.f. contract. The respondents had never produced the charter party of the Benares, and there was no basis upon which applicants could make a tender.

Sir H. Juta submitted that in this case there was absolutely no bona fide desire to deal with the matter at issue, but that it was merely a question of gaining time and nothing more. Defendants had admitted that they were liable. The matter arose out of a contract for certain Australian wheat to be shipped to the Milling Company on certain terms. Plaintiffs alleged that they complied with the contract. The declaration went on to say that thereafter defendants gave notice that they refused to carry out this contract, and thereupon the wheat was sold, as plaintiffs alleged, at the best possible price in the market, and they now sued for the difference in price. Defendants now pleaded non-liability.

Hoploy, J.: In this matter it seems to me that there is a considerable amount of money involved; as far as I can see, there are also some points of law involved, and there seems to have been considerable correspondence between the parties, starting with a view of avoiding litigation, and upon which correspondence it might possibly be said that one or other of the parties would not be too strenuously pushed. Every party has a right to take advantage of the wording and strict letter of the Rules of Court; but still, in the application of such rules, the Court is always guided by equitable principles to see that they are not made use of for the purpose of obtaining an unfair advantage. I do not say that there has been such an attempt in the present case, but, at all events, the correspondence has been prolonged until after the 11th July; there are statements on the 17th July asking the applicants to be quick, or they would be barred, and I have no reason to suppose that the present applicants are misstating the facts when they say that between the 17th, when they knew they would really be required to plead or suffer the consequences of not pleading, and the 24th July, they had no opportunity of satisfactorily drawing and filing their plea. On the 24th July they were able to tender and put forth a plea, the merits of which I cannot estimate, but it is one which eminent counsel in this court consider to be a statement of their case upon which they are entitled to defend this action. The question is whether, under the circumstances, the tender of the 24th July was not a reasonable tender, especially in view of the fact that it was accompanied with an offer to pay wasted costs. The Court is always loth to shut out a defendant, who says that he has a genuine defence—and here I am told he has a genuine defence—from setting his case forward, simply because he has allowed a certain time to elapse. Relief is almost constantly given in such cases, and I think this is a case where relief should be given. The order will be that the bar be removed, and defendants have leave to file their plea. Defendants, however, I think should be kept to their offer to pay wasted costs, in terms of their tender of 24th July, costs after that date to be costs in the cause. The set down of the action for the 10th August will, therefore, be removed from the list.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

PROBAART V. ESTATE { 1906.
PROBAART. { Aug. 2nd.

Husband and wife—Mutual will —Election.

Husband and wife, married in community, directed by mutual will that three-fourths of the joint estate should be invested and the interest thereon paid to the survivor, and that, on the death of the survivor, the respective heirs of the testators should take their respective shares. After the death of the husband, the wife, who is plaintiff, received a fourth of the joint estate, unencumbered, and received interest on the remaining three-fourths; and she now claimed to be entitled to receive another unencumbered fourth share, and to continue to receive interest on the remainder of the joint estate.

Held, that having elected to enjoy interest on more than she was entitled to by virtue of community, she was not entitled to claim during her life time that her full half share of the community should be paid to her unencumbered.

This was a special case submitted for the judgment of the Court. The case was stated in the following terms:

1. The plaintiff is the widow of the late Gilbert a'Beckett Probart, to whom she was married in community of property. The only child of the marriage died before his father and whilst still a minor.

On the 25th April, 1901, Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert a'Beckett Probart executed the will, and Gilbert a'Beckett Probart died on the 29th April, 1901, leaving the will of full force and effect, and the defendants are the duly-appointed executors testamentary and assumed—the plaintiff having been nominated as an executor under the will, but having refused to act.

3. By the will it was provided that within six months of the death of the first dying an inventory should be made of the whole of the joint estate, and at least three-fourths of the sum ascertained should, upon recovery of the outstanding debts, or after realisation of any of the property, be invested upon security, and all interest accruing therefrom should be paid to the survivor, and the capital so invested should remain the property of the joint estate until the death of the survivor, when it should be divided amongst the respective heirs of testator and testatrix, as provided in the will.

4. The will further provided that the survivor should be at liberty to retain the household furniture for her use during her life, and to live in a certain dwelling-house free of any rent or charge for same, but, should the survivor elect to sell or dispose of the furniture and dwelling-house, she was authorised and empowered so to do, provided the price for the landed property was approved of by the co-executors. But should she not sell during her lifetime, then the same, with all the other assets of the joint estate, should be realised by public auction after the death of the survivor for the benefit of the said heirs. The remaining landed property was to be realised by auction within six months of the death of the first dying, and all outstandings were to be collected, and the capital obtained should be invested as aforesaid. The testators bequeathed to the survivor all jewellery, to be disposed of at her entire discretion.

5. The will lastly provided "in appointing their respective heirs to all their estate which shall be left at the death of either of them" . . . the testa-tors declared . . . that the testator appointed certain persons his heirs and the testatrix appointed certain different persons her heirs, and "the said persons respectively nominated by the appellants shall be the sole and universal heirs of the respective shares of the testators, provided, however, that such heirs shall not be entitled to claim their inheritance until after the death of the survivor."

6. The executors have framed and filed five liquidation accounts, which have been accepted by the Master, and copies of which are annexed.

7. According to the accounts, the executors have awarded and paid the plaintiff one-quarter of the joint estate and the interest on three-fourths of the joint estate as realised, exclusive of the value of the dwelling-house in paragraph 4 mentioned.

8. The plaintiff has received and enjoyed the possession of the dwelling-house, which is in need of repairs. The plaintiff is desirous of selling the same and disposing of the proceeds as she pleases, but the defendants refuse to allow her to dispose of the proceeds.

The plaintiff contends: (a) That she is entitled to one-quarter of the joint estate by virtue of her husband's will; (b) that she is entitled to one-half of the joint estate by virtue of the community as her absolute property; (c) that she is entitled to receive the interest arising from the remaining quarter of the joint estate; (d) that she is entitled to alienate the quarter and the half by will or otherwise, as she pleases; (e) that the proceeds of the sale of the dwelling-house can be alienated by her as she pleases.

The defendants contend: (a) That plaintiff is not entitled to be paid one-half of the joint estate; (b) that plaintiff, having adiated under the joint will and taken benefits thereunder, her half-share of the joint estate consists of the one-quarter share already paid to her, and of another quarter share which must be administered in terms of the joint will, by which plaintiff is bound and which she cannot alter; or (c) that at the most the plaintiff's share consists of the quarter share already paid to her, and a half share of the balance of the three-fourths invested, which will have to be distributed eventually according to the joint will; (d) that the proceeds of the dwelling-house, if sold during plaintiff's lifetime, must be dealt with according to the five liquidation and distribution accounts already filed, that is, one-quarter to be paid to the survivor and the balance of three-fourths to be invested whereon plaintiff is entitled to the life interest. If the dwelling-house is sold only after plaintiff's death, then the whole of the proceeds should be distributed as in paragraph (b).

Sir H. Juta, K.C., for plaintiff. Mr. Searle, K.C., for defendants.

Sir H. Juta: The question to be decided is whether there has been a massing of the estate. The language is very clear, and his lordship would find that first of all they left certain rings to certain persons, and they said the cost of these should be borne by the joint estate. As regards that no doubt there was a massing, but all the elements which went to make up a massing of the estate, namely, the joint disposition to some common heirs were entirely wanting in the case. From the way the parties appointed their heirs, each meant to deal with his or her own half. If the will was to be read simply as the will of the first dying, then the plaintiff was entitled as widow to the benefits. If it was clear, on the other hand, that the will of the first dying was dealing with property other than the property of the first dying, then he would admit that it was a question of election. Counsel submitted that the testator was not dealing, and did not intend dealing, with more than his own half.

Mr. Searle said it was not so much a question of massing as it was one of election. It was difficult to argue that there had been a consolidation of the joint estate after the death of the survivor. Counsel submitted it was quite clear from the first page of the will that they intended dealing with the whole of their joint estate. Mrs. Probart could not take her clear half now because she has had benefits under the will. She had had the usufruct of the three-quarters but she could still dispose of the quarter share to other heirs if she wished.

De Villiers, C.J.: This will is in many respects an extraordinary one, but one point is perfectly clear, and that is that during the lifetime of the survivor the will itself disposes of more than the deceased testator was entitled to dispose of. The parties were married in community of property. Therefore, without the consent of the plaintiff the testator could not have directed an investment of three-fourths of the joint estate, of which one-half belonging to him. He, therefore, directed by his will an investment of one-quarter which did not belong to him at all. It does appear that after the death of the survivor the shares are to come back to the respective heirs, but that does not affect the point which I am now considering. It would be a perfectly intelligible contention if, even now at the eleventh hour, the plaintiff said: "I now demand my one-half of the estate." That would be perfectly intelligible, and there is nothing in the case of the South African Association v. Mostert (Buch. 1868, p. 236-1869, p. 231-1873, p. 31, L.J., P.C. 1872, p. 41), which would prevent her setting up that claim. In that case it was held there was a general disposition, but as the survivor had not accepted benefits, she was entitled to repudiate the will. In the present case—I do not decide the point—it may well be argued that as the property is not here consolidated into one mass for the purposes of joint disposition one of the conditions fail, and that, therefore, she is entitled to revoke the will. The plaintiff's proposition is that she can take the benefit of the interest to which she is not entitled, and yet she is entitled to claim her half-share. Here the doctrine of election comes into play. If she does not repudiate the will, but accepts benefits to which she is not entitled out of the joint estate, she cannot retain those benefits and at the same time reject a portion of the will. That being so, I am of opinion that the plaintiffs' contentions cannot be upheld in full, nor does it appear to me that the defendants' contentions can be upheld. The view I take of the case is that there should be a declaration as follows: (a) That the plaintiff is entitled to one-quarter of the joint estate under the will; (b) that having elected to take interest on more than her one-half share of the estate she is not entitled during her lifetime to claim any portion of the three-quarters of the joint estate directed by the will to be invested; (c) that she is entitled during her lifetime to interest on such three-quarters; (d) that she is entitled to alienate one-half of the joint estate by will; (e) that one-quarter of the proceeds of the dwelling-house, if sold during the plaintiff's lifetime, must be paid to the plaintiff, and the balance of three-quarters invested as directed by the will. If sold after her death one-half of the proceeds to belong to her estate, and the remaining half to the estate of the testator. The costs to come out of the joint estate.

Defendant said that he was a publican carrying on business at the United South African Hotel, Cape Town, and the matter in dispute arose out of the terms on which he took over the hotel.

Mr. Pyemont read a replying affidavit by plaintiff, who denied that the position was correctly stated by defendant, but said that he had no wish to resume the business of publican, and he would accept defendant's proposal to pay £33 2s. and give a promissory note for £450, provided that he (Kahn) paid the costs.

Buchanan, J.: There is no dispute really between the parties now. Provisional sentence will be granted for £33 2s., defendant within three days to give renewal for balance of promissory note sued upon, with interest, in terms of contract between the parties. As to the costs of the suit, the plaintiff was clearly entitled to come into court in this case, and he must have his costs. Judgment for plaintiff, with costs.

KLEYHAUS AND ANOTHER V. KLEYHAUS

This was an application for leave to purge default in an action instituted by respondent (Theodorus Bernardus Kleyhaus) against his wife for divorce by reason of her alleged adultery with the second named applicant (Jacobus Johannes Parsons), against whom damages in the sum of £1,000 are claimed. Applicants asked for leave to file their pleas to the plaintiff's claims. Mrs. Kleyhaus also applied for an order against her husband to pay her a sum of £250, to enable her to defend the action and payment of alimony at the rate of £20 per month, pending determination of the suit.

It was stated that Mrs. Kleyhaus also counter-claimed for a divorce from her husband by reason of his alleged adultery, with several women, and the second defendant (Parsons) also counter-claims against him for damages for slander. The parties reside at Barkly East, plaintiff being owner of the farm Branksome.

Mr. Burton was for applicants; Dr. Greer was for respondent.

Affidavits having been read, and counsel heard.

Buchanan, J.: The present application involves three points. As to the first there is no difficulty at all, the parties being willing to meet each other. Defendants in this case wish to have leave granted to purge their default, and file their pleas. Plaintiff is quite willing that they should have leave. Applicants will be granted leave to file their pleas on or before Saturday, the 4th inst. The question of costs of purging default may very well stand over until the trial. An action is brought by Kleyhans against his wife, and the co-defendant and the co-defendant is defending, and he may or may not have to pay costs of this default. The trial will be fixed for the 28th inst., which will give the parties plenty of time to get their witnesses ready. That disposes of the second question. The third application is for an order upon Kleyhans to pay his wife a sum of money to enable her to defend the case, and also for alimony. The parties, it is alleged, are married in community of property, and when that is the case it is not unusual to grant the wife, who is otherwise unable to defend the action, some means to enable her to do so. But in this case it is clear that the wife has money; it is not denied that she received recently £193 from her father's estate, and she has got £100 odd still in her possession. Then, again, the co-defendant is joining in the defence. As to alimony, the trial will take place this month, and it is unnecessary to make any order; but, as the witnesses live in the country, I think the plaintiff should pay to the first defendant's solicitors a sum of £50 for the purposes of the defence. I think the sum of £250 is altogether out of the question. The plaintiff will, therefore, be ordered to pay a sum of £50 to the defendant's solicitors within fourteen days.

Ex parte JANSEN.

This was an application by Roelof Andries Jansen, in his capacity as trustee in the insolvent estate of Annie S. Priest, of Graaff-Reinet, for an order cancelling the commission granted by this Court for the examination of the insolvent and other persons concerning the dealings of the insolvent. Mr. M. Bisset was for petitioner; Mr. P. S. T. Jones, for certain creditors, opposed the application.

Mr. Jones submitted that the whole matter demanded a public inquiry.

Buchanan, J.: These creditors who are opposing can, if they choose, go on with the inquiry at their own cost. The other creditors do not wish to indulge in further costs, and they cannot be compelled to do so. The commission will be re-called, unless the opposing creditors are prepared to furnish the costs for the commission within one month. It was unnecessary for the trustee to come to court with this application, and he might have folded his arms and done nothing further.

Mr. Bisset applied for costs of the present and a previous application.

His Lordship: The costs of both applications will come out of the estate.

Ex parte BOTHA.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for leave to pass transfer of certain property in the Graaff-Reinet district, in the estate Theron, in which petitioner is one of the executors.

Order granted as prayed.

Buchanan, J., intimated that in cases of this kind it was necessary to present the fullest possible information to the Court.

Ex parte UYS.

Dr. Rainsford moved for leave to pass transfer of certain property, in the district of Swellendam, in the estate Uys, in which petitioner is executor testamentary.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte SWART.

Mr. De Waal moved, on the petition of the brother and tutor of certain minors, for leave to sell a certain farm, situate in the district of Humansdorp, so as to save the expenses of partition. The major brothers and sisters of the minors had accepted the offer made for their undivided shares.

Buchanan, J., said he did not think the offer of the purchasers was sufficient. However, in the interests of the minors, and in order to save further expense, he thought it would be better to grant the order. An order would be granted as prayed.

Ex parte CLOETE.

Mr. Upington moved, as a matter of urgency, for the attachment of a certain inheritance, which has become due to one Carl Jacobus Steyn, and for leave to sue the respondent by edictal citation for £34 on an overdue promissory note, with interest. It was stated that respondent was living on Christian de Wet's farm at Heilbron, O.R.C.

Leave granted to attach and to sue by edictal citation, personal service, citation to be returnable on the 12th September.

FLETCHER V. FLETCHER.

Mr. Watermeyer moved, on the petition of Sarah M. A. Fletcher, for leave to sue her husband in forma pauperis for divorce.

Ordered to stand over pending petitioner's appearance before the Court in person.

Petitioner afterwards appeared in person.

The matter was referred to Mr. Watermeyer for the usual certificate.

Ex parte NEL AND OTHERS.

Mr. Watermeyer moved, on the petition of certain heirs in the estate Ferreira, for leave to mortgage certain landed property in the division of Uniondale, and for the appointment of a tutor to a minor.

Order granted as prayed; Marthinus Petrus J. Ferreira appointed curator to the minor, and authorised to assist the minor to take all necessary steps.

KAPLAN V. RADEMEYER AND OTHERS.

Dr. Rainsford moved for an award of arbitrators to be made a rule of court.

Award made a rule of court, with costs, as provided in deed of submission.

Ex parte VERSTER.

Mr. Payne moved to make absolute a certain rule nisi, authorising petitioner to sue his wife in forma pauperis.

Rule absolute, Mr. Payne to be counsel, and Messrs. Syfret, Godlonton and Low attorneys to the petitioner.

Ex parte MARAIS.

Mr. Watermeyer moved to make absolute a certain rule nisi, authorising the Registrar of Deeds to issue a certified copy of certain bonds.

Rule absolute.

Ex parte THE ZUID AFRIKAANSCH ERYTUIG EN BOUW MAATSCHAPPIJ BEPERKT.

Mr. Watermeyer moved to make absolute a certain rule nisi, authorising reduction of the company's capital.

Rule absolute.

Ex parte KLOPPER.

Dr. Greer moved for leave to petitioner to sue in her own name one Robert Russell Hunter for arrears maintenance of a child. Petitioner said that she was deserted by her husband in 1901, and she was unaware of his present whereabouts. She intended to sue her husband for divorce. The Registrar refused to issue a summons against Hunter, seeing that she was married in community, unless she had the assistance of her husband. Counsel cited authorities for the application.

Buchanan, J., said that in this case the debt was due to petitioner's husband, and was incurred before the desertion. An order would be granted authorising petitioner to sue Hunter without the assistance of her husband on condition that one-half of any amount recovered be paid to the Master, pending further orders.

Ex parte INSOLVENT ESTATE GOLD-SMITH AND CO.

Mr. Alexander moved for the appointment of Ralph Fernandez as provisional trustee of the insolvent estate of Goldsmith and Co., carrying on business at the corner of Buitenkant and Roelandstreets.

Order granted, appointing Ralph Fernandez as provisional trustee, with power to carry on the business pending appointment of permanent trustee.

OOBERG V. COLONIAL GOVERNMENT.

Pro Deo suit—Conditions—Jury trial.

The plaintiff, who had obtained leave to sue the Colonial Government in forma pauperis, now applied to have her case set down for trial by jury.

Held, that while the Court might attach such conditions as it pleased to the privilege of suing pro Deo, as in this case no conditions had been imposed, the plaintiff had a right to demand a jury.

Mr. Alexander moved for a day to be fixed for trial by jury of an action brought by applicant to recover £10,000 damages for loss of her husband, owing to the alleged wrongful, unlawful, and negligent conduct of servants of the Railway Department at Salt River Station while deceased was alighting from a train on the 7th October last.

Mr. Howel Jones read an affidavit in opposition to the application for trial by jury on the ground that petitioner had failed to give the notice stipulated in the Act 23 of 1891 (section 5). Counsel admitted that he could not really rely upon the point raised in the affidavit. He pointed out, however, that petitioner was suing in forma pauperis, and said that in any event considerable costs would fall upon the Government, and he submitted that she should not be granted privileges which would result in a great increase of costs. The case was a simple one, which could be very easily be tried before a Judge without the assistance of a jury.

Buchanan, J.: When the plaintiff originally applied for leave to sue in forma pauperis it was a privilege which the Court could give her, and the Court in granting the leave to sue in forma pauperis could have attached to that any reasonable conditions which the Court thought fit. Leave was granted without any condition at all, and now that the case has proceeded as far as the closing of pleadings, the plaintiff has, as Mr. Jones is forced to admit, within due time demanded the trial of the case by a jury. Therefore, under the law she is entitled to have a jury. It is too late now, I think, to ask the Court to attach a condition to the leave to sue in forma pauperis. This ought to have been asked for at the time of application for leave to sue. I do not see why the plaintiff should be deprived of the right that she has by law and she must therefore be granted a trial by jury. The case will be set down for trial by jury on August 22

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

LINDLEY V. JONES (ARCH-BISHOP OF CAPE TOWN) AND RECTOR AND CHURCH-WARDENS OF ST. JOHN'S, WYNBERG. 1906. Aug. 3rd.

Church of England—Church of the Province of S. Africa—Amendment of title deed—Act 9 of 1891.

Certain persons having subscribed towards the purchase of ground and the cost of the erection of a church at K., received transfer of this land to the Rector and Church-wardens of St. John's, W., in trust for the parish of St. John's. Applicants now desired to have inserted into the title deed the words "subject to the provisions of Act 9 of 1891, and according to the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England as by law established." The Court granted a rule nisi, calling upon all persons interested to show cause why the words "S. John's Church, W.," should not be substituted for "the parish of St. John's," and why "subject to the provisions of Act 9 of 1891" should not be inserted.

This was an application brought by Mrs. Mary E. Lindley, of Claremont, for an order authorising amendment of trust deed of certain land at Kenilworth, acquired for church purposes. Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Burton) was for applicant; Sir Henry Juta, K.C., was for Dr. West Jones (Archbishop of Cape Town) and the Rev. G. Nuttall Smith (rector of St. John's, Wynberg).

Mr. Schreiner briefly stated the object of the application.

[Buchanan, J.: Was this lady the founder?]

Mr. Schreiner: This application is by the lady who got up the whole thing.

[Buchanan, J.: Does she represent the original contributors?]

Mr. Schreiner: No; she does not represent all the contributors. There is one dead, there is one absent in England, and there is one that has taken no part in the present application one way or another, but all the others are with her.

[Buchanan, J.: I hope that we shall not have any odium theologicum coming into this matter.]

Mr. Schreiner: I hope not, my lord; it is purely a question of making the title of certain land clear.

Mr. Burton read the petition of Mrs. Lindley, who said that she received and contributed certain funds during 1896 and previously, with the object of purchasing a piece of land at Kenilworth for the erection of a church. Petitioner and other persons had conducted a Sunday-school in connection with St. John's Church, Wynberg. In 1897 she had raised by her own contributions, and by donations, sufficient funds to purchase such land, which belonged to one Herbert Wilman, and which was adjacent to land which he had previously allowed them to use for the Sunday-school. A question arose at the time as to the persons in whom the land should vest, and to whom it should be transferred, and eventually it was suggested by the rector of St. John's, Wynberg—a suggestion which petitioner adopted without fully understanding the import thereof—that the land should be transferred to the rector and church-wardens of St. John's in trust for the parish of St. John's, and subject to the condition contained in section 6 of the petition. She annexed to her petition a copy of the deed of transfer conveying the land to the rector and church-wardens aforesaid, and specially directed the Court's attention to the condition appearing in the transfer, to wit, "that the land and any buildings erected thereon shall be used for educational and church purposes in connection with the work of the parish of St. John's, Wynberg, aforesaid, and for no other purposes whatsoever."

Petitioner prayed for an order authorising the amendment of the deed of transfer aforesaid by inserting after the words, "In trust for the parish of St. John's, Wynberg," the words, "and subject to the provisions of Act No. 9 of 1891," and after the words, "purpose whatsoever," to add the words, "always subject to the provisions of Act No. 9 of 1891, and according to the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England, as by law established."

Counsel also read affidavits by Wm. Templer, Buissinne, Herbert Willman, John D. Cartwright, and others to the effect that they contributed to the funds on the understanding that the church at Kenilworth was to be a chapel-of-ease in connection with the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England, as by law established.

Sir H. Juta read a replying affidavit by the Archbishop of Cape Town, who, while leaving the matter to the discretion of the Court, adduced a number of reasons why the title deed should not be altered. He said that if at any time Kenilworth should become a separate parish it would be bound by the Act of 1891 if the prayer of the petitioner were granted, which might lead to unhappy differences, as the petitioners might wish to have the Church unencumbered by an Ordinance binding them to St. John's, Wynberg. He was not aware that the services conducted in the temporary place at Kenilworth and the Wynberg Church were not in accordance with the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England, nor did it appear that there were any grievances existing in the said parish on that account.

Counsel also read affidavits by David Tennant, Alex. Bell, E. F. Kilpin, and T. J. Anderson, mainly to the effect that they had worshipped at St. Saviour's Church, Claremont, they had attended services at Kenilworth, and they had not regarded that Church as an overflow from St. John's. The Rector of St. John's (the Rev. G. Nuttall Smith) said that his consent had not been sought to the present application. The Rector and churchwardens of St. John's were, he urged, the proper parties to make such an application as this. He said that the majority of the parishioners were in favour of close union with the Church of the Province of South Africa.

Mr. Burton read affidavits by Sir C. Abercrombie Smith and C. W. Dowthwaite (churchwardens at Kenilworth), who said that they left the matter entirely to the discretion of the Court.

He also read an affidavit by Mr. Cartwright, who said that the church at Kenilworth was a chapel-of-ease of St. John's, and was licensed as such, and it was on a different footing from other places mentioned by respondents, such as the Ottery-road School-room and the church at Diep River. He went on to say that there was a good deal of discord already in the parish of St. John's, owing to the fact that the Rev. G. Nuttall Smith was strongly advocating union with the Province of South Africa. A very small section of the parishioners would be in favour of joining the Province unconditionally.

Mr. Schreiner said that the petitioner was by no means wedded to any reference in the deed to the Act of 1891, provided it were made clear what were the provisions in relation to the purposes to which the church may be put. His lordship had expressed a hope that there would be no odium theologicum in this matter. One did not see any place for odium theologicum. Surely nobody could wish to keep vague and indeterminate what could be and should be made clear. The church had got as far as the foundations. Now, anyone asked to contribute to the funds would inevitably ask what they meant by "church purposes." Counsel proceeded to quote from the Privy Council case, Merriman v. Williams (47, Law Times Reports, 57), in order to show how necessary it was that the point should be made clear. The gist of the present application was, he said, that such an amendment should be made of the title, as would put this church on the same footing as St. John's, Wynberg. Speaking for those who had moved in the matter, no one wished for a moment to overlook the very tactful, considerate, and, one might say, generous way in which the Archbishop, the head of the Church of the Province, had exercised his Episcopal functions in trying to overcome difficulties and dissensions and differences that subsisted. Since the decision in Merriman v. Williams, one could not overlook the fact that there were two churches.

[Buchanan, J.: We cannot overlook it, and the Church at Wynberg is one of the few that stood out.]

Mr. Schreiner said that, speaking with very great respect of the Archbishop, it was most desirable that the doubt in this matter should be removed.

Sir H. Juta said it was quite clear that this land was bought, and the building on it was partially erected by persons who were worshippers at St. Saviour's, Claremont, and St. John's, Wynberg. Some of them said that they contributed their money for one purpose and some of them said they contributed for another purpose. His lordship was now asked, at the request of some of these people, to amend on motion the trusts in this title deed of 1897. There was no allegation that those trusts were being broken; there was no allegation that the church or the land was being used for any other than the purposes of the trust. The Act of 1891 simply dealt with the church and burial ground of St. John's. It had nothing to do with the parish of St. John's, nor had it anything to do with the rector. Both land and buildings in this case were subject to the trust. The question arose whether the Court could, upon motion of certain people, who had contributed funds towards the purchase of this land and the erection of the church, alter the trust? He submitted that it was unprecedented to have such an application by only a portion of the contributors against the wish of the trustees and without anything to show that the trust had been broken.

Buchanan, J.: I must regard this matter from a strictly legal point of view, and here are the persons selling land and a set of persons buying land, and they have given transfer of this land, and the sellers and purchasers came to the Court and ask the Court to remedy what they say was a mistake in the deeds of transfer to make it clear what was intended to be the contract between them. The purchasers acted on behalf of a body which, though it is an ecclesiastical body, has certain rights, that body being called the St. John's Church of Wynberg. The seller also contributed to the purchase price, and he says that when he so contributed he intended the transfer to be made to St. John's Church at Wynberg. The only difficulty that arises in this case is that all the persons who contributed to the purchase of this property are not now before the Court. All who contributed at the time of the purchase of the land are before the Court, except two, one, Mrs. Anderson, unfortunately since deceased, and another, a former curate of St. John's, Wynberg, who is now in England.

Sir H. Juta (interposing): Also the De Jong family, my lord.

Mr. Schreiner: But they have not made an affidavit.

His Lordship (continuing): As I think it is clear that it was intended by these parties that this property should be vested in the St. John's Church of Wynberg, they are entitled now to a rectification of the title deed. It is argued that there has been no breach of the trust which is expressed in the title deed as it stands now. I think that is a very strong argument why it is a suitable and fitting time now to amend the deed in accordance with the wishes of the parties, before any dispute arises. It may prevent any differences and unpleasantness in the future, and especially feelings which run very high when it comes to a question of religion. I do not wish to affect the parties more than is absolutely necessary, and I think the amendment which the Court, on the affidavits before it, should make, are these, that wherever the words "the parish of St. John's" appear in the deeds, the words should be substituted, "St. John's Church, Wynberg," and that, after the words "conformably to local custom," the words "subject to the provisions of Act No. 9 of 1891" should be inserted. I propose granting a rule nisi calling upon all persons interested who may have contributed to the purchase of the land or of the buildings to show cause why the deed of transfer should not be amended by substituting the words "St. John's Church, Wynberg," for the words "Parish of St. John's, Wynberg," and the insertion, after the words "conformably to local custom" of "subject to the provisions of Act No. 9 of 1891." I shall not go further into the matter. I do not think the parties are entitled to go into the particulars of the Act, and say whether the Church of England or the Church of the Province of South Africa is to be inserted in the title-deed. I think the object was, that this ecclesiastical body, viz., the Church of St. John's, Wynberg, should have transferred to it this adjacent property for its own convenience and for the extension of its own good work. I think sufficient time should be given to enable all persons to come, and a period of three months will not be too much to allow. The rule will be made returnable on the 14th November. I give this rule in order that everybody who may object shall come and be heard before the Court. A rule will be granted calling upon all persons interested to show cause on the 14th November why the title-deed should not be amended, as I have indicated, service to be effected upon the Rev. G. Litchfield, of Sidmouth, England, by registered letter, and one publication to be given in the "Cape Times," "Cape Argus," and "South African News." It would be advisable on the part of applicants to send printed slips to everybody they know of who may be concerned. I do not, however, make that part of the order.

Ex parte THE FEDERAL SUPPLY AND GOLD STORAGE, LTD.

Ex parte THE COLD STORAGE ASSOCIATION.

Partnership—Winding-up order—Companies' Act.

A certain association, formed for the purpose of controlling the trade in imported frozen meat, applied for a winding-up order.

Held, that as the association was not an ordinary partnership and had power to dissolve itself, no order could be granted.

These matters were heard together. The Federal Company petitioned for leave to sue Sparks and Young and the Pietermaritzburg Company by edictal citation, so as to join them as defendants in an action which petitioners propose to institute against the Cold Storage Association to have the association declared illegal. This matter had previously been before the Court, and was standing over for production of an affidavit as to property belonging to respondents which might be attached to found jurisdiction.

The other matter was an application by the Cold Storage Association for an order dissolving the association, and appointing a receiver.

A considerable number of affidavits were read, from which it appeared that at a meeting of the association on the 13th July, presided over by Mr. Francis Oats, the following resolution was put: "That inasmuch as it has been agreed by all parties to this association that, owing to breaches of the rules and regulations thereof by members, the position has been rendered untenable, it is hereby agreed and resolved that the association be dissolved from this date, the parties agreeing to indemnify each other against expenditure and liabilities incurred for or on behalf of the association." Mr. Anghern objected, as representing the Federal Company, on the ground that arrangements should also be made for the dissolution of the Cape Town Cold Storage Association.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Searle, K.C.), was for the Federal Company; Mr. Schreiner, K.C., was for the Cold Storage Association; and Mr. Burton was for Sparks and Young, Ltd., Durban (Natal), and the Pietermaritzburg Cold Storage Company.

Mr. Schreiner now stated that he produced consents for the dissolution of both associations. Some difficulty had arisen because claims had been brought against the association, and it was impossible to touch the funds, a sum of about £4,000 lying in the bank on fixed deposit, without first obtaining the signature of the Federal's representative, in addition to the signatures of the other representatives, which had been given.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

Buchanan, J.: There are two applications before the Court. The first is an application for leave to sue by edictal citation, founded on the fact that two of the alleged intended defendants carry on business out of the Colony. These two defendants have now, however, submitted to the jurisdiction of the Court, and it is not necessary to make any order in respect of that. The plaintiff is now in a position to sue all the persons he chooses to sue, they having submitted to the jurisdiction of the Court, and having a locus citandi in the Colony. As to the costs of that application, they will abide the result of the action. If there is no action brought, then the applicants will pay the costs. There is, however, a second application for the dissolution of the association, and for an order for the appointment of a receiver. This application is opposed on the ground that this is not a partnership. It is common cause between the parties that the Cold Storage Association does not come within the purview of the Companies Act, and that no order can be made under that Act affecting them. The question is whether at common law the applicants have a right to an order for dissolution, and for the appointment of a receiver. When I look at the memorandum of association, I see that the objects of the association are stated to be as follows: "(a) To protect the interests of cold storage concerns in South Africa from undue competition, so as to ensure the earning of reasonable profits on behalf of the shareholders and the proprietors thereof; (b) to provide machinery for regulating competition between members of the association for contracts and ordinary trade without causing undue interference with the trade of each; (c) to form a committee with the requisite power and authority to frame regulations and to supervise the affairs of the association, and to settle disputes or differences between the members thereof; (d) to create a fund for the purposes of the association, and to authorise the committee to administer the same, and to impose fines on defaulting members; (e) to arrange for the determination by arbitration of matters in difference, and to make provision for the enforcement of the rules and regulations of the association; (f) to collect such fines and apportion the same in such manner as may be decided by the committee, and to enforce such other penalties as may be inflicted by the committee; (f 1) to provide that, in addition to matters before mentioned, the public shall not be unreasonably charged for supplies." I take it there is great force in Sir Henry Juta's contention that this is not, in the ordinary acceptation of the term, a partnership, and so far as private partnerships are concerned the Court is always loth to interfere unless there is some necessity for so doing. In this case I do not see that there is any such necessity, or that it is a case in which the Court should grant assistance to dissolve and liquidate the association. It is not, properly speaking, a trading association—it is a controlling association, and a certain number of cold storage companies are joined together for the purpose of regulating one another's business, also others could be admitted to this association, or the committee of association could expel any member they chose, and I do not think that under these circumstances it can, properly speaking, be called a partnership. It is competent for the association to dissolve itself, and I do not see that there is any cause in these circumstances for the Court to interfere to assist them in the course of their dissolution. This association is not like an ordinary trading association—it may go on or not as the parties like, and it may expel all the members. They may take in any new members, or go on as they like. I do not think it is the kind of association that a Law Court would go out of its way to assist in any way in this case. If the parties wish to take any further steps, then an action should be brought. There is no necessity for giving any order, either for dissolution or the appointment of a receiver. No order will be made on the second application. As to the costs of this application, they should be paid by the applicants unless there is an action brought, and in that case they should be costs in the cause.

Having heard counsel further on the question of costs,

His Lordship added: I think that the costs in the second application must be paid by the applicants.

ADAMS V. MOFFAT HUTCHINS AND CO.

This was an application calling upon the respondents (plaintiffs in the action) to show cause why they should not be attached for contempt of Court in failing to obey certain discovery order made on July 5, and be directed to file further affidavits, saying which of the documents relate the evidence obtained in preparation of the trial, and why bar should not be removed. Mr. Burton was for the applicants; Mr. Searle, K.C., was for respondents.

It was stated that the bar had now been removed,

After affidavits had been read, and counsel had been heard in argument,

Buchanan, J.: This is an application mainly for the committal of the respondents for contempt of Court. Well, when an application for contempt of Court is made it must be shown that there is a deliberate, intentional disobedience of an order made by the Court. Instead of deliberate and intentional disobedience by the respondent of the order of court in the previous application, I think he has complied with the order of court. The application for commitment is refused, with costs. As to the bar, that has been removed already, and there is no need to make an order.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

BRUNT V. BRUNT. { 1906.
Aug. 3rd.

This was an action brought by Hester Brunt, of Somerset Strand, against Wm. Henry Brunt, England, residing at present in Staffordshire, England, for a decree of divorce on the ground of his adultery. Mr. Benjamin was for the plaintiff, and the defendant was in default.

The plaintiff, Hester Brunt, said she was married to the defendant at Prince Albert in October, 1901, and at the time of the marriage her husband was a sergeant in the Staffordshire Regiment. He promised to leave the regiment after the war. The defendant went to England with witness, and got his discharge. Witness returned to South Africa, and the defendant failed to keep his promise to follow her.

The evidence of the adultery was taken on commission, and it appeared that the plaintiff had been living with one Alice Goodwin, and he admitted that he was the father of Miss Goodwin's baby. He further told one of the witnesses if she wrote and told the plaintiff in South Africa what had happened she would be doing him a great favour.

Decree of divorce granted, with costs.

JUST V. JUST.

This was an action brought by Mary Emma Just, of Queen's Town, against her husband George Just, of Johannesburg, for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which, a decree of divorce.

The parties were married in community of property, in Cape Town, in June, 1883, and there was issue of the marriage—one child (a girl), now a major. From 1885 to 1889 the defendant had not provided a home for the plaintiff, or contributed to the support of the plaintiff. In June, 1892, the defendant deserted the plaintiff, and had not since contributed to her support.

Mr. Russell was for the plaintiff, and the defendant was in default.

Mary Emma Just stated that during the defendant's absence, when he failed to support her, she maintained herself by teaching at Mossel Bay, Tarkastad, and Queen's Town. She had been supporting herself since 1892. Until 1903 she supported the daughter, the accounts since then had been sent to the defendant. In 1893 the defendant came to see plaintiff, and witness supported him for six months. On one occasion witness visited Johannesburg, and found the plaintiff living in a boarding-house, and when witness suggested remaining with him there he replied she could do so "in the future." The defendant was a partner in a produce business, and his junior partner was able to maintain his wife and family in Johannesburg for ten years.

The defendant was ordered to return to or receive the plaintiff on or before August 31, or show cause by the 12th September why a decree of divorce should not be granted.

Postea (September 12th). The rule was made absolute.

HANSLO V. HANSLO.

This was an action for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce brought by Solomon Hanslo, of Camp's Bay, against his wife, by reason of her desertion. Mr. Watermeyer was for the plaintiff, and the defendant was in default.

Solomon Hanslo stated that three months after the marriage there was a row between witness and defendant, after which the defendant left, and did not return.

His Lordship: What was the row about?

Witness: We could not agree; we were always having a row. I thought she was not doing things properly.

Decree granted, to be complied with on or before August 31, failing which cause to be shown on the 12th September, why a decree of divorce should not be granted.

Postea (September 12th). The rule was made absolute.

MACKENZIE V. ESTATE { 1906.
MACKENZIE. { Aug. 3rd.
" 7th.

Will—Trustee—Administration— Fidei commissum.

M., married out of community, bequeathed all his property to his wife with fidei commissum in the event of her death or re-marriage to his trustee or executor for the behoof of his children living at the time of his death. One L. was appointed executor testamentary, and now claimed as against the widow (the plaintiff), who had not re-married, the right to administer the estate; or in the alternative that the plaintiff should be ordered to give security for due administration.

Held, that L. having completed his duties as executor, was now functus officio, until the plaintiff should either re-marry or die.

Held further, that the plaintiff, as being the mother of the fidei commissary heirs, could not be called upon to give security, and was entitled to the administration of the estate until her re-marriage.

This was a special case stated by the parties as to the true intent and meaning of the will of the late Alfred John Mackenzie.

The special case was stated in the following terms:

1. The plaintiff is the widow of the late Alfred John Mackenzie, to whom she was married in this colony without community of property. The defendant is Peter William Leach, who is sued in his capacity as the executor testamentary of the estate of the late Alfred John Mackenzie, and as the trustee under the last will of Mackenzie (hereinafter called the testator).

2. The testator died on the 4th September, 1904, leaving of full force and effect a last will, dated 20th May, 1896.

3. Under the will all the property of the testator is bequeathed to plaintiff, "but without power of disposition save for purposes of reinvestment," until her death or remarriage. The plaintiff has never remarried.

4. The will further provides that after the death (or re-marriage) of plaintiff the property shall go to the "executor and trustee," subject to a trust in favour of the children of testator, upon terms and conditions as in the will provided. The defendant is by the will appointed "executor and trustee of this my will, with all powers known in law." There are four children of testator, whose respective ages are 25, 22, 20, and 13 years.

5. The defendant as executor has filed the first and second accounts of the administration of the estate; and these have been confirmed.

6. The memorandum hereto annexed marked "B" shows the present position of the estate. All the debts due to creditors of the estate have been paid so far as is necessary, and all administration expenses have been settled; and the balance, thereafter remaining, of the cash proceeds of the realised assets has been or is being invested in mortgage bonds passed in favour of the defendant as executor, or in favour of the said estate.

7. The assets of the estate are now available for payment and delivery to plaintiff under the will, should this Honourable Court uphold plaintiff's contentions in this regard.

8. The plaintiff contends: (a) That she is entitled to a declaration of her rights under the said will; and that, upon a true construction of the will, she is further entitled (b) to an order declaring her to be entitled to have, receive, possess, and administer under and in terms of the aforesaid will all the property, estate, and effects of the testator aforesaid; (c) to an order authorising and compelling defendant to deliver, cede, and transfer to plaintiff in due form of law all the property, estate, and effects of the testator aforesaid.

The defendant contends: (a) That according to the true intent and meaning of the will he is entitled, as "trustee of the will, with all powers known to law," to continue to control, manage, and administer the present property, estate, and effects of the testator for the use and benefit of the plaintiff until her remarriage or death, whichever shall first happen; and thereafter for the use and benefit of the children of testator, subject to his duty to pay out each child's share according to the terms and conditions of the will, provided that, in case any funds shall require reinvesting during the period in which the plaintiff is to have the use and benefit of them, she shall be consulted by him in making such reinvestments; (b) alternatively, and in case this Honourable Court shall uphold plaintiff's contentions herein, that such orders shall only be made subject to plaintiff giving due and approved security that she will duly and properly preserve and administer the present property, estate, and effects (subject to such reinvestments as may become necessary), to the intent that the property, estate, and effects shall pass to him or his successor in the office of trustee on her death or earlier remarriage, in terms of the will. Wherefore the parties pray for the judgment of this Honourable Court upon their respective contentions, and pray that the costs of these proceedings may be adjudged to come out of the estate.

Mr. Close (with Mr. Roux) for plaintiff. Mr. W. P. Buchanan for defendant.

Counsel having been heard in argument,

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (August 7).

Maasdorp, J.: The question raised in this case is whether the plaintiff or the defendant is entitled to the possession and administration of the estate of the late Alfred John Mackenzie. By his last will the testator bequeathed all his property to his wife, the plaintiff, for her own use and benefit, but without powers of disposition, save for the purpose of reinvestment, until her decease or re-marriage, whichever may first happen, and immediately after her decease or re-marriage, he bequeathed his estate to his trustee or executor upon trust to administer until such time as his eldest child shall attain the age of twenty-five years. The will then provides for the division of the estate equally between all the children of the testator, who may be living at the time of his death, and who shall attain the age of twenty-five years. The defendant is appointed by the will as executor and trustee of the estate. Unless there is some provision in the last will giving express directions to an executor with regard to the liquidation and administration of the estate, the powers and duties of such executor are clearly established under our law. For the purposes of this case it is only necessary to say that it is the executor's duty to liquidate the estate, by collecting debts, paying creditors, reducing the property belonging to the estate into possession, render the requisite accounts, and distribute the property among the heirs and legatees. After liquidation the heirs are entitled to possession in terms of the will. Upon these points there is no dispute between the parties, and it was admitted that upon the true construction of this will the plaintiff was appointed fiduciary heir to the estate, and no mere usufructuary. In the absence of anything in the will depriving the fiduciary heir of the right to the administration of the estate, the plaintiff is entitled to the possession and management thereof, upon the completion of the executor's duties as liquidator. It is admitted that the defendant as executor has duly liquidated the estate. The defendant, however, contends that under the title of trustee, he was virtually appointed in terms of the will as administrator of the estate until such time as it shall have been distributed amongst the fidei commissary heirs. But it seems to me that the express terms of the will are clearly against such a contention. After bequeathing the estate to the plaintiff, the will provides that she shall not have the power of disposition or alienation, and this provision would hardly have been necessary if the plaintiff had no power of administration. Then, again, the right to deal with the funds of the estate for the purposes of reinvestment is expressly conferred upon her. But it is the next clause of the will which places the issue between the parties beyond dispute. It is there provided that the powers and duties of the trustee as executor in respect of the rights of the fidei commissary heirs shall commence after the death or remarriage of the plaintiff. In my opinion, therefore, the defendant having completed his work as executor, is now functus officio, until such time as, upon the death or remarriage of the plaintiff, he may resume his duties as administrator. The defendant claims that, in case the plaintiff is allowed the administration of the estate, it should only be done subject to her giving security in the interest of the fidei commissary heirs. It is clear from the authorities that, as a rule, a mother entering into possession as fiduciary heir, or as usufructuary, is not liable to give security, and no special grounds have been established in this case to satisfy the Court that security is necessary for the protection of the fidei commissary heirs. There are four fidei commissary heirs in this case, of whom three have obtained their majority, and it will be open to them, if occasion should arise, to apply to the Court for protection of their interests, in the event of their being endangered. A declaration will, therefore, be made in terms of contentions (b) and (c) of the plaintiff. The defendant was justified in coming to the Court in the interests of the estate to have a doubtful point settled, and it is therefore ordered that the costs shall come out of the estate.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

REVIEW.

REX V. CLOETE.

{ 1906.
Aug. 6th.

Liquor licence — European employer.

A coloured labourer having purchased liquor, thereafter gave a certain Hottentot, without consideration, a portion of this liquor. He was charged and convicted with having acted as the agent of the Hottentot in purchasing the liquor. Conviction quashed.

De Villiers C.J.: A case came before me as Judge of the week, in which one Klaas Cloete, a coloured labourer, was charged before the Magistrate that he "did wrongfully and unlawfully, as the agent or on behalf of a native named Kivido Gal, a Hottentot, and not being the European employer of such native, buy or receive liquor from John Louis d'Oliviera, a licensed dealer, which liquor could not have been legally bought or received by the said Kivido Gal under the conditions of the said licence." The prisoner pleaded not guilty, and was found guilty, and sentenced to a fine of £25. The only evidence against accused was that he bought some liquor from a licensed dealer, and, meeting this old man Kivido, who was a pauper, and who had no money whatever, he offered him a drink. Kivido took the drink. But there was not a title of evidence that Kivido had employed the accused to buy the liquor; in fact, Kivido could not have done it, for he was a pauper. I sent the case to the Attorney-General to ask whether he would be prepared to support the conviction. He said he could not support the conviction, and accordingly it will be quashed.

REX V. SAACKS AND HOFFMAN.

Accomplices—Attempt to commit arson.

On a trial of the appellants for an attempt to commit arson, two witnesses, who had already been convicted, swore that they had been employed by the appellants to set fire to the house. A police constable deposed that he saw one of the two witnesses at the time of the attempt enter the house with some parcels, and then come out with the parcels, which, on his being then and there arrested, were found to contain benzine, while the other witness had been watching outside; and the accused, as well as other witnesses for the defence, admitted that the offence of attempt to commit arson had been actually committed by some one.

Held, on a question reserved, that there was not sufficient ground for disturbing the conviction of the appellants by a jury.

De Villiers, C.J.: In this case, at the trial before my brother Maasdorp, at the request of Mr. Upington, of counsel for the appellants, the Court reserved the following questions of law for the consideration of the Court on appeal in criminal cases: "(1) Whether the prisoners could be convicted on the evidence of an accomplice alone, uncorroborated by any evidence except evidence that the crime had been committed; (b) whether there was corroborative evidence of the fact that the crime had been committed." As to the first question, that has already been disposed of in the case of William Hoffman, in which the Court gave judgment at the hearing on Tuesday last. After quoting from the evidence of Police Constable Lambourne, His Lordship proceeded: There can be no doubt that these two convicts, Kline and Bailey, had the benzine in their possession, and that they had carried it into the house at night-time, and the jury probably concluded that the reason why they left the house again was because they believed they were watched. There is the undoubted fact that these two men have been convicted of the offence of attempting to commit arson, and then when we refer to the evidence given by the witnesses for the defence in this case, there is on the part of every one of them an admission that there was an attempt to commit arson on the night in question. There is the evidence of Hoffman himself, one of the accused. Now, the question is whether, where the accused themselves and the witnesses for the accused assumed throughout that the offence had been committed, the Court should now hold that the jury were not justified in saying "it is proved to our satisfaction that the offence was committed." I do not think that the Act of 1886 would justify the Court of Appeal in interfering with the verdict of the jury in such circumstances. Of course, if there were no evidence whatever which would justify any jury in concluding that the particular offence had been committed, the Court would be justified in interfering, but where there is evidence from which it might reasonably infer that the offence has been committed, the Court should not now interfere with the verdict of the jury. The proviso to the 12th section of the Ordinance (No. 72 of 1830) clearly leaves the matter to the decision of the jury. The proviso is as follows: "Provided always that such crime or offence shall, by competent evidence, other than the single and unconfirmed evidence of such accomplice, be proved to the satisfaction of such Court or jury respectively to have been actually committed." In this case I am informed by the learned Judge who presided at the trial that he impressed upon the jury how unsafe it was to convict upon the evidence of two witnesses, who, according to their own account, had a most disreputable character. In spite of that warning, the jury convicted, and I think that, as there was evidence to justify the jury in concluding that the offence of attempted arson had been committed, this Court should not interfere with this verdict. The appeal will, therefore, be dismissed. His Lordship added that Mr. Justice Buchanan agreed in this judgment.

Hopley, J.: I am of the same opinion. In the present case the evidence on the record that a crime had been committed was very slight, but the fact remains that, without reading the evidence of the accomplices at all, both for the prosecution and the defence, the witnesses speak of this attempted fire as an admitted fact, a fact that everybody admitted. Both Honikman and another Crown witness speak of an attempt to fire the premises in Burg-street on that date, and there is this fact, that such statements were not subjected to any cross-examination. When one turns to the evidence for the defence, Hoffman himself treats it as an admitted fact that there was a fire attempted at this place. There is this further fact, that those two men, Kline and Bailey, were seen in the yard at night with tins of benzine in their possession.

CAPE DIVISIONAL COUNCIL V. MARAIS.

Divisional Council—Arrear rates —Receipt—Transfer of land.

The applicant, being the purchaser of land on which arrear Divisional Council rates were due, tendered payment of the rate last due, which the respondent Council refused to accept, unless all the arrears were paid.

Held, that as the applicant did not owe the arrear rates, and only tendered the last rate, in order to enable him to comply with the 275th section of Act 40 of 1889, the respondent Council could not, by refusing to give a receipt for the money, extend the protection conferred upon it by that section beyond the last year's rate.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice Buchanan, sitting as a Divisional Court of the Supreme Court, in an application by the present respondent for an order upon appellants to grant receipt for rates on certain property so as to enable respondent to obtain transfer.

From the record it appeared that Marais bought certain property in Cape Town from one Pinkus. There were rates due to the Divisional Council in respect of the property—for 1904 £37 11s. 1d. and for 1905 £33 10s. 10d. Marais tendered the last rates due on the property, viz., for 1905, and upon so doing claimed to have a receipt from the Divisional Council so as to enable him to obtain transfer of the property. An application was made to the Court for an order on the Divisional Council to receive the last rates due and give a receipt in respect thereof. Mr. Justice Buchanan, before whom the matter came on motion, granted an order, with costs, and from that order the present appeal was brought.

Mr. Benjamin was for appellants: Mr. Upington was for respondent.

Mr. Benjamin: There is no obligation on Marais for any rates. There is no contractual obligation (see declaration of purchaser and seller, in which there is no mention of rates), nor is there any statutory obligation. The case of Smuts v. Cathcart Divisional Council (13 S.C.R., 359), does not apply. Smuts had been the occupier of the land. Here the seller of the land was liable for arrear rates and not the purchaser.

[Hopley, J.: If Marais had waited for a year the Divisional Council would have had to give transfer on payment of one year's rates.]

The Divisional Council might have sued in the meanwhile. A man cannot discharge his liabilities in part unless the creditor accepts of part payment (Voet, 46-3-11).

[De Villiers, C.J.: That is clear, but Marais could pay in full for Pinkus. Should a third person offer to pay the whole debt, cannot he compel the creditor to accept?]

I am not prepared to argue that point.

[De Villiers, C.J.: That is the whole point.]

I submit that Marais could not compel the Divisional Council to accept payment unless he were himself liable.

[Maasdorp, J.: You say that the man who is liable for rates must pay them himself?]

Yes.

[Maasdorp, J.: Should an auctioneer sell to A.B., cannot a third interested person come in and claim to pay?]

I submit that he could not. Pinkus is bound to make the property transferable and therefore he is bound to pay the rates.

[Hopley, J.: Pinkus is still liable.]

Yes, and hence the Divisional Council is entitled to claim the whole of the rates due, and cannot be compelled to take part of them. See Pothier on Obligations (3-1-3). If a payment be not made in the name of the real debtor it is not valid. This payment was not so made. Pinkus could not have claimed a full receipt on payment of the rates for last year, and so neither can Marais.

[Hopley, J.: Rates are not an ordinary debt; they are a tax on property.]

They are debts, and Voet does not in any wise qualify his statement.

Mr. Upington (for respondent): Appellant's contention is that Pinkus was bound to pay all arrear rates, and Marais could pay only as agent of Pinkus; but see Bousfield v. Stutterheim Divisional Council (19 S.C.R., 64), particularly the judgment (p. 70). There a tender was made by the purchaser in his own name, and here Marais had a bona fide interest in the payment of the rates and hence could do as Bousfield did and pay in his own name. Can, then, the Divisional Council compel Marais to pay arrear rates? Before the passing of the Divisional Councils' Act of 1889 the Council had no lien on property for rates and therefore but for Sec. 275 of that Act they could not have claimed any rates whatever from Marais. The claim of rates, for each year, is a separate cause of action for each year the rates may vary and do not amount to a definite ascertainable sum like interest.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Would Pinkus have been entitled to pay one year's rates and demand a receipt?]

Yes, the Divisional Council has a hypothec for only one year's rates, and now they claim a right in rem for all arrears. If a purchaser wants to get possession of the property surely he can do so by discharging the claim for which the Divisional Council have a lien. In the case of a private creditor a receipt for the later portion of a debt may raise a presumption that the former portion has been paid. As to the case of Smuts v. Cathcart Divisional Council (13 S.C.R., 359) the ratio decidendi is set out in the earlier portion of the judgment; and see p. 362 of the judgment.

Mr. Benjamin (in reply): No authority has been shown for the proposition that Divisional Council rates are divisible. Voet (loc. cit.) does not limit his doctrine, and then there is the authority of Smuts' case. Marais could not tender on behalf of Pinkus because he was not liable.

Mr. Upington referred to the cases of Riversdale Divisional Council v. Pienaar (3 Juta 252).

De Villiers, C.J.: The applicant bought the land now in question from one Pinkus, and at the time of the purchase arrear rates were owing by Pinkus to the Divisional Council. The applicant thereupon tendered to the Divisional Council the rate which last became due, and asked for a receipt for the amount. The Divisional Council refused to accept the amount unless the arrear rates were also paid. It is quite clear that, before the passing of the Divisional Councils Act of 1889, the applicant would have been entitled to receive transfer of the property without giving any proof that any Divisional Council rates had been paid. Until the passing of that Act, the Divisional Council had no tacit hypothecation in any shape or form for any portion of the rates. The 275th section of the Act, however, does give the Divisional Council a hold on the land, but only in respect of the last year's rate (section read). It is unnecessary, for the purposes of the present case, to decide whether Pinkus could have tendered the last year's rate without tendering all arrears due. There was a dictum in the case of Smuts v. Cathcart Divisional Council (13 Supreme Court Reports, 359), which would be somewhat opposed to his having such a right, but the question does not now arise, because no tender was made on behalf of Pinkus, but the tender was made on behalf of the applicant, the person who purchased the property. He has a very important interest in the matter, because he is the purchaser of the property; he is the person who seeks to obtain the transfer, and who is in no way to blame for the non-payment of the arrear rates. For such non-payment the Council is more to blame than the appellant, but if the contention of the Council were to prevail, the effect would be that the Council would have a kind of liou in respect of arrear rates in every case except in a case like that of Smuts v. Cathcart Divisional Council, where the person who tenders the rates is the one who has been in occupation during the last year. The Act assumed that there would be vigilance on the part of the Divisional Councils of the country in the collection of rates, but protected them in respect of the rates last due on land sought to be transferred. This protection would be practically extended to all arrear rates if the bona fide purchaser of land is not to have a receipt on payment of the rate last due. Upon the whole, I come to the conclusion that the applicant has sufficient interest in the matter to take advantage of the 275th section, and to claim that, upon payment by him of the last year's rates, a voucher shall be given to him so as to enable him to get the benefit of the 275th section, viz., to obtain transfer of the property from the Registrar of Deeds. For these reasons, I am of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Public Health Acts—Cemetery.

The appellants, being members of the committee of management of a cemetery which had been closed by Proclamation under Sec. 64 of Act 4 of 1883, attended the funeral of a still born child, who was buried in the cemetery.

Held, that there was sufficient evidence to justify a conviction under the 65th section of the Act.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Wynberg, who had convicted the appellants of a contravention of the Public Health Act of 1883 in burying the body of a child in the Palmyra-road Cemetery, Claremont, which had been closed by Government Notice No. 1,258 of 1894.

The Magistrate found the accused guilty, and sentenced each to pay a fine of £5.

The grounds of appeal were: "(1) That the conviction is against the weight of evidence; and (2) that, if in other respects correct, the sentence is vindictive and excessive, and not in accordance with substantial justice."

Dr. Greer was for appellants; Mr. Howel Jones was for the Crown.

Dr. Greer admitted that a technical offence had been committed, and that the graveyard had been properly closed by Government proclamation. As to the second and third appellants, he submitted that they took no active part in the proceedings, and that they should not have been convicted. On behalf of the first appellant, who was a Malay priest, he urged that there had been a bona fide misunderstanding, as these people thought they had a right to go on burying, because the adjacent Christian burial ground had not been closed. At any rate, the penalty imposed upon the first appellant was excessive.

Mr. Jones said he took it that he had nothing to meet in regard to the first appellant. As to appellants two and three, they were members of the Management Committee of the burial ground, and they were present at the burial. He submitted that there had been a deliberate attempt on the part of these Malays to violate the law.

De Villiers, C.J.: As to the first appellant, counsel for the appellants candidly admitted that it would be difficult to hold that he was not properly convicted. There is the proclamation of the Governor, which has been issued under the Act of Parliament. If the appellants were dissatisfied with the Proclamation, their proper course was to apply to the Governor, who would have had the power, I presume, to withdraw the Proclamation if he found that it was a real hardship upon these people. Their complaint is that Christians have been allowed to bury their dead in the neighbourhood, and Mohammedans had been refused to allow their dead in their Cemetery. Well, that is a matter for the Governor, and I have no doubt that if they can make out a good case, and submit it to him, he will, through his Minister, come to their assistance, but when once the Proclamation was issued, it was the duty of these Moslems, as it is the duty of every subject in the country, to obey the law. They could not, by way of protest against what they thought to be an improper proclamation, insist upon burying this child at that particular place. As to the two other appellants, if they were there merely as spectators, or merely as persons attending that funeral, then there would no doubt have been considerable force in Mr. Greer's argument on their behalf, but it now appears that they are on the committee of management, and I think that if members of that committee of management tacitly consent to the burial of a young person there, and do not raise a protest at all, the Court below was quite justified in holding that they did assist in, or suffer, or permit the burial of the dead in the burial ground. so that I do not see that any distinction can be made between these two appellants and the first appellant. Again, I would advise these people, instead of taking the law into their own hands, to appeal to the Government, and I have no doubt that, if it is at all possible, the Government will help them. The appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal — Remitting case for further evidence — Resident Magistrate's Court.

On an appeal in a criminal case from a Magistrate's Court, it appeared doubtful whether the proceedings were in accordance with real and substantial justice.

Held, that the Court had the power to remit the case for further evidence as if the case had been laid before the Court by a Judge under the 48th Sec. of Act 20 of 1856.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the A.R.M. of Fraserburg, sitting at Williston, who had convicted the appellant (Johannes Jebius) of stealing a sheep and sentenced him to a term of three months' hard labour and to receive ten lashes.

Mr. Van Zyl was for appellant; Mr. Howel Jones was for the Crown. It was stated that appellant had been released on bail.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts.

De Villiers, C.J.: Under all the circumstances the Court will treat this case as though it had come before a Judge in chambers. There would certainly seem to be serious doubts as to whether the proceedings are in accordance with real and substantial justice. There is something apparently unexplained in the matter. This boy, who lived with an aunt (Lydia Klaaseus), took away the sheep in daylight, and he was found afterwards skinning the sheep. The trial took place in a great hurry. Apparently no summons had been served upon the boy; he did not know before he left his aunt that he was going to be tried, and it seems extremely likely that he really did not know what he should do, and he did not know that he might cross-examine the witnesses, and that he might call his aunt. On the whole, this case appears to me to be one in which the Court should exercise the powers conferred on it by the 48 Section of the Resident Magistrates' Court Act, and that it should be sent back to the Magistrate to take further evidence for the defence, as well as for the prosecution, and to report to the Court what his finding would have been in case such evidence had been given before he gave judgment.

SCHMIDT V. BARNADO. { 1906.
Aug. 6th.

Principal and agent—Liability of agent on contract.

The defendant, in the capacity of a forester employed by Government, sold a tree to the plaintiff, but failed afterwards to issue the necessary licence authorizing the plaintiff to fell the tree.

Held on appeal, that the proper party to be sued was the Government, which had employed the defendant as forester.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the A.R.M. of Humansdorp in an action brought against appellant, who is the Government forester at Storm's River, by the respondent to recover £20 damages for alleged refusal to issue a licence to him (Barnardo) to fell a certain tree in the forest of Knysna. The Magistrate found for plaintiff for £6 with costs. Mr. Benjamin was for appellant; Dr. Greer was for respondent.

Mr. Benjamin in argument cited Bowstead on Agency (Art. 114), Smith's Leading Cases (Vol. 1, 296); and argued that Government is liable for breach of contract entered into by their servants. See also Thompson v. Barkly West Municipal Rinderpest Committee (14 S.C.R., 393), Binda v. Colonial Government (5 Juta, 284); this was before 1888, and at that time the Government was not responsible for the torts of its servants. Also Marona v. Blackbeard (21 S.C.R., 436) and the Forest Act No. 28 of 1888, Section 41. This man was a gratuitous bailee and was liable for misfeasance, but not for non-feasance.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The attendant gave back the money?]

Yes, I have that in the affidavit. We contend that the magistrate was wrong.

Dr. Greer: The money for the tree was paid on March 1st and the receipt given on March 6th. The respondent had not the licences at hand, but he ought to have had them. The defendant says that on the 8th of March a licence was issued for a valuable tree. Defendant refused further information. The evidence of his mala fides runs all through the case. He did not know who had sold, what was sold or to whom it was sold. He brought no books into Court, although he had had 14 days' notice to produce them. He, being a public servant, refuses to issue the licence and therefore he, and not the Government, was guilty of the tort; see Thompson v. Barkly West. One who commits a tort is personally liable even though he be acting in a representative capacity.

[De Villiers, C.J.: There is no regulation throwing upon him the duty to issue licences.]

The Government sells the wood. The forester is the delegate of the Government and therefore, I submit, that should he fail in his duty he is liable. In point of fact these licences are issued by the Forest Department, but the defendant could have issued the licence. He was acting mala fide. See Sciama and Co. v. Table Bay Harbour Board (17 S.C.R., 121), especially the judgment in the case.

[Maasdorp, J.: Was he a gratuitous bailee?]

No, he took money in his personal capacity.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You say that you paid money for the licence?]

Yes.

Mr. Benjamin (in reply) referred to Wright v. Williams (8 Juta, 166) and to Fairbairn v. Pepper (21 S.C.R., 154).

De Villiers, C.J.: The summons in this case is entirely upon a contract alleged to have been made between the plaintiff (a wood cutter) and the defendant (a forester). The summons claims the sum of £20 for damages sustained by the wrongful refusal of the defendant to issue to him (plaintiff) a licence to fell a certain stinkwood tree, which the defendant, in his capacity as forester, sold to him at public auction on the 1st March, together with certain other trees, the purchase price whereof the plaintiff paid the defendant on the same day. The summons, therefore, is entirely founded upon a breach of contract on the part of the defendant in his capacity as the forester. It is clear from the evidence that the defendant was not the principal dealing with the plaintiff, but he was acting as the agent for the Government in the sale of the trees. As such agent, he failed in fulfilling the contract which he had made, and the question now is, whether he can be held personally liable. In Wright v. Williams (8 Juta, 168) certain cases were mentioned in which the agent can be sued personally, such as where the agent was believed to be the principal, when he had no authority to act and where he had expressly bound himself on behalf of the principal. In the present case nothing of that kind was proved. The Magistrate, in his judgment, treats the case as if it were really a case of a bailee who has been guilty of a delict, or a breach, or a tort, but there is nothing of that kind in the present case. There is no delict charged against the defendant; there is no statutory duty cast upon him to issue licences such as are described here. Therefore, it is impossible to treat the case in any way as one of delict. It is entirely one of contract, and the principle in such cases is that it is the principal who should be sued, and not the agent. For these reasons, I am of opinion that the Magistrate erred in giving judgment for the plaintiff for the amount of £6. But then, as to the question of costs, this is one of those cases in which the Court would not have interfered with the decision of the Magistrate if he had given costs against the defendant, although he did not give judgment of any amount in favour of the plaintiff. An objection was not raised in the Court below; the objection is only now raised by counsel. The plea of general issue was raised, which certainly would not lead the plaintiff or his advisers to suppose that objection would be raised that the wrong person was sued. It is quite clear that until the case came into this court, this question was never seriously raised as between the parties, and, therefore, in allowing this appeal, the Court will say nothing as to the costs of the Court below, but will allow that part of the judgment to stand. As to the costs of appeal, I am afraid that the Court must give costs to the appellant. There is another reason why the Magistrate was justified in ordering that the defendant pay the costs, and that is the whole conduct of the defendant. I think he treated the plaintiff very badly. He gave no excuse for not delivering the tree or for not giving the licence to this man, and now that the case comes in appeal, he raises this exception, which the Court is bound to allow. It is certainly a very hard case for the plaintiff, and I do hope that when the plaintiff proceeds against the Government, as I suppose he will, the Government will bear in mind all the circumstances of the case, and give the plaintiff ample compensation for what he seems to have suffered at the hands of the Government agent, the defendant in this case. The form of the judgment will be appeal allowed, and judgment of absolution from the instance entered, but appellant to pay costs in the Court below, respondent to pay costs of appeal.

STANDARD BANK V. HOTZ.	{ Aug. 7th.
	" 8th.
	" 9th.
	" 10th.

Guarantee — Forgery — Undertaking not to prosecute — Immoral consideration.

This was an action brought by the Standard Bank of South Africa, Limited, to recover from Marcus Hotz, of Oudtshoorn, £3,378 on a promissory note, and £890 on a guarantee.

The plaintiff's declaration was as follows:

1. The plaintiff is a duly registered company, with limited liability, carrying on business at Cape Town, Oudtshoorn, and elsewhere in this colony. The defendant is a general dealer carrying on business at Oudtshoorn.

2. On the 18th August, 1904, the defendant made a certain promissory note, to which the plaintiff craves leave to refer when produced at the trial, whereby the defendant promised to pay six months after date to a certain firm known as Israelsohn Brothers, or to their order at the Standard Bank of South Africa, Limited, Oudtshoorn, the sum of £3,578 10s. 5d. for value received.

3. Thereafter, but before the due date of the said note, the said firm of Israelsohn Brothers, for value, endorsed the said note to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff is now the legal holder thereof.

4. The defendant has paid on account of the amount of the said note the sum of £200 10s. 5d., but prior to the date of the judgment in paragraph 5 herein referred to had failed to pay the balance, to wit, £3,378.

5. On the 26th October, 1905, this Honourable Court granted provisional sentence against the defendant for the said sum of £3,378, together with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the 18th February, 1905, and costs of suit.

6. The defendant has paid the amount of the said judgment, and has required the plaintiff to go into the principal case.

7. On the 18th August, 1904, the defendant executed a certain written guarantee, to which the plaintiff craves leave to refer when produced at the trial, whereby, in consideration of the plaintiff allowing the aforesaid firm of Israelsohn Brothers certain banking facilities, the defendant guaranteed and bound himself as surety and co-principal debtor in solidum, for the repayment on demand, provided such demand were not made within three months of the said date, of all sums of money which the said firm might at the said date or from time to time thereafter owe or be indebted to the plaintiff, provided that the total amount to be recovered from the defendant under the said guarantee should not exceed in the whole the sum of £890, together with such further sum for interest charges, and costs as should accrue up to date of payment of principal. The defendant, further, in terms of the said guarantee, renounced the beneficium ordinis seu excussionis, and agreed that the said guarantee should be in addition and without prejudice to any other securities then or thereafter to be held from the said firm.

8. Thereafter the plaintiff did allow the said firm banking facilities.

9. On or about the 23rd September, 1904, the estate of the said firm was placed under sequestration. At the said date the said firm was, and the insolvent estate still is, indebted to the plaintiff in a sum far exceeding the amount of the said guarantee.

10. The plaintiff, on or about the 12th September, 1905, duly demanded from the defendant payment of the sum of £890, the amount of the guarantee aforesaid, but the defendant refuses to pay such sum or any portion thereof.

Wherefore the plaintiff claims: (a) Judgment for £3,378, with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the 18th February, 1905; (b) judgment for £890 with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the 12th September, 1905; (c) costs of suit.

The defendant's plea was as follows:

1. Paragraphs 1, 4, 5, and 6 are admitted. Paragraph 9 is admitted down to the word plaintiff. Paragraph 10 is admitted saving the word "duly." Jacobus J. de Kok was at all times material to this action, the manager and duly authorised agent for the plaintiff at its branch at Oudtshoorn.

2. The defendant admits that on the 18th of August, 1904, he signed the promissory note and the guarantee in paragraphs 2 and 7 referred to.

3. Prior to the said date the firm of Israelsohn Brothers, which consisted of Meyer, Isidore, and Barnard Israelsohn, brothers-in-law of the defendant, was indebted to the plaintiff through its said branch upon certain promissory notes purporting to have made and signed by those parties and which had been discounted by the plaintiff for the said firm. The said promissory notes were forged, and subsequent to September, 1904, the said Meyer Israelsohn was convicted of forging the same and uttering them, knowing them to be forged to the said De Kok.

4. Before the said promissory notes fell due, and at a time when the said firm was indebted to the plaintiff through the said branch, both upon promissory notes, including the said forged notes, and upon another account, the said Kok threatened the said defendant that if he would not sign the said promissory note for £3,578 10s. 5d., and the said guarantee, he, the said De Kok, would take criminal proceedings against the aforesaid members of the firm in respect of the said forgery and promised that if the defendant did so sign as aforesaid he, the said De Kok, would not take such proceedings against any of the said members, and the defendant thereupon, in consideration of the said De Kok promising not to take criminal proceedings against the said members or any of them, signed the said promissory note and guarantee now sued on.

5. The defendant has received no legal consideration for the said obligations, the consideration for the said note at the time of the making thereof and of the endorsement thereof, and for the said guarantee, was an illegal and immoral agreement, contrary to public policy to pervert the ends of Justice, and the plaintiff is not entitled to enforce his claim against the defendant on the said note and guarantee.

The defendant admits that the said note was endorsed by the said firm, but he denies all the other allegations in paragraph 3, and he denies the allegations in paragraph 8, and save as aforesaid, denies the allegations in paragraphs 2, 3, and 7.

Wherefore defendant prays that plaintiff's claim may be dismissed with costs.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. McGregor), for plaintiffs; Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Mr. Upington), for defendant.

Mr. Schreiner said it would be very difficult for the bank to prove the negative, and he submitted that the onus rested upon his learned friend to prove his case. That seemed to him to be the more expeditious course.

Mr. Searle said he did not admit on the pleadings that the onus was on the defendant. It was denied specifically that there was an amount due on the guarantee. He thought the plaintiffs should proceed with their case.

Mr. Schreiner admitted that plaintiffs were liable to prove the amount of the guarantee, but beyond that he submitted the onus rested upon the defendant.

Maasdorp, J., said the plaintiffs would have to proceed with their case as far as possible with the information before them. If anything new was introduced the plaintiffs might call rebutting evidence.

Jacobus J. P. de Kok, formerly manager of the Standard Bank at Oudtshoorn, denied that he made threats to the defendant that Meyer Israelsohn would be prosecuted if he (defendant) did not sign the promissory note and the guarantees. About the end of July various people denied the amounts they were liable for on account of Israelsohn, although they admitted their signatures. On a certain day Meyer Israelsohn came to him and asked him to pay a bill of £2,000. Israelsohn said his brother-in-law, the defendant, had promised to sign the guarantee for him for £1,000 to cover the overdraft, and that the balance would be found in cash, and other securities. At first witness declined, but ultimately he was persuaded, when Israelsohn said that the defendant would come to the bank and sign next day. The defendant did not come in as promised, and witness went to see him. The defendant admitted the promise, but said that he would not sign the guarantee until he made further inquiries about the firm's standing. Witness then said there would be only one course open to him, and that was to sue the firm of Israelsohn. Israelsohn asked witness to wait a little, and then he went to Cape Town via Port Elizabeth. A wire from Cape Town informed witness that Israelsohn was offering 7s. 6d. in the £ to his creditors. Upon instructions from headquarters to reduce liabilities, witness sent notices to the makers of the bills. At that time he had not the slightest suspicion that the bills were not in order. The makers denied that they were liable for the amounts, and then witness had Israelsohn shadowed in Cape Town, and also in Oudtshoorn. None of the signatures were forged. All the time witness thought, and thought so still, that the bank, under the circumstances, was on "velvet." When Israelsohn returned to Oudtshoorn he strenuously denied that the bills had been altered. A portion of the amount was owing by the farmers and the remainder Israelsohn said was an accommodation. Witness said to Israelsohn: "You told me these were trade bills; now you say they are accommodation bills." Israelsohn said: "Because I thought if I told you they were accommodation bills you would not have discounted them." Witness said: "I certainly would not. If you do not retire these bills at once I will sequester your estate, and if you abscond I will have you arrested by that man there" (pointing to a policeman in private clothes). Israelsohn said: "Don't be in a hurry; Hotz is going to take over the business. He is going to help us." Subsequently Hotz came into the bank with Isidore Israelsohn, and the defendant asked witness to be more lenient, and use some consideration for the sake of his wife and family. The defendant cried. Witness refused to have anything to do with the defendant, but suggested that both the defendant and Israelsohn should see their attorney, Mr. Foster. Witness was sent for and went to Foster's office, where the prospect of the firm pulling through was discussed. There was a suggestion of paying 10s. in the £ to avoid insolvency. It was said that the defendant would help Israelsohn, and Foster suggested that witness should draw up a bill for the amount, which the defendant should sign for. At that meeting no threats were made by witness. Witness then had the guarantee drawn up, which the defendant signed. Leniency was asked for, that witness should not press Israelsohn into sequestration. There was no question of condoning a crime. In September the estate was voluntarily sequestered, and in December the creditors resolved to prosecute the Israelsohns. Subsequently easy terms were sought for on behalf of the defendant, and witness submitted an offer that the defendant should pass a mortgage bond for the full amount of the debt, guarantee and pledge a preferent claim in the estate of Israelsohn, and to pay £100 a month, with interest. At that time the defendant never said that he had signed the note through threats by witness. Upon the conviction of Meyer Israelsohn for forgery, proceedings for fraudulent insolvency were withdrawn against the other partners of the firm. Meyer Israelsohn was sentenced to five years' imprisonment.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: He had to report from the end of March, 1904, the amount of Israelsohns' overdraft, as he had to do with other firms. In the months of March, April, and May, Israelsohns' account was largely overdrawn. He denied that he promised to allow a Mr. Gasner to put in cheques and withdraw them immediately afterwards, in order to make it appear that Israelsohns' overdraft was much smaller. Such a thing was done at the end of the month, but he was not a party to the arrangement. In the first instance, he was afraid Israelsohn would decamp, because of his defalcations in the balance-sheet. He wired to the general manager to have Israelsohn shadowed, and from the head office they wired back that they could not do so before they knew more about the matter. Subsequently he wired that serious defalcations were alleged by the makers of the bills. Witness was afraid that Israelsohn might disappear at any time. As soon as the bill was signed by the defendant, he told the police that they need not watch Israelsohn any more. Up to that time there was no question of any fraudulent balance-sheet. He never said to the defendant that he would have all the Israelsohns arrested if he (the defendant) did not sign the bills. If he had not been covered, he would not have stopped proceedings against the Israelsohns. He was covered by the defendant's security. He had no recollection of the defendant coming to the bank to see the bills that were irregular. As far as he could remember, the hundreds in the figures were in different ink. One of the bills, which he thought was most glaring when he was acquainted with the forgeries, much to his surprise was settled by the maker. He did not say to anyone that once the bills were taken up nothing further would be heard of the matter, as the bank only could move. On one occasion the firm of Israelsohn got assistance from Jacobson at the end of the month. Meyer Israelsohn would never have got an overdraft from witness if he had not misrepresented his position. He did not tell one Lavigne, who was opposed to Israelsohn in business, if the bank did not get the money he would make an affidavit, and have the three partners lodged in gaol.

James Alexander Foster, attorney, of Oudtshoorn, stated he remembered the defendant signing the promissory note in witness's office. At that time he was the attorney for the defendant, and Israelsohn Bros. Witness had absolutely nothing to do with the bank. Mr. De Kock did not threaten he would prosecute if the promissory note was not signed, nor did he promise if the note was signed nothing more would be heard of the matter. Witness did not threaten upon the instructions of Mr. De Kock. Witness was trustee in the estate, and in December a resolution was passed to prosecute the insolvent. Witness did not suggest that Isidore Israelsohn, or the defendant, should get possession of the notes and destroy them.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: Witness saw Mr. De Kock about the matter before Meyer Israelsohn returned from Cape Town to Oudtshoorn. The bank vote was so large at the meeting of creditors that they could have controlled the election of trustee. Mr. Strydom pointed out to witness that the bill had been fraudulently altered, and witness thought it was certainly very suspicious. Mr. De Kock had inquired of witness on several occasions as to how things were proceeding. It was quite possible that witness was the first to acquaint defendant with the forgeries. Witness did not tell the defendant to go to the bank to see the forgeries. He did not say to the defendant that it would be a disgrace to the family if he did not take up the notes. When Meyer returned from Cape Town, and failed to effect a compromise, witness did say it was a pity if Isidore, who was a married man, and Barnard, who had little to do with the business, should get into trouble.

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He worked in the interests of his clients, and had nothing to do with the bank beyond seeing Mr. De Kock on several occasions. Meyer Israelsohn assured witness that the bills were accommodation notes.

Richard Seymour, acting manager of the Oudtshoorn branch of the Standard Bank, who relieved Mr. De Kock in January, 1905, stated that when the defendant called at the bank, there was no insinuation of his having signed the documents under threats from Mr. De Kock. The defendant asked for an extension of time, and it was agreed to accept from him £100 a month, with the interest. The defendant paid for two months.

Mr. Schreiner closed his case.

Marcus Hotz (defendant) stated he had lived at Oudtshoorn for about 21 years. His main business was dealing in ostriches. On August 2, when Meyer Israelsohn went away, Mr. De Kock asked witness if he was coming in to sign a guarantee for £1,000, and witness said it was a good thing that he could meet his own liabilities. It was on the 11th August that he found out that there was anything wrong in the bills. He got the knowledge through Mr. Foster, who said witness must come urgently to the office. Mr. Foster said that some of the farmers had made an affidavit that bills in the Standard Bank were forged, that he had seen some of them, and that witness should try and take these bills up. Mr. De Kock told Mr. Foster that if the bills were not immediately retired, he would make an affidavit, and have the Israelsohn Bros. arrested. Mr. De Kock showed him some of the bills where the hundreds were "cramped" in the body of them, and that the figures had been added in different ink. Mr. De Kock said he had asked Meyer Israelsohn to explain, and Meyer Israelsohn said he had used two inkpots. Mr. De Kock threatened if witness did not take the bills up, he would make an affidavit and have them arrested. Witness said he could not take up the bills. When he returned, Mr. Foster said: "You have been a long time in Oudtshoorn; you have a respectable family, and you should take up the bills." Several times later on Foster advised witness to take up the bills. At a meeting between Mr. Foster, Meyer Israelsohn, Isidore Israelsohn, and witness, Meyer said that the bills were for accommodation. Witness denied that they were forgeries, and Mr. Foster said: "What is the good of talking like that?" Mr. Foster said if witness did not take up the bills, all the three would go to gaol. Mr. De Kock sent for witness and Isidore, and said he had not slept for nights, and said he had a telegram from the general manager to the effect that if the bills were not taken up, an affidavit must be lodged at once to have the Israelsohns arrested. Mr. De Kock added that witness would not be a heavy loser over the transaction, and then he produced a slip of paper with the amount of the bills, and said to witness that he would get £648 from the farmers and 10s. in the £ from the estate. Mr. De Kock, in conclusion, said: "You will only be a loser of £1,100 or £1,200," and then witness signed the document. Mr. De Kock said he would not give up the bills unless witness gave a guarantee for £890, and witness agreed to give this. When they met at Mr. Foster's office Mr. Foster said he would require time to consider the transaction. Witness signed the documents in Mr. Foster's office. Witness never had the bills in his possession. Nothing but the forgery was in his mind when he agreed to sign the documents. When the bills came into court witness had an interview with the manager of the Bank of Africa, took legal advice, and then ceased payment. Witness knew that a special policeman was watching Meyer, and when witness signed the bills the watch was withdrawn. Mr. De Kock told witness of the vigilance of the police. If Mr. De Kock had not said he would have these people arrested he would not have signed the bills. He never instructed Mr. Foster to do any work for him in connection with these bills; he had never had any account from Mr. Foster.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: When he was asking the bank for leniency he had a fine balance to his credit. Witness was a keen business man, and had made his money in keen competition at Oudtshoorn.

Did you ever buy a pig in a poke?—Yes, sometimes.

Mr. Searle: I'm sure he doesn't know the meaning of that.

Mr. Schreiner: Do you know the meaning of "pig in a poke"?—No.

Then why do you say "Yes" to my question?—I thought you were joking.

Would you say yes to every joke?—Yes.

You and the Israelsohns are very clannish?—Yes.

Mr. Searle: He doesn't know the meaning of "clannish."

Mr. Schreiner: Do you know the meaning of clannish?—No.

You are fond of your family?—Yes.

Continuing, witness said that Meyer never asked him for a guarantee for £1,000. Mr. Foster did not say that witness was signing the guarantee, because he had promised to do so. He knew that his brother-in-law Meyer was being shadowed in Oudtshoorn, but he did not know that the other two partners of the firm were being watched.

When witness saw Strydom's bill he remarked to Mr. De Kock: "How can you discount such a bill?" Mr. De Kock replied that Meyer satisfied him when he saw that he had used two inkpots. Witness had no doubt that Mr. De Kock would carry out his threat to have the three partners arrested. Witness did not care so much what happened to Meyer, but he was anxious about Isidore. Mr. Foster's statement that all three would be arrested weighed very much on his mind.

Re-examined by Mr. Searle: At that time he had no idea of taking over the business. There was pressure brought to bear upon him by his family in the matter. His family were distressed over the question of the bills, not over the prospect of insolvency.

Isidore Israelsohn, brother-in-law of the defendant, and one of the partners in the late firm of Israelsohn Brothers, stated that in July the firm was pressed for money. About the 8th or 9th August, he first knew that there was anything wrong with the bill. Mr. De Kock sent for him, and pointed out the different ink used in the figures. Mr. De Kock then said if the bills were not taken up he would have the three partners arrested and sent to the "King's Breakwater," and they would get five or seven years. Mr. De Kock said the only one who could help them was the defendant. Mr. Foster said that if the bills were not taken up Mr. De Kock would make an affidavit and have all three arrested. Mr. Foster added that as they were partners, they were all liable. Mr. Hotz said he would consider the matter. Witness gave corroborative evidence as to what took place in Mr. De Kock's office. After the prosecution in September last he remained at Oudtshoorn. When the proceedings were taken in October last against Hotz in the Supreme Court, witness did not make an affidavit, because he was not asked to do so. Witness was summoned by Messrs. Jagger in July, and informed Mr. De Kock. On all the bills Mr. De Kock showed witness different inks were used. Witness did not bring a single one of these bills to the bank. Witness was positive that Mr. De Kock said: "I'll have you all three arrested." He denied that Mr. Foster was ever his attorney in the course of the proceedings. He did not go to his own attorney and inform him of the threat of prosecution on account of the bills. Every time he met Mr. De Kock the latter would say: "All three of you will be arrested." Mr. Foster said to Mr. Meyer: "Even a blind man can see the forgery." Mr. Foster also threatened that all three would be arrested. Witness was not aware that Mr. Foster was then acting as attorney for the defendant or Israelsohn Bros. The defendant was a man of "weak nature," and when the position was put to him, he broke down and cried. He did not fear the sequestration of the estate; he dreaded being arrested and charged with forgery, as being one of the principals of the firm. He did not protest to Mr. De Kock against his name being put in an affidavit, nor did he point out that he had nothing to do with the bills. He was not aware of the law, and did not know that he could not be charged. Prince, Vincent and Co. did not sign a deed of compromise and then withdraw.

Re-examined by Mr. Searle: Mr. Foster acted for Messrs. Jagger in the case against Israelsohn Bros. During that time Mr. Jacobsohn was doing witness's legal work.

Stephen Albert Horne, formerly Chief Constable at Oudtshoorn, stated that Mr. De Kock came to his office and requested him to watch Meyer Israelsohn, as he might be arrested for some crime. Witness detailed two men to watch Meyer Israelsohn. On the evening of the 18th Mr. De Kock said that the watch could be withdrawn. There was common talk about the place of forgeries.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: It was only Meyer Israelsohn who was to be watched.

Wolfe Saunders stated that Isidore Israelsohn was his brother-in-law. In August Mr. Foster sent for him, acquainted him of the forgeries, told him that all three brothers would be arrested, and asked him to use his influence with Mr. Hotz so that the matter did not go any further. Eventually witness agreed to assist the defendant in the matter.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He regarded Mr. Foster as having an interest in the bank's affairs. Witness always consulted Mr. Foster on matters of business.

Re-examined by Mr. Searle: He came out to South Africa from London for the purposes of the case.

Joseph Wiseman Sydney, who acted as manager for Kenner and Co. in August, stated that at the beginning of that month, as far as he knew, Israelsohn Bros. were in a perfectly sound position. Witness tried to arrange a composition when he was acquainted with the state of affairs. Mr. De Kock was emphatic that the composition should go through, and told witness it was a case of forgery.

Jack Gassner, local manager of Kenner and Co., Oudtshoorn, stated that in 1904 his firm were creditors of Messrs. Israelsohn to a considerable sum. Mr. De Kock was a party to the arrangement of witness's firm, paying in the cheques on behalf of Israelsohn Bros. He did not think he was doing anything wrong. The effect was to reduce the overdraft of Israelsohn Bros for a few days.

Matthias Smit stated that in July 1904, he signed a note to Meyer Israelsohn, for £29 7s. 8d. Subsequently he received a note from the bank that he was indebted in the sum of £229 7s. 8d., and he pointed to the bank manager that a figure had been added. Witness produced his account, and receipts to Mr. Foster. Some time afterwards Meyer Israelsohn brought the bill and destroyed it in front of witness. Portions of it were picked up by witness, and put in at the trial.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: Witness had never given Meyer Israelsohn any accommodation. There were other people in the district who did business with Israelsohn.

J. G. Strydom, farmer, of Oudtshoorn, stated in July, 1904, he gave a bill for £28. Meyer Israelsohn wrote out the bill. It was written out before he signed. Witness got a notice from the bank on a bill for £228, and he then produced to the bank manager the receipt for £28. The bill was subsequently destroyed by a man who was very often in Israelsohn's shop.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He had never accommodated the firm of Israelsohn Bros. He might have given a bill for more than he actually owed.

This concluded the evidence.

Maasdorp, J., said the defendant, having admitted the execution of these notes, the burden of establishing the illegality of the consideration rested upon him.

Mr. Searle said that the letters written by Mr. De Kock to his head office went very nearly as far as admitting that the documents were signed under threats to prosecute. Hotz signed because he wanted to prevent a prosecution for forgery. By afterwards passing a bond he could not make the illegal transaction legal. It was only after it came out that the Israelsohns were after all going to be prosecuted for forgery that the defendant decided not to pay. De Kock certainly intended Hotz to believe that he would prosecute the Israelsohns if the forged bills were not retired. If he did not intend to prosecute why did he get the police to shadow Meyer Israelsohn? It was idle to say that De Kock had no intention to prosecute. He submitted on the authority of Harris v. Krige (2 J., 399) that if the note was signed with a view to avoiding the disclosure of the forgeries, with the knowledge of De Kock, then the bank could not recover on the note.

Mr. Schreiner was not called upon.

Maasdorp, J.: In the view I take of the evidence in this case, I do not think it is necessary to hear Mr. Schreiner in reply. The plaintiff seeks to recover from the defendant the sum of £3,378, as the balance due upon a promissory note made by the defendant in favour of Messrs. Israelsohn Bros., and he claims upon a guarantee given by the defendant for the balance that might be due between Israelsohn Bros. and the bank, which balance ultimately was discovered to amount to the sum of £890. The defendant admits the execution of these documents. He alleges that they were the result of an illegal and immoral agreement between the plaintiff and himself, which agreement was stated to amount to this: "It was known at the time that certain notes were in possession of the bank, which were forged by a person called Meyer Israelsohn, and at an interview between the defendant and the plaintiff it is stated it was agreed that upon the defendant taking up these forged notes that the plaintiff, who had threatened a prosecution against Meyer Israelsohn, would, in consideration of the receipt of these notes, withdraw the prosecution, or, rather promise not to prosecute. I do not think it will be necessary in a case of this kind to establish by evidence that any express promise in so many words was made on the part of the person who undertakes not to prosecute, because it is an undertaking which is tacitly understood by the parties. A tacit undertaking in the matter would equally express terms as if it were made in so many words. The Court has to decide now whether in consideration for that note there was an express or a tacit undertaking on the part of Mr. De Kock and Mr. Foster not to prosecute Meyer Israelsohn. In the plea it is alleged that such undertaking was given by Mr. De Kock, the manager of the bank, and by Mr. Faber, acting as attorney for such manager. In the greater part of the argument it was advanced by Mr. Searle that Mr. De Kock found himself in difficulties in reference to the management of the bank. I would prefer to approach the case from the point of view of the difficulties in which the defendant, who is related to Meyer Israelsohn and the family, found himself in respect to this alleged forgery. The promissory note was made and the guarantee given on the 18th of August, and the question now arises as to the position of affairs immediately before the 18th of August. It is quite clear that it had come to the knowledge of Hotz and the other members of the family of Israelsohn that there were certain notes in existence of a very suspicious character, and which pointed to a fraudulent transaction on the part of Meyer Israelsohn. I am not prepared, in view of the evidence, to accept Mr. Hotz's statement on that point, but Mr. Foster admits that the defendant did receive the first information of the trouble from him. He says that it was quite possible before going into any transaction between Mr. Foster and the parties, he would regard the case simply from what was likely to have occurred. Undoubtedly the family was very much distressed when the information was conveyed, and by the prospect of the trouble.

His Lordship, after reviewing the evidence, said he was inclined to believe the versions put forward by Messrs. De Kock and Foster, and gave judgment for the plaintiff for the amounts claimed with interest and costs.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

REX V. DU PLESSIS. { 1906.
Aug. 7th.

Magistrate's find on facts overruled — Spoor evidence — Caning of juvenile offenders — Act 21 of 1869, Sec. 2.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Sutherland, who had convicted the appellant (Henrik du Plessis) of the crime of theft.

From the record, it appeared that one Stephanus Hermanus was a shepherd, in the district of Sutherland, and that on the 22nd May last he missed a kettle, mug, and other belongings from a cave that he occupied. The allegation was that appellant (aged 16 years) and Gert du Plessis (aged 11 years) took away the shepherd's belongings, while he was looking after the sheep of his master,

The Magistrate found Hendrik du Plessis guilty, and sentenced him to receive sixteen cuts with the cane. Gert du Plessis was found not guilty, and discharged.

Mr. Louwrens was for appellant; Mr. Howel Jones was for the Crown.

Hopley, J., pointed out that Hendrik was too old to be caned.

Mr. Louwrens said that the ground of appeal was not only that the sentence was irregular, but that the conviction was against the weight of the evidence.

Later on, a letter addressed by the Magistrate to the Registrar of the Supreme Court was read, in the course of which he said: "I erred as regards the age for caning a juvenile, for the moment being under the impression that the age limit in terms of section 1 of Act 21, 1869, was 16, whereas it is 14 years. The accused was too old to be sent to a reformatory; to imprison him with other criminals would have been cruel; and to indenture him for a year or two for the paltry theft with which he was charged was too severe. Under the circumstances, the best punishment would have been a whipping, which I subsequently discovered was illegal."

[Hopley, J.: There was always the alternative of a fine.]

Counsel having been heard in argument on the evidence.

Hopley, J.: In this case, two white lads, called Du Plessis, the elder brother aged 16 and the younger aged 11, were charged with having stolen a kettle, a mug, a bradawl, a tin of fat, a quantity of meat, and a quantity of meal, the property of one Stephanus Hermanus, a shepherd. It appears that Hermanus lives in a cave at his outpost, and that he had there his ordinary provisions and small household belongings. He lives in this cave with his brother, and about two miles or two and a half miles off, on the next farm, also at an outpost, were these two boys herding. The accused were in charge of a flock of sheep, and lived in a krantz in the mountain side. On Tuesday, the 22nd May, Stephanus went away, leaving his belongings in the cave. It was an open cave, without a door, and he went and herded his sheep towards the boundary, which runs between there and the farm where these two lads worked. On that day he says that these lads were herding their flock, also in the direction of the boundary, and they must have been only a few hundred yards from him. He says that on that day they and their flock were under his observation practically. Shepherds, one knows, keep their eyes open in the wide veld. He says that if these lads had gone to his cave they would have to sneak along the river bed to elude his vision. When he went home he missed the articles charged in the indictment, and next day, I think it was, he looked at the spoor, and he found, he says, a small spoor, bare foot, a child's spoor, coming from the direction of the river towards his cave, and going back again. Now, that is only one spoor, and it went in that direction, and it might very well be that, because it was a child's spoor, and he knew there was a child herding on the other side, his suspicions were at once directed against these two boys. But he does not follow the spoor up to find out whether it led all the way to where the lads lived; we do not know whether it branched off, or anything of that sort, but he reports to his master, who reports to the policeman on Thursday, a few days afterwards. On that day the policeman, having been informed about the bare foot spoor leading in the direction of these children, and amongst other things that there was a kettle which Stephanus's master said he had seen there, and that he identified it as his shepherd's, set about his quest with the idea in his head that these boys were the thieves. One must not lose sight, in weighing the evidence in this case, of the fact that beyond the boundary there is a space of veld of nearly two miles before you come to the place where these two boys lived, and the spoor is not traced beyond the boundary at all, nor does one know how it branched off. Suppose a little coloured boy or woman, with a small foot, had stolen these goods, the indications, so far as the spoors were concerned, would have been exactly the same. No trouble was taken about measuring these spoors, and no trouble was taken about comparing the feet of the accused with the spoors. Consequently, it seems to me that the evidence as to the spoors is very unsatisfactory, and not at all conclusive. The only other thing that is alleged to connect the accused with the crime is the kettle. That kettle does not seem to me to have been anything but an ordinary kettle. There is nothing to show why the shepherd's master should have identified this kettle, or know it from any other. One cannot help coming to the conclusion that, because he saw two kettles at the place where these boys lived, he jumped to the conclusion that one of the kettles was his herd's, which had been stolen. The policeman evidently was under the same impression, because he had been told by Muller that it was his herd's. The policeman laid a trap by removing one of the kettles, and then, because of the answer given by the accused, he is supposed to have shown disingenuous conduct, pointing to his guilt. It does not seem to me that the Magistrate has taken sufficient notice of the evidence for the defence in this matter. There were other things stolen at this time besides the kettle, and these must have been hunted for, but not a single trace of them has been found. On the whole, it seems to me that the circumstances are altogether such as might not be incompatible with the innocence of both these prisoners. I think, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed and the conviction quashed.

[Appellant's Attorneys: Syfret, God-lonton and Low.]

REX V. WESLEY.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Matatiele, who had convicted appellant of contravening section 243 of the Native Territories Penal Code (Act 24 of 1886), and had sentenced him to a fine of £2 or one week's imprisonment with hard labour.

Appellant, it appeared, was a private in the C.M.R., and he was charged that on the 4th June last he did wilfully damage and injure the door of a room occupied by one Elizabeth by breaking it open. His story was that the place was used as a brothel. He admitted that he had no right in the room except as a visitor.

The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, said that the accused went to a private residence in the night while the occupants were asleep, and knocked at the door, and, receiving no response, deliberately broke the door. He held that the breaking of the door was committed with malicious intent.

Mr. Benjamin was for appellant; Mr. Howel Jones was for the Crown.

Mr. Benjamin said it was admitted that this was a very old door, and that the door split into two portions. This was a serious charge for the accused, who was a private in the C.M.R. There was, counsel submitted, no evidence whatever that Wesley acted maliciously. The real reason of the prosecution was that appellant went to the room to see another woman, Emma, and there seemed to have been some feeling between Elizabeth and Emma. Apparently there was some jealousy on the part of Elizabeth.

[Hopley, J.: You may spin your theory, of course, but there is nothing in the evidence.]

Mr. Benjamin (proceeding) contended that it was not shown that appellant acted recklessly and deliberately.

Hopley, J.: It is not necessary to hear Mr. Jones for the Crown in this case. The accused was charged with wilfully damaging and injuring the door of a certain room or rooms occupied by one Elizabeth by breaking the said door. He is charged under a section which reads: "Whoever wilfully commits upon any property whatever any wilful damage or injury shall be punished," etc. Section 250 defines what the word wilfully means as being "every one who causes any event by an act which he knew would probably cause that event, being reckless, whether such event happened or not, shall be deemed to cause it wilfully for this part of the code." In the present instance the accused went at night to the house of Elizabeth, a place where he had been before, and where apparently he had visited one Emma. On this occasion Emma was not there, and the evidence of Elizabeth is that the accused had no right whatever on her premises, nor had Emma either. He knocked, the door was not opened to him, and he proceeded to push it in such a way that it broke. Now, the Magistrate has held that he deliberately did this. Well, I suppose the Magistrate is right in that. Accused did not do it by accident. He did an act which he knew would probably open the door, and he behaved in such a way that the Magistrate was justified in thinking that appellant acted recklessly. The Magistrate was right in holding that he committed an act which would break open the door. I should not have been at all disinclined to agree with the Magistrate if, under the circumstances, he had held that there was no deliberate intent, and had discharged the accused after he had lectured him in regard to going about at night in that way. But the Magistrate has held that it was a wilful act, and, therefore, I must hold that it was deliberately done, and I must find that accused had contravened the section. I do not see how I can find that the Magistrate's verdict was a wrong one. The appeal must be dismissed.

CHIPPS V. VAN CALKER.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Assistant Resident Magistrate of Matatiele in an action brought against appellant by respondent to recover £44 15s. 9d., for goods sold and delivered.

The Magistrate gave judgment for plaintiff for £44 9s. 3d., with costs, and rejected the evidence given by defendant and his witnesses as unreliable.

The action was brought by the Rev. Theo. E. van Calker, superintendent of the Moravian Missionary Society, and the business had been carried on in the name of Martin and Co., but it was said to belong to the society. The defendant had admitted liability for £3 17s. 3d., and no more, pleading that he had paid £10, for which no credit had been given, that he had delivered six bags of mealies, for which he had not been credited, and that certain goods had been debited to him, of which he had not had delivery. There appeared to have been a change of managers at the store during the transactions, Mr. Martin, who had had charge of the business, having died in August, 1902.

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan was for appellant; Mr. Sutton was for respondent.

Mr. Buchanan having been heard in argument,

Hopley, J.: Throughout and up to the day of coming into court and half-way through the case the locus standi of the plaintiff was not objected to. His right to sue was never questioned, and the case went on as if he were actually the principal to whom these moneys were owing. Now, as far as I can gather from the evidence—and I think it is a correct inference—the facts are that Mr. Van Calker, and before him Mr. Bouer, were simply the managers for the Moravian Missionary Society, and that all along the Moravian Society has been carrying on this trading station under the name of H. Martin or H. Martin and Co. At the date when this account was opened, Mr. Martin himself was there as manager, and apparently as their book-keeper. The defendant had carried on a system of purchasing on credit, and now and then sent produce or paid something in cash from the account. Entries were made in his pass-book by the manager. He never during the lifetime of Mr. Martin disputed a single item of this account, but at the end of Mr. Martin's entries he himself has put in an entry in his own handwriting, and it is the only entry in his handwriting in the whole book, of "by cash £10, 18th April." Either Mr. Martin himself or a subsequent book-keeper scratched it out as being an unwarranted entry. The Magistrate has gone into the whole of this matter, he has had the evidence of the book-keeper, who was there when the rest of the items were entered, and he is satisfied that these amounts are due. The Magistrate disallowed certain items amounting to 4s. 7d., which could not be specified, and gave judgment for the plaintiff for £44 9s. 3d. I see no reason whatever to disturb such judgment, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

In re INSOLVENT ESTATE GOLDSMITH AND CO.

Mr. Benjamin moved, on the petition of the Federal Supply and Cold Storage Co., of South Africa, Ltd., W. R. Jocks and Co., and McArthur, Atkins and Co., for an order for the removal of Ralph Fernandez from office as provisional trustee in the insolvent estate of Goldsmith and Co., Marble Arch Butchery, and the appointment of J. E. P. Close, as provisional trustee. Counsel said that they did not apply at this stage for the actual removal of Fernandez, but they thought it was necessary that Mr. Close should also be appointed provisional trustee to exercise some control over Fernandez. There were such serious allegations made against this gentleman that it was desirable to appoint someone to co-operate with him.

Hopley, J.: On the 2nd August, when application was made to have the insolvent estate of Goldsmith and Co. finally adjudicated, the respondent Fernandez was appointed provisional trustee. The present applicants say, in regard to the respondent, that, besides what they describe as his high-handed procedure in not handing over the business to the curator bonis for some little time, there is something which requires inquiry in this case, in view of the fact that certain pages of the books of the firm, which dealt with his account, are mutilated, and I suppose it is implied that this was done by him. These, of course, are serious allegations, and one does not decide or say anything about them one way or another, behind the back of respondent; he is not here, and I am not quite sure that he has personally received notice of this application. At the same time, the allegations are of such a nature that it would be desirable to go out of the usual course of practice and appoint somebody to act with him, and I think that the application might be acceded to, so as to appoint Mr. Close co-provisional trustee with Mr. Fernandez in this matter. The order of the Court, therefore, is that Mr. J. E. P. Close be joined with the said Ralph Fernandez as provisional trustee. The question of costs may stand over. There will be no order as to costs made at present as to costs.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

FILLIS V. CAPE TOWN CORPORATION. { 1906.
Aug. 8th.
" 24th.

Mr. Upington mentioned the matter of Fillis and the Cape Town Corporation, which recently came before his lordship in Chambers. An application had been made to restrain the Council from demolishing the building on the Parade, known as the Circus.

Maasdorp, J., said there was no allegation that the Council meant to take immediate action, and the applicant could move the Court after notice to the respondent, but they had not done so. There was an affidavit now that the respondents had begun to demolish the building. Already a large portion of the roof had been removed, and the action of the respondents would cause serious damage to the applicant. If the respondents were restrained from proceeding, their position could not in any way be injured.

Maasdorp, J., granted a rule nisi calling on the Town Council to show cause why they should not be restrained from pulling down the Circus, the rule to act as an interim interdict, and to be returnable to-morrow (Thursday) week.

Postea (August 24).

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

Mr. Upington was for applicant; Mr. Douglas Buchanan (in the absence of his leader, Mr. Schreiner, K.C.) was for respondents.

Mr. Upington read the petition upon which the rule was granted.

Mr. Buchanan read lengthy replying affidavits.

De Villiers, C.J., remarked that the only question seemed to be who should remove the building.

Mr. Buchanan: The applicant is now removing the building.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Well then, what is the dispute about?]

Mr. Buchanan: It is merely a matter of costs.

De Villiers, C.J., asked why the Council did not stay their hands and allow the applicant to remove his own Building.

Mr. Buchanan said he supposed that the Council had some doubts as to whether the order to demolish would be complied with. Mr. Buchanan having been heard in argument on the facts.

De Villiers, C.J.: The applicant Fillis for a long time occupied this space on the Parade ground, and had this building put upon it. It was not a mere precarious tenuro in the sense that nothing was paid, because considerable rent was paid all the time when the applicant was in possession. But there was a very stringent clause in the agreement between the parties that the applicant was bound to remove the building upon 24 hours' notice. That does not mean that only 24 hours would be allowed to remove the building. That would be practically impossible in the case of a large building like that; he must start the removal within 24 hours after he had got notice. That clause in the agreement the applicant was bound by, and up to a certain point the applicant was entirely in the wrong. That is quite clear. But the reason why the applicant really was in the wrong was because there was a misunderstanding apparently. The applicant believed that he had received permission from the military authorities as well as from the Colonial Government. The Town Council had told the applicant that if there were no objection on the part of the military authorities and the Colonial Government, the applicant could remain in possession until the 30th September, 1906, and, the letter added, "Failing which I am to intimate that it will be necessary for you to remove the building and vacate the site on the Parade in accordance with the notification already given to you by the Council." That letter was dated the 29th June, 1906. After that considerable correspondence took place between the parties, and there is no doubt that the applicant, believing that he had got the consent of the military authorities, thought he was entitled to remain in possession. The mistake the applicant made was in not obtaining written consent from Colonel MacKenzie. In point of fact, it appears that Colonel MacKenzie wrote to the Town Council that he refused his consent. It is now said, however, that that letter was written before the verbal consent was given to the applicant, but, even so, I think that the applicant ought then to have got a written consent from the colonel, and sent that written consent to the Town Council. Instead of that, he continued the discussion. I think it is to be regretted that Colonel MacKenzie has not made an affidavit. I understand he is in Cape Town, and there is no affidavit from him denying the statement of the two witnesses to the effect that he had given his verbal consent. But the real reason why these people were continually insisting upon having a continuation of the lease until the 30th September was because they believed that they had got the consent of Colonel MacKenzie. They were wrong, however, in not sending in a written consent, and up to a certain point the Town Council were quite within their rights in telling the applicant that he must remove the building, and that if he did not remove the building the Town Council would remove it. But then the applicant, seeing that it was hopeless to continue this discussion, suggested to the Town Council that they should forego all legal rights, advertise the place for sale immediately and sell the building by public auction on the Saturday morning, the 11th August, with the condition that the purchaser removes the building within one week, and the further condition that the building be not touched by the respondents in the meantime. Now, in my opinion, that was a most reasonable suggestion. A building like that could not be removed within 24 hours, and the applicant, who had set up the building, and who had intended to sell it, would be able to take it down with greater care. It may be quite true that the Town Council are the owners, we will treat the Town Council as the owners of the property, but where a lessee has made certain improvements upon that property, and he is entitled to remove those improvements, he ought to have a reasonable time for removing those improvements, and the owner of the property has no right forcibly to remove those improvements if the lessee himself expresses his willingness to do so. Now, the Town Council did not think the applicants would carry out their offer, but there is no ground for supposing that they would not. All that they did was up to a certain point they insisted upon their rights, and when they found they could not succeed in obtaining their rights, they made what appears to me this very reasonable offer. It is simply absurd to say, as the respondents do in their affidavits, that to allow the applicant to remove the building would have been an admission that the Town Council's action was in any way unjust or illegal, or would cause the applicant any injury. Their action had up to that time not been unjust, but they certainly became unreasonable when this lessee offered to remove the materials himself, and asked only for a week's time to do it, and they refused that permission. The sale was to take place on the Saturday, the applicant wished to sell it on that day, and within a week's time he offered to remove it. Under these circumstances, I think the applicant was quite justified in applying to the Court for an interdict. He wished to remove the building himself. The Town Council unreasonably took upon themselves the right to remove the building, and the applicant was entitled to come into court and apply for an interdict. The application must, therefore, be granted, with costs, on condition that the applicant remove the building and reinstate the Parade ground in the condition in which it was before the building was erected within one week from Monday next.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

COOKE V. COOKE. { 1906.
Aug. 8th.

Restitution of conjugal rights—
Domicile.

A wife who does not reside within the jurisdiction is entitled to a decree of restitution of conjugal rights against a husband domiciled here, who has maliciously deserted her.

Jacks v. Jacks followed. (Cur. dubitant, whether a divorce consequent on such order would be recognized in England).

This was an action brought by Geraldine Cooke, of London, England, against her husband, Henry Bell Cooke, of Cape Town, for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce, with forfeiture of any benefits of the marriage and costs.

Plaintiff, in her declaration, said that defendant was domiciled in this colony. She was married to defendant at Folkestone in February, 1894, and they thereafter lived together at Folkestone and other places. There was issue of the marriage—one child, aged eleven years. In 1899 defendant wrongfully and unlawfully deserted plaintiff, and had not since returned to her, or in any way restored to her conjugal rights.

Mr. Swift was for plaintiff; defendant had been barred.

[Hopley, J. (to counsel): She has never been in this country.]

Mr. Swift: No, my lord, but her husband is domiciled in this colony, and so the action has to be brought here.

[Hopley, J.: Have you any authority for this application?]

Mr. Swift cited Jacks v. Jacks (13 C.T.R., 101).

[Hopley, J.: I think we might have a good many of these cases if once we grant divorces in this way. People cannot get divorces in England, unless there are some more substantial misdeeds than this.]

Mr. Swift: Yes, but the husband being domiciled here, the action must be brought here.

[Hopley, J.: Yes, but what is to prevent husband or wife from taking up a temporary residence here for the purpose of getting a divorce which could not be obtained in England except for some grave misdemeanour? I see that in this case of Jacks v. Jacks I seem to have concurred in the judgment delivered by the Chief Justice. I suppose it is a fiction of law that the husband's domicile is the wife's domicile.]

Mr. Swift: Yes, my lord. Counsel proceeded to read the evidence of plaintiff taken on commission in London. From this it appeared that in 1897 defendant told his wife that he was going to America to fight in the Cuban war, and that he wrote sometimes from the seat of war, but he never said anything about providing for her. He subsequently returned, and said that he was sorry he had gone to America, and he promised to find a home for plaintiff. This, however, he did not carry out. She met him in 1899 at the Golden Cross Hotel in London, where they stayed a few days. He gave her £30, and then went away, saying that he wished to see his solicitors to obtain money, so that he could provide for her. He had not contributed anything towards her support since then. She wrote to his people asking for his address, but it was denied her, and she was told that any letters sent to them would be forwarded. She had received a letter from defendant in South Africa. She understood that her husband had expressed a fixed intention to reside permanently in South Africa. She was advised that, if his domicile were in South Africa, she must bring her action here. She was willing to come to South Africa if defendant would provide her with a home. Counsel (in answer to the Court) said that the custody of the child was not in question now, as the child had been adopted by its grandparents.

Decree of restitution granted, defendant to receive plaintiff and restore conjugal rights to her on or before the 1st November, failing which, to show cause on the 12th December why a decree of divorce should not be granted as prayed, with costs.

Hopley, J., added: Whether such a divorce so obtained would be of any value in England, I do not know.

Mr. Swift: I should think the English Courts would recognise it.

Hopley, J.: I doubt it very much. They do not recognise some of the American divorces.

Mr. Swift: The husband is domiciled here.

Hopley, J.: Well, he may go and be domiciled in America. However, that is a question for the plaintiff. There was a nobleman who got divorced in America not so long ago, and he went and remarried in England, and was prosecuted for bigamy.

Mr. Swift: The circumstances were rather different in that case.

Hopley, J.: But he had got his divorce.

The matter had been before the Court on the 1st inst., when, in view of certain statements that the defendant was seriously ill, it was ordered to stand over.

The matter arose out of certain bills of costs claimed by applicants against defendant.

In re INSOLVENT ESTATE { 1906.
GOLDING. { Aug. 9th.

Mr. Roux moved, as a matter of urgency, for the appointment of Johannes S. de Villiers, assistant secretary of the Paarl Board of Executors, as provisional trustee of the insolvent estate of Lazarus Golding.

Order granted, appointing Mr. De Villiers provisional trustee, with power to sell perishables and collect debts.

Ex parte* FORREST.

Mr. Toms moved for a rule nisi under the Derelict Land Act to be made absolute.

Rule made absolute.

CHIAPPINI V. SHANBAN.

Dr. Greer moved for a temporary interdict restraining respondent from collecting, receiving, and appropriating the rents of certain property at Woodstock, during the existence of two mortgage bonds for £1,600 and £800, with the interest thereon. The ground of the petition was that respondent, being in arrear with the interest on the bonds, granted an irrevocable power of attorney to applicants to collect the rents of the property, and that they granted the respondent a sub-power to collect the rents and hand them over to the applicants.

Respondent produced certain written statements.

Buchanan, J., told respondent that he must have the statements on affidavit, and he ordered the matter to stand over till to-morrow.

Postea (August 10).

Respondent produced an affidavit in which he entered into the whole of the transactions at some length. Inter alia, he said that the applicant had not rendered him a statement of his indebtedness.

Buchanan, J. (to respondent): The applicant is to furnish you with an account between you within three days, and then you will be allowed until the end of the month to pay any arrear interest which may be due, and if such arrear interest is not settled by the 31st August you will be interdicted from interfering with the right of the applicant to collect the rents of the property, with costs.

NANNUCCI V. NANNUCCI.

Interdict—Restraint of trade.

This was an application for an interdict restraining respondent from trading in Cape Town, Claremont, or elsewhere in the Western Province in competition with the business of Nannucci, Ltd., at present trading at Woodstock as cleaners and dyers.

From the affidavits, it appeared that the restraint which was relied upon was contained in an agreement, which purported to transfer 20,000 shares in Nannucci, Ltd., to the respondent at 6s. per share. In consideration of the advantageous terms offered to him, it was said that he agreed to the restraint. The applicant said that he was chairman of Nannucci, Ltd., and the respondent was managing director, and that the latter was, in breach of the agreement, carrying on business under the style of the Parisian Dye Works, in Plein-street, Cape Town, and at a branch at Claremont, in opposition to the business of Nannucci, Ltd.

Respondent denied that he was the managing director of Nannucci, Ltd. He said that after the agreement was signed he pressed for transfer of the shares, but did not receive them, and in May the agreement was cancelled by consent. Respondent also said that a further agreement was entered into whereby he should be placed in control of Nannucci, Ltd., but it was not stipulated that he should give up the Parisian Dye Works business. He denied that the applicant had either amalgamated the Parisian Dye Works with Nannucci, Ltd., or had acquired the said business.

Applicant, in replying affidavits, said that since January last the expenses of the Parisian Dye Works had been paid by Nannucci, Ltd., and the work had been done by Nannucci, Ltd., at Woodstock. He denied that respondent had ever made any suggestion that the agreement should not affect the Parisian Dye Works. The sole difficulty about giving respondent transfer of the shares had been the latter's failure to find funds for the amounts payable.

Mr. Cloee was for applicant (Oreste Zaccaria Nannucci); Mr. P. S. T. Jones was for the respondent (Emilio Ambrogio Nannucci, son of the applicant).

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

Buchanan, J., said that, prima facie, the applicant was entitled to an interdict, and an interdict would be granted restraining respondent from engaging in any business in the Western Province in competition with the business of Nannucci, Ltd., leave reserved to respondent to bring an action to set aside the interdict, costs to abide the result of action; if no action be brought, costs to be paid by the respondent.

LINSCOTT V. LINSCOTT.

This was an application upon notice to the petitioner's husband (Arthur B.

Linscott) calling upon him to show cause why he should not be ordered to pay to the petitioner £30, to enable her to defend certain divorce proceedings, and 10 per month as alimony, pending the action.

From the affidavits, it appeared that the parties were married at the British Embassy in Paris, in 1898, and that the respondent, who had recently resigned his position as an assistant at the South African College, had commenced proceedings against applicant for divorce, by reason of her alleged adultery with one Charles Marsh. Applicant said that she had no means available. Respondent said that she had means, and that he was not earning anything at present.

Buchanan, J., commenting on an affidavit made by the respondent, said: In affidavits put into court, it is as well to use good English. "I am not in a billet at present"; that is not a happy expression. It is a bit of slang that ought to be avoided.

Dr. Greer was for applicant; Mr. Pohl was for respondent.

Dr. Greer having been heard in argument on the facts,

Buchanan, J.: This is not a case in which the Court should make the order asked for. The parties are married out of community. The husband is without employment, and he has only about £30 to his credit now. The wife is in possession of very considerable property, and there is no need for her to come and ask for an order. No order will be made.

Mr. Pohl asked whether costs would be costs in the cause?

Buchanan, J.: It is not usual to give costs against the wife in these cases. No order will be made.

It was stated that, after paying £41 10s. on each £25 share, and a bonus of £2,000 to the company's officers, a sum of £1,255 remained in hand.

Order granted as prayed, claims to be filed before the 30th November.

BENEKE V. DE WET.

This was an application upon notice to Daniel Jacobus de Wet to show cause why he should not be interdicted from carrying on business at Laingsburg as a law agent and auctioneer, or in either capacity. Mr. De Waal was for applicant; respondent appeared in person.

The applicant claimed that he was entitled to the interdict by reason of an agreement entered into between respondent and one Gordon, who had bought De Wet's business.

Respondent said that he did not enter into any contract with applicant.

No order was made, there being no privity of contract shown between applicant and respondent.

Ex parte BAYER AND CO.

Mr. W. Porter Buchanan moved, on the petition of Charles Bayer and Co., of London Wall, London, E.C. (proprietors of the "C.B." corsets), for the attachment of the interest of Strausser, Adler and Co., of New York, in a certain trade mark, to found jurisdiction for an action arising out of an alleged infringement of petitioners' trade mark. Counsel said that he believed it was not necessary in a matter of this kind to proceed by attachment.

Rule granted in similar terms to the order in the case of Wright, Crossley and Co. v. Royal Baking Powder Co., of New York (14 Supreme Court Reports, 366), rule returnable on the 14th November next.

CLIFFORD V. CLIFFORD.

Dr. Greer moved on the petition of John Whiteside Clifford, for an order upon respondent (Mrs. Clifford) directing her to deliver up a certain child named Dorothy Clifford, and declaring petitioner entitled to custody of the said child. The matter was a sequel to a divorce case heard in March, 1903 (13 C.T.R., 180).

Respondent appeared in person, and said that applicant was not a fit and proper person to have custody of the child. The little girl was attending a convent school in England. Applicant was not able to look after and support the child, and he was living in Hanover-street.

Buchanan, J., advised the respondent to have her statements embodied in an affidavit, and ordered the matter to stand over until August 16.

Postea (September 3rd).

Dr. Greer read an affidavit from petitioner praying that he be given the custody of his daughter Dorothy, who had been given into the care of his wife as the result of divorce proceedings, petitioner retaining the custody of the two sons of the marriage. He alleged that respondent was living with the co-respondent in the divorce proceedings.

Respondent, in a replying affidavit, stated that her daughter Dorothy was in England, where she was being educated. Respondent denied that she was living with the co-respondent in the divorce proceedings. Applicant was not a fit and proper person to have custody of the child. The little girl was attending a convent school in England. Applicant was not able to look after and support the child, and he was living in Hanover-street.

Mr. Palmer (for respondent) submitted that it would not be in the best interests of the child that she should be handed over to the custody of the father.

Buchanan, J., said respondent had disobeyed the order of the Court by not giving applicant access to his daughter; further, she had removed the child from the jurisdiction of the Court. Hence, she had deliberately disobeyed the order of the Court, and the Court would order her to give applicant access to the child. If the child had been sent out of the country she must restore it within two months to the jurisdiction of the Court. Respondent would pay the costs of the application, and leave would be given to the applicant to apply for the custody of the child, when she was within the jurisdiction of the Court.

Ex parte GRIEVES.

Mr. Benjamin moved for an order authorising the Master to accept certain documents as proof of death of petitioner's mother, Adelaide Sophia Grievos, who had died at the General Hospital, Calcutta.

Order granted as prayed.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

WILKE V. WILKE. { 1906.
Aug. 10th.

This was an application upon notice calling upon Fritz Wilke, butcher, Wynberg, to show cause why he should not be ordered to pay to applicant's attorneys £30, to enable her to defend proceedings for divorce instituted by respondent against her.

From the affidavits it appeared that respondent had instituted divorce proceedings against his wife by reason of her alleged adultery with one Herman Vienup, against whom £250 damages are claimed.

Applicant, in her affidavit, said that the proceedings were being brought by her husband to enable him to get married to one Hannah Brink, to whom he had promised marriage. The husband denied this, and said that the defendants were carrying on a butcher's business in opposition to his own in Wynberg. The applicant further alleged that her husband treated her cruelly, and that he was addicted to drink. It was stated by applicant that the co-respondent was employed by her as a Colonial sausage maker. Respondent said that he employed the woman Brink to assist in his business, but he denied that he was on intimate terms with her. The applicant and Vienup declared that their relationships were purely Platonic.

As to the questions at present before the Court, applicant said that her husband had property, and that he was in a position to provide her with funds for the purpose of defending the action. Respondent said that he could not furnish funds.

The parties were married in London in 1896.

Mr. Lewis was for applicant; Mr. Long was for respondent.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

Buchanan, J.: The rule is that when the wife is unable to defend an action brought against her by her husband, and the husband is able to do so, he may be compelled to supply her with means to defend the action. But this rule must be affected by the circumstances of each particular case. In this case the parties are married out of community of property, and the defendant (the wife) carries on business on her own behalf in her own name, apart from her husband. Prima facie, therefore, she would have no need of his assistance to defend the action. It is stated, and it is not denied that the husband has means, and is in a comfortable position. I think that he ought to assist his wife in some degree, but not to the extent applied for. The respondent will be ordered to pay applicant's attorneys £5 on filing plea, and a further £5 when the case is set down for trial, costs to be costs in the cause.

BECKER AND OTHERS V. WOLFAARDT.

This was an application brought by plaintiffs in the suit for a commission de bene esse, to issue to take the evidence of Jacobus Albertus Wolfaardt (one of the plaintiffs).

The ground of the application was that the witness in question, who lives in the Ladismith district, was physically unfit to make the journey to Cape Town, and give his evidence in court. He was stated to be 83 years of age. The position of the respondents was that it was of the utmost importance that the witness should, if possible, give his evidence before the Court, and that, despite his great age, he was not unfit to make the journey.

Mr. Burton was for the applicants; Mr. Close (with him Mr. Roux) was for respondents.

Buchanan, J.: I think if the witness can be brought here it will be very much better. If Wolfaardt can possibly come, then let him do so. The Resident Magistrate of Ladismith, or the officer acting as such, will be appointed Commissioner to examine the witness, but subject to this condition, that at the trial applicants must show that he is unfit to appear here before his evidence taken on Commission is read. Costs will be costs in the cause.

SILBERMAN V. SILBERMAN.

Mr. Lewis again mentioned this matter, which was an application for leave to petitioner to sue her husband in forma pauperis for restitution of conjugal rights. The application had been standing over for further information as to domicile. Counsel said that he was now prepared to certify in favour of the application.

Rule nisi granted calling upon respondent to show cause on the last day of term why leave should not be granted to petitioner to sue in forma pauperis, personal service, failing which one publication in the "Cape Times."

REX V. LEVINSON.

REX V. NEEDHAM.

Mr. Alexander moved, as a matter of urgency, for an order for the release of the accused Barnet Levinson and Abraham Needham on bail.

Mr. Nightingale (for the Crown) opposed the application.

The affidavit of H. Hirschberg, attorney, acting on behalf of the petitioner Levinson, stated that on the morning of the 10th August petitioner was charged in the Resident Magistrate's Court, Cape Town, with the crime of inciting to violence. No evidence was led, and accused was remanded until the 17th August, and was refused bail by the Assistant Resident Magistrate.

Buchanan, J.: This is a matter which is in the discretion of the Magistrate.

Mr. Nightingale said that he had a replying affidavit, but Buchanan, J., interposed, and said that there was no need to put in the affidavit. He remarked that there was nothing stated in the affidavit of the attorney to show why the Court should interfere with the decision of the Magistrate.

Mr. Alexander: I submit that the crime is not a capital crime, and there is no reason stated why these men should not be released on bail. There is power in all cases to come to the Supreme Court and apply for bail. The accused are willing to give bail in any amount fixed by the Attorney-General, and to his satisfaction. I submit it is very inequitable to refuse bail altogether, as though this were a capital charge.

Mr. Nightingale: I put in the Proclamation calling out the Volunteer force to assist the ordinary police force during these troubles. That is one ground.

Buchanan, J.: By the Statute law of this country a prisoner is entitled to apply for bail as soon as he is committed for trial, but before then he is not entitled, as of right to bail. The Magistrate at his discretion may admit to bail before committing, but the accused cannot before then claim bail as of right. As soon as he is committed for trial, the Magistrate is required, except in capital cases, to admit the prisoner to bail, and also required not to ask excessive bail, and power is given to appeal to the Supreme Court in all cases, whether capital or not. Prima facie, that means that where a man is entitled to bail, and reasonable bail is refused, or if it is a capital case, he can apply to the Supreme Court. I am not prepared to limit the power of the Supreme Court to granting bail at any time, where good reason is shown. But here the applicants were only arrested yesterday on a serious charge, the preliminary examination has not been taken, they have not been committed for trial, and they have no right whatever to apply for bail. No special grounds are shown why the Court should interfere with the discretion of the Magistrate. The application is refused.

APPEAL.

ASSETS REALISATION CO., LTD. V. ARGUS PRINTING AND PUBLISHING CO.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Assistant Resident Magistrate of Cape Town in an action brought by appellants against respondents to recover £7 10s., value of certain process block handed to them by one Hildyard Home Drummond, which, it was alleged, had been delivered by the Argus Co. to the wrong person, viz., one Stevens.

Dr. Greer was for appellant; Mr. Upton was for respondent.

The judgment of the Court below was, absolution from the instance, with costs.

Counsel having been heard in argument,

Buchanan, J.: The Assets Realisation Association, Limited, of Cape Town, sue the Argus Company for the return to them of a certain process block, or payment of £7 10s., estimated as its value, and £2 damages. The only evidence led for the plaintiff in this case is that of Mr. Hildyard Home Drummond, and the Magistrate, in his reasons to this Court, states that he did not credit Mr. Drummond's evidence. But from the letters and the documents put in, and the statements of the witnesses called for the defendant company, it would appear that Drummond did deliver to the Argus Company a block, and asked them to pull a proof, and send it to Stevens, to whom he was about to sell the block. The block was given afterwards by the Argus Company to Stevens, and they say they gave it to Stevens because Drummond had told them that he intended to sell it to Stevens for £10, and Stevens produced the counterfoil of his cheque-book, stating that he paid to Drummond £10 for this block. I am not clear that this would be sufficient evidence to excuse the Argus Company if an action had been brought by the person who deposited the block with them. This was in 1905. In May, 1906, Drummond, in his evidence before the Magistrate, says that he sold the block to the Assets Realisation Association, Ltd. Who the Assets Realisation Association, Ltd., are it is difficult to ascertain, but it appears that the power of attorney in this case is signed by Drummond as managing director of this company. At the time the alleged contract between Drummond and the association was entered into, both parties knew that the block which Drummond states that he sold to the Association was not in the possession of the Argus Company. It was in the possession of Stevens at the time, and, whatever rights Hildyard Home Drummond may have against the Argus Company for the restoration to him of the block, and, in the absence of such restoration, for damages, no such claim has been ceded by Drummond to the Assets Realisation Association, Ltd., of Cape Town. Under these circumstances the Magistrate granted absolution from the instance. The reasons which he gave to support his judgment are not, I think, all of them to be sustained, but these main facts, I think, are sufficient to support his decision. He had the witnesses before him, and he did not believe the evidence led for the plaintiff. If that evidence is not believed, there is total absence of any evidence vesting the property in this block in the association. There is also the fact that the block was not in the possession of the defendants, when they were sued, and Drummond knew this. In the absence also of proof that there was any title in this block in the association, I think the Magistrate's decision of absolution from the instance cannot be interfered with. The appeal will be dismissed, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLBY.]

REX V. KOBOKANA. { 1906.
Aug. 13th.
" 14th.

Acts 40 of 1879 and 37 of 1884—
Notice No. 642, 1899—Native location.

Where an inhabitant of a native location, who held land there under quit-rent tenure, was convicted by a Magistrate on a charge of having cultivated certain land without having obtained the permission of his headman, and without the approval of the Inspector of Native Locations, by reason whereof he contravened Sec. 2 of Govt. Notice, 642, 1899, and it was not shown that the accused had cultivated the land continuously since 1884.

Held on appeal, that the regulations framed under Act 37 of 1884 were applicable (save as to hut tax), notwithstanding the fact that the appellant was a quit-rent tenant, and the appeal was dismissed.

Queen v. Mfenge (10 C.T.R., 19) distinguished.

This was an appeal from the judgment of the A.R.M. of Middelrift, who had convicted appellant of contravening section 2 of regulations published in "Government Gazette" notice, No. 642, 1899, promulgated in accordance with the provisions of section 29, Act 37. of 1884, in that in March last he did wrongfully and unlawfully cultivate certain land not allowed to him, within the limits of the Peuleni commonage, being a portion of the Crown lands native locations, in the division of King William's Town, without permission of the headman of the said location, or the inspector of locations in the district of Middelrift, having first been had and obtained. He pleaded not guilty, but was found guilty, and was sentenced to pay 10s., or in default one week's imprisonment.

The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, referred to the fact that, as far back as 1884, complaints were made that the men of Kobolsana's location and others were ploughing on the east bank of Gqatsu stream, and within the boundaries of the Peuleni commonage. No definite action was taken at that time, as larger issues were involved which were subsequently the subject of litigation in the case of Kama v. Colonial Government (15 S.C.R., 47) for a declaration of rights. He (the Magistrate) held that the regulations were applicable to the land which the accused was charged with cultivating without proper authority, and that it was abundantly clear from the evidence that any right which accused's father may have acquired to this land did not pass to him. The matter was more in the nature of a test case, and a light fine was inflicted.

Mr. Benjamin was for appellant; Mr. Howell Jones was for the Crown.

Mr. Benjamin said that in the location in question individual title was held and the inhabitants had a right of pasturage with their lots. Under the Act 40 of 1879 no provision was made for the imposition of a penalty. The Act 37 of 1884 clearly did not deal with locations where the people held by title. Any regulations which the Government were empowered to make in connection with the surveyed locations in which commonage lands are set apart must be made under the Act of 1879. Appellant was charged with infringing regulations framed under the Act 37 of 1885. No regulations had been made and published under the Act of 1879 applicable to this location. Even if the regulations in question had been made under the Act of 1879, they would have been ultra vires by reason of the drastic penalties provided. Then section 2 of the regulations referred to "hut-tax register," thus showing that it was not intended to apply to a location such as this, where individual title was held. Counsel went on to submit that the Act of 1884 was never intended to apply to surveyed locations at all, and that it must be taken to be confined to Crown lands which were unsurveyed. The Government themselves had not regarded this location as coming under the Act of 1884.

Mr. Jones, dealing with the second point of the appeal, said that in Kama v. Colonial Government (15 Supreme Court Reports, 47) the Court said that it was impossible to hold that these mission stations, of which this location was one, were not native locations situated on Crown lands. If they came under the Act of 1879 they were subject to the regulations which may be framed from time to time.

[Hopley, J.: Under what Act, then, do you say that this location comes?]

Mr. Jones: I say that it is subject to the Act 37 of 1884.

Proceeding, Mr. Jones submitted that the regulations in question would apply to any location. Even though it was said in the notice that the regulations were published under the Act of 1884, that was of little importance. No. 37 of 1884 was quite a general Act. Supposing that the regulations should have been issued under Act 40 of 1879, did the fact that the Governor made the regulations under the Act of 1884 invalidate the regulations? Again, the point was never taken in the Court below that these regulations could not be issued under the Act of 1884.

[Hopley, J.: You rely on the preamble of the Act? That is not part of the Act.]

Mr. Jones: I rely on the title and the preamble.

[Hopley, J.: But those are not part of the Act.]

Mr. Jones: It shows what is intended.

[Hopley, J.: It may show, or it may not.]

Mr. Jones also called the Court's attention to Queen v. Mfenge (10 C.T.R., 19).

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (August 14th).

Hopley, J.: It is, in my opinion, not possible now to raise the point whether or no the Peuleni Location is or is not a native location upon Crown Lands. That point was decided in the case of Kama v. Colonial Government (15 S.C., 47), in which his Lordship the Chief Justice, in giving judgment, said that it would be impossible to hold that such locations were not native locations upon Crown Lands. That being the case, Peuleni Location must be regulated under the various Acts of Parliament affecting native locations on Crown Lands, and among others by Act 37 of 1884. That Act empowers the Governor to make bye-laws, and certain bye-laws have been made to regulate locations generally, one of such bye-laws being the one which the accused has been found guilty of contravening. It is argued, however, that Act 37 of 1884 only applies to locations that pay hut tax, and not to Peuleni, the inhabitants of which pay quitrent. I think, however, that the powers to make bye-laws conferred by that Act are intended for all locations on Crown Lands, and are not affected by the mode in which taxes are collected, though no doubt such portions of the Act as deal with the hut tax would affect only locations where that tax is collected. It is further argued that there is nothing in the Act 37 of 1884 giving power to make bye-laws regulating the use or abuse of the commonage to any locations, and that the bye-laws for that purpose should have been framed under Act 40 of 1879. But I think that the intention of the Legislature was that bye-laws might be framed under Act 37 of 1884 for the regulation of locations generally, and that it was intra and not ultra vires to frame rules thereunder to protect the commonages of locations from encroachments and to punish such encroachments with fine and imprisonment.

At any rate, in the case of the Queen v. Mfenge (10 C.T. Reports, 19) a resident of the Peuleni Location was prosecuted for infringing this very bye-law, and on appeal the finding of the Magistrate convicting and sentencing him was set aside on the ground that under another of these bye-laws dealing with the commonage, viz., bye-law No. 3, the accused was justified in his actions, but the judgment proceeded on the assumption that these byelaws did apply to that location. The point of the validity of the bye-laws was specifically taken in that case, but the Court must be taken to have held that they did apply, and that one of them (No. 3) was efficacious to justify the action of the accused. Such a ruling by a full Court confers upon these bye-laws as applied to this location a judicial sanction which I should be slow to impair or alter. But it was also argued that the accused was only ploughing old ground which had been allotted to him, and that he was in the same position as Mfenge, and could shield himself under the bye-law which provides that land which at the time of their publication should have been brought under cultivation shall be deemed to have been allotted to the person cultivating the same, etc.

There is evidence that the ground in question in this case had once been cultivated, and in that sense it was old ground. But it had not been treated as cultivated ground since 1884 or thereabouts, nor is there any satisfactory evidence that the right of cultivating there had passed to the accused, and I think that the headman and the inspector were right in looking upon it at this date as ground which had reverted to the commonage, and which could not now be broken up anew and cultivated without the leave of the inspector, as provided in the bye-law.

The appeal must be dismissed.

VAN ZYL V. PIENAAE. { 1906.
{ Aug. 13th.

Horse — Contraband of war —
Trading with "enemy" —
Booty — Res nullius.

During the late war one K., a member of a hostile commando, exchanged a horse for a stallion and a sum of money with the appellant, a British subject. Appellant was afterwards ordered by the Military to send his horses to a "protection camp," when, seeing that the horse in question bore K.'s mark, they claimed it as booty and eventually sold it to one D. On D.'s death, it was sold as part of his estate to one B., from whom it was purchased by respondent, who offered to restore it to appellant on payment of a certain price. Having obtained possession of the horse, appellant claimed it as his own property, and refused to pay for it. In the Court below the Magistrate gave judgment for £32 in favour of respondent, and against this judgment appellant now appealed.

Held, that inasmuch as trading with an enemy, especially in contraband of war, is illegal during time of war, appellant had not a good title to the horse; that it was legally a res nullius, and that by confiscating it as booty the Military had acquired a good title to it, and that the subsequent sales were all good in law. That appellant, having been legally divested of his former ownership in the horse, could recover the same only by purchase from the present lawful owner (respondent): and that hence the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Colesberg in an action brought against appellant by respondent to recover £32, value of a certain horse.

From the record it appeared that the horse in question was originally brought over the border during the war by one Kolver, a Free State Burgher, who was appointed Landdrost of Colesberg during the occupation by the enemy. Kolver sold it to Van Zyl, the present appellant. After that it came into the hands of the military, being sent in by Van Zyl for protection purposes. The military authorities sold it to one Develin, and from Develin's estate, after his death, it was disposed of to one Badenhorst. Badenhorst sold the animal, according to plaintiff's statement, to him for £32, and Van Zyl bought it from him (Piensaar), and took the animal in January, 1903, but had failed to pay the purchase price.

The Magistrate gave judgment for the plaintiff as prayed, with costs.

Mr. Upington was for appellant; Mr. Burton was for respondent.

Mr. Upington said that it would, he thought, appear to be reasonably clear that he became possessed of the horse partly by sale and partly by exchange from one Kolver in 1900. It was undoubted that the sale or exchange between Kolver (who was at that time Landdrost at Colesberg under the Republican Government then in occupation), and the present appellant referred to the horse now in question. It would be necessary at the outset to consider what was the position of the military authorities with regard to this horse. Kotz v. Prins (20, Supreme Court Reports, 156) was very instructive, because the whole question of confiscation or requisition on the part of the military was fully considered by his lordship the Chief Justice. That case dealt with a mule which had been bred on a farm in the district of Van Ryn's Dorp. The mule was sold by public auction by the military authorities after the conclusion of hostilities. That case, counsel submitted, was very much stronger than the present one. The Court allowed the appeal, and ordered judgment of absolution from the instance to be entered in the Court below. If his learned friend succeeded, he must show that the sale by the military took place before the declaration of peace, and that it was taken over in due form by the military with the intention of depriving the owner of his ownership. Counsel went on to say that his client was in last possession of the horse, and he was in no sense a spoliator. He contended that there was no evidence that the proper steps were taken to confiscate this horse by the military. Major Kelly could not have confiscated the horse at that time. So far as confiscation was concerned, Major Kelly was at that time functus officio. It was clear that this was one of four animals which were brought into the town for protection, so that they should not fall into the hands of the enemy. Counsel proceeded to cite the case of Johnson v. Van der Walt (20, Supreme Court Reports, 574), also from the district of Colesberg. He relied upon that case as authority for the proposition that the fact that the military, if they had known at the time that the horse was Kolver's property might have confiscated it, did not affect the issue one way or another.

[Hopley, J.: But does that give your client a good title if he had been dealing with the enemy. Taking it that it was a bona fide transaction between Kolver and Van Zyl, was it not one which was prohibited by law?]

Mr. Upington submitted that the result of such proposition would be that anybody would be entitled to come and take the animal from Van Zyl. The question then was, whose property was the horse? Surely, the doctrine must be limited, particularly under modern practice, to something in reason. Coming to the authorities quoted by the Magistrate, counsel said that Nathan's "Common Law of South Africa" did not seem to throw any light on the question involved in this case. He also quoted from Mshwukezele v. Guduza (11 C.T.R., 259).

[Hopley, J.: That does not seem to touch the present case, as far as I can see.]

Mr. Upington: It is authority, I submit, for this, that goods of the enemy are res nullius, the ownership of which can be acquired by the party first taking them.

[Hopley J.: But that means capture. It does not mean dealing with or purchasing from the enemy.]

Mr. Upington: The authority goes to this length, that if my client had not paid for this horse—

[Hopley, J.: Then it would have been a virtuous act. That, of course, is a capture.]

Mr. Upington: If that is the motive of the law, then, surely, to exchange a horse unserviceable for military purposes for one that is serviceable is a virtuous act. Proceeding, counsel said that the main issue in this suit was not, as the Magistrate seemed to have thought, whether Van Zyl would have been entitled to vindicate the horse as against the third party. Van Zyl was in the position of a defendant who had been sued on an alleged contract of sale of this animal for £32. The important question to decide was whether there actually was or was not a contract of sale, but the Magistrate had not found on that point at all. There was the fact that, while Pienaar said there was a contract of sale in January, 1903, yet in August, 1904, when he made a claim upon the War Losses Compensation Commission, he did not say a word about having sold the horse to Van Zyl. In his affidavit before the Commission, he said that in January, 1903, he bought the horse from one G. H. Badenhorst, and paid £32 for it, and that he had had the horse about a fortnight when Mr. F. J. van Zyl, of Buffel's Vlei, took it from his son, claiming it as his property. Counsel submitted that the contemporaneous documentary evidence was clearly inconsistent with the case now set up by Pienaar.

Mr. Burton said that, dealing with the last point of his learned friend's argument, although, curiously enough, the Magistrate did not say what conclusion he came to on that point, he gave judgment for plaintiff as prayed, with costs, which, of course, must mean that there was such a sale. There was no doubt Pienaar got the horse from Badenhorst for valuable consideration, upon a distinct bargain of purchase and sale, and he gave it up to Van Zyl upon a distinct contract of purchase and sale. Van Zyl could not now be heard to say that he claimed the horse on the ground that it had previously been his property. On the question of the effect of the transaction with Kolver, counsel quoted from sections 309 and 311 of "Wheaton's International Law," and Pollock on International law (vol. 2, p. 124, sections 309 to 311, citing Bynkershoek), and contended that such trading as took place in this case was illegal. Counsel cited Du Toit v. Kruger (15 C.T.R. 332), as showing the extent to which confiscation by the military in these matters could go. The distinction between all cases which had been quoted and the present cases was that the person who claimed as the original owner had been the absolute, undoubted, bona-fide owner before the war. The whole question was, whether anything had been done in the interval to divest such undoubted owner of his property, and the Court had held in every one of these cases that it would require the very clearest evidence of confiscation by the military before it would take away from a man what was his undoubted property before the war. Counsel also cited Forster v. Hodgson (19 Supreme Court Reports, 493). The present case was quite different from those which had been referred to. Before the war appellant was not the owner of this horse. During the war, during actual hostilities, he made a commercial arrangement by which he bought this horse from a Republican officer. It was very curious that Hopkirk, who knew all about the history of this horse, was not called during the hearing. If necessary, he suggested that the matter be referred back to the Magistrate to take further evidence. Ever since Van Zyl lost possession of the horse to the military, he had never had the horse until he got it from the plaintiff by virtue of the contract of purchase and sale. The seizure by the military at that time, and the taking of it as booty, was sufficient to divest Van Zyl of his property. The point was, what was the intention? The evidence supported the contention that the horse was taken by the military as booty. Appellant could not now rely upon his previous purchase from Kolver. As to the claim for compensation, plaintiff seemed to have made the claim on the suggestion of the defendant. The whole of that part of the case seemed to be very unsatisfactory so far as both the plaintiff and defendant were concerned. He submitted that Van Zyl clearly had no title in this horse, and that the decision of the Magistrate was correct.

Mr. Uppington having been heard in reply.

Hopley, J.: In this case we are concerned with a contract which is alleged to have taken place between plaintiff and defendant in respect of a certain horse, which came into the possession of the defendant in the Court below during the war time. There seems to be no dispute as to the fact that the horse, before the defendant got it, belonged to one Kolver, who was at the time an enemy in the occupation of one of our towns, Colesberg, and in a position of importance there, he having been appointed from the commando who invaded and took Colesberg to be the Landdrost for the time being of the district. He, therefore, was in the full sense of the word, an enemy, and during the time of war. Between him and the defendant there was at that time, as found by the Magistrate, a bargain concluded whereby he (Van Zyl) gave a young stallion for this horse, and something to boot, the exact amount I do not think is stated, from Kolver, and by virtue of that transaction (this horse having been handed over to him by Kolver) he has ever since looked upon it as his legally acquired property. I think, however, that one cannot support a transaction of that sort as having legally invested him with the ownership and the property in that horse. I have not had a long time to look into the matter, but I have always understood that during the time of war traffic with enemies was forbidden, and especially I should say an exchange of horses in a country where horses are essential for the conduct of war. At all events, I am of opinion that a deal in horses with the enemy during war is a wholly illegal transaction by the law of this country, and that ownership cannot be traced to a source so polluted in its inception. But if that transaction did not give Van Zyl the ownership of that horse, the handing over by Kolver before he retreated did give him possession, and I think that the legal position would be that the horse was a res nullius, which the law seems to take to be the position of enemy's property, a thing belonging to nobody of which the first person on the opposite side can take possession. In this particular case Van Zyl did not keep possession of the horse; the military took re-occupation of Colesberg, and he was allowed to keep four horses, but he was told to bring them into Colesberg for the purpose of preventing them from falling into the hands of the enemy, and among the four sent in by him was this particular animal. When the horses came into the possession of the military authorities they, seeing that this horse bore Kolver's mark—they must be taken to have known that it was Kolver's mark, from what happened—confiscated it as being booty of theirs, which they could seize upon. I think they were justified in the circumstances, and that Mr. Van Zyl could not have gone and claimed the horse back from them in the same way as in the cases which have been quoted, in which the owners have claimed their property because they were the true owners ab initio. However, nothing was said or done about this possession, the military remained in possession of this horse for a considerable time—about a year—and, after that, it was sold by some of the military who had got possession of it, to Mr. Develin. Mr. Develin subsequently died, and it was sold in his estate, and so acquired by one Badenhorst. At that time it had got the double arrow upon it, which would show the purchaser that it had been acquired by the military as their property, and resold by them to somebody or other. So that purchasers like Badenhorst and probably Develin were most likely bona fide owners. I do not say that that decided the question as to the real owner, but, at all events, it would be good enough as against a purchaser like Van Zyl, who could only claim by what I think was in the circumstances a tainted title. Afterwards it came to the knowledge of Van Zyl and Pienaar that Badenhorst had possession of this animal, and, I gather, that they talked about this matter, and that Van Zyl said to Pienaar, "If you get this horse from Badenhorst I shall be glad, and will give you some commission." It is possible that Pienaar, when he passed that way approached Badenhorst, but Badenhorst had paid good money for the horse, £25. He parted with the horse to Pienaar for £32. I do not know for certain that at that time the horse belonged to Badenhorst, but the probabilities according to the weight of evidence are that then it did belong to Badenhorst. On his return to Colesberg, Pienaar told Van Zyl that he had bought the horse from Badenhorst for £32, and that if he wanted the horse his price was £40. Now, it is said that there is no evidence that there was a sale in this matter, but if the evidence which was given before the Magistrate was accepted by him, it is sufficient, and the Magistrate, having given judgment in this case for Pienaar for his claim as set out in the summons, must be taken to have held that there was a sale, because that is all that the summons claimed, and I cannot say that there was not sufficient evidence to support the finding of the Magistrate. There is evidence contradicting this. There is the complexion that Mr. Van Zyl himself tries to put upon it, and there are documents which, to a certain extent, contradict Pienaar. There is the fact that Pienaar got £5 on a certain cheque of which there is no explanation, beyond the statement that it was profit or commission on his transaction. There are also the documents in support of the claim before the War Losses Compensation Commission, but it seems to me that, although the documents are, on the face of them, somewhat contradictory to the idea of a sale from plaintiff to defendant, still they are not inexplicable. The explanation was that there was really a sale between the parties, that Van Zyl, having got hold of the horse, thought he could now stick to his own property, and thereupon repudiated the actual sale, leaving Pienaar to claim compensation, or get out of it the best way he could, and Van Zyl is said to have suggested to Pienaar to claim the compensation. The Magistrate seems to have taken that view. The fact that he gave judgment as prayed seems to make it quite certain that he came to the conclusion that there was a sale. I think, therefore, on these grounds, that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

LAWRENCE V. ROSS.

{	1906.

Motor car—Faulty construction—Negligent driving—Damages for personal injury.

This was an action brought by Richard Priestly Lawrence, of Woodstock, a civil engineer in the employ of the Cape Government Railways, against Edward James Ross, motor garage proprietor, Cape Town, to recover £500 damages for personal injuries sustained by reason of the alleged negligence of defendant or his servant.

Plaintiff, in his declaration, said that on the 19th December, 1905, defendant, in the course of his business, agreed with the plaintiff and one Gemmell, in consideration of certain remuneration, £5 5s. per day, to carry the plaintiff, Gemmell, and another person in a motor-car driven by and under the management and control of a competent and skilful driver, in the employment of the defendant. It was agreed that on the 24th December defendant should well and safely carry the plaintiff, the said Gemmell, and another person from Cape Town to Hermanus on the 25th, through Houw Hoek to Somerset West, and thence to Stellenbosch, and on the 26th from Stellenbosch to French Hoek and thence to Cape Town. On the 25th December, while these persons were being carried by the defendant in pursuance of the contract in a motor-car, driven and managed and controlled by a driver in the employment of the defendant, the motor-car was not sound and in good running order, or fit for the purpose, and more particularly defective as to the steering-gear, and, further, was so negligently and unskilfully driven by the driver, that, whilst passing down a steep incline at or near Houw Hoek, and at an excessive rate of speed, the motor-car overturned, and plaintiff was thrown violently to the ground and severely injured, sustaining a fracture of his right arm and left wrist. By reason of the premises, he had sustained damages in the sum of £500, which sum he claimed with costs.

Defendant, in his plea, said he denied that he entered into any agreement whatever with the plaintiff as regarded the hire of the motor-car, but he admitted that on the said date he hired a motor-car, to be driven by one of his own servants, with the said Gemmell for the three days inclusive at £5 5s. a day, the car to accommodate three persons, besides the chauffeur. Save as above, he denied the allegations as to the contract. He denied that he contracted to perform the journeys described in paragraph 3 of the declaration. He admitted paragraph 4, save that he denied that the said persons were being so carried in pursuance of any such contract as was alleged in the declaration. As to paragraph 5, he admitted that, whilst the said car was being driven in the locality mentioned, it left the road, and fell on its wheels into a ditch, and that the plaintiff fell to the ground, and was injured, otherwise he denied the allegations in the said paragraph. He said that the car so left the road through an accident to its steering gear, which could not have been foreseen by him or his driver, or be prevented by any reasonable care on the part of either of them. The said accident was due to the breakage of a certain spring, which caused the driver to lose control of the direction in which the car was travelling, and was in no way attributable to the negligence of the defendant or his said driver. The plaintiff was injured owing to his endeavouring negligently, improperly, and unnecessarily to jump out of the car at the time of the accident, and he would not have been so injured but for his said negligence. Defendant denied that plaintiff had suffered any damages for which he was liable.

The replication was general.

Mr. Upington (with him Mr. M. Biset) was for plaintiff; Mr. Burton (with him Mr. Douglas Buchanan) was for defendant.

Mr. Upington said that at the time the declaration was drawn plaintiff was in the position of receiving one-third of his salary, while away from his duties, but since then the Government had agreed to give him two-thirds.

[Hopeley, J.: The damages would be somewhat reduced in consequence?]

Mr. Upington: Yes.

The plaintiff said that he was employed by the C.G.R. as a civil engineer at a salary of £500 a year. On the 19th December witness went with Mr. Gemmell to see the defendant to arrange about a motor tour in reference to which Mr. Gemmell had already written to defendant. A route was definitely fixed upon at the interview. A driver named Applegate was pointed out to them as the one who should undertake the journey. He was said to be the best driver available. It was not explained in so many words to defendant that witness was to share in the expenses. That, he thought, was the inference which would be understood by defendant. On the journey out to Hermanus they had a safe trip, and there was no trouble in connection with the steering gear. On Christmas Day they had lunch at Houw Hoek. In the afternoon there was some difficulty in getting up a steep declivity. On reaching the top they started down at an easy pace, but the car acquired a speed of about 15 to 25 miles an hour. The driver was on the left side of the road, and he seemed to be trying to get in the middle of the road. There was a ditch which was not perceptible some distance off. When they saw the ditch, the car was running to the side. The next thing that happened was that the driver got out, and the car ran about 100 feet, and then they dropped into the ditch.

[Hopley, J.: The driver, as soon as he saw the ditch, jumped out of the car?]

Witness: Yes.

Mr. Upington: In order to do that, he had to pass in front of Mrs. Gemmell?

Witness: Yes. Continuing, witness said that the car turned over on its side. Witness was pinned against one of the steep banks of the ditch. Both his arms were broken. Witness was extricated from the position he was placed in by a ganger in the employ of the C.G.R. He afterwards received medical attention at the hotel at Houw Hoek, and afterwards he was brought to Salt River, and removed to the Woodstock Hospital, where he had to remain 93 days. Witness was still unable to use his left wrist properly. His medical adviser thought he would never be able to bend his wrist forward properly. Witness had to pay certain medical and hospital expenses, he had lost one-third of his salary for about three months, he had had to pay for a radio-graph operation, and he had had other expenses in consequence of the accident.

Cross-examined: If witness had engaged a railway doctor, he would not have had the medical expenses to bear which he had incurred with Dr. Fuller. Any injury he had sustained had not in any way influenced his position under the Government. He told Ross when he saw him on the 19th December that he was sharing in the tour. The question of expense was not mentioned. They had no complaint to make about the driving before the accident happened. On the occasion in question, they had to get out of the car to push it up the hill. He thought when they were descending the hill the car was in gear all the time; he should say they were travelling from 20 to 30 miles an hour. The speed, he considered, was very fast; he had no time to complain about the speed, in fact, he rather enjoyed it until the accident happened. There was short shrub at the side of the road where the car went over into the ditch. Witness did not see the driver jump over Mrs. Gemmell just before the accident happened. What he had said about that incident was hearsay. He thought the driver did not put his brakes on when the car swerved to the right side of the road. He might have told Applegate when he called to see him (plaintiff) while he was ill that he did not blame him. He now blamed the chauffeur for causing the accident by not turning the car back into the road. He blamed Applegate for not examining his steering-gear to see that it was right. Witness did not know that Applegate had not examined the steering-gear. He had arranged with Gemmell to pay half the expense of the motor trip.

Re-examined: When he spoke to the driver while he was in bed, he was not aware that the steering-gear had been tied up with picture-cord. He had not heard at that time that the driver had jumped over Mrs. Gemmell and left the car.

Mr. Burton intimated that he did not press the part of the plea relating to plaintiff jumping out of the car.

Hugh Bernard Gemmell, mechanical engineer, employed by the C.G.R., said that when they called at the defendant's garage on the 19th December, he told Mr. Ross that Mr. Lawrence was joining him in the trip. Applegate was pointed out by defendant as a skilful and competent driver. The car was travelling at a rate of over 20 miles an hour just before the accident happened. The car seemed to shoot across the road, and got on the tufty grass just at the side of the watercourse. As they were bumping on the ground, witness saw Applegate step off the car in front of Mrs. Gemmell. A moment afterwards they went down into the watercourse. He did not think Mr. Lawrence made any attempt to jump off the car. Later on that day Applegate came and suggested to witness that he might have seen him tie some part of the steering-gear with a piece of cord before they left Hermanus that morning. Witness had not noticed Applegate do that. Applegate attributed the accident to the cord having got adrift. Witness thought that, even if one of the steel springs in the tube of the steering-gear broke, it would be possible to steer within certain limits if the thing was tied up with sufficiently strong cord. They had to complain about the car being underpowered on the hills. They did not complain about the car's speed, but they had to find fault with having to get out and help the car uphill. Witness was not aware whether the driver had lost control of the car. If the driver had lost control, he should have applied his brakes. Witness would not say that the driver had not applied the brakes, but he did not remember having felt a check.

Evidence was also given by Dr. E. B. Fuller, who attended the plaintiff on his return to the Peninsula, and Thomas Hogbin, a ganger, employed by the C.G.R., who helped to release the plaintiff from the car.

Pency Ashenden, municipal engineer, Rondebosch, who was motoring in the district, and came upon the scene soon after the accident, said that the doll's head could have left the socket of the steering-gear. When he saw it it was possible for the doll's head crank to work out of the casing. He came to the conclusion from what he saw that the connecting rod had been carelessly tied to the crank. He was certain the car was travelling at a speed of over 20 miles an hour, because it leapt 28 ft. from the spot where it left the bank. He considered that the car was going at too great a speed on such a hill. Witness had had experience in motor-cars, having owned four cars.

Cross-examined, witness had had an accident while motoring, but not on this particular piece of road. He had an accident at Sir Lowry's Pass through a fracture of the steel pin. He should think that a careful man would not exceed 15 miles an hour on the hill where this accident happened. He thought it was a reckless and ludicrous thing to tie the rod as had been done in this case.

At the request of the Court, witness gave a number of demonstrations of the working of the crank arm.

Walter Robert McFarlane, proprietor of the Houw Hoek Hotel, said that he looked at the car while the party were at lunch at his house on Christmas Day. Witness owned a motor car. He noticed that the rod of the steering-gear was fastened to the body of the defendant's car with a piece of cord. He also noticed that the hand-brake was not acting; the lever of the hand-brake he saw was lying forward; he made a test, and he called the attention of the driver to it. Applegate said: "It must be like that." Witness had had Applegate in his employ to drive a motor bus. Applegate was a competent driver, but he indulged in drink, and was inclined to be a bit rash.

Cross-examined: On the day in question Applegate was perfectly sober. Witness continued to run the motor bus for a period of six months after he had dismissed Applegate from his employ. One of his complaints against Applegate was that he did not look carefully enough after the machine. All the same, he regarded Applegate as a skilful and competent driver. The cord might have been tied to the crank.

Mr. Uppington closed his case.

Andrew Morrison said that he was in the employ of defendant, and part of his duties was to book orders for the hiring of motor cars. He produced a diary containing entries relating to the hiring in question. There was an entry on the 11th December referring to "Mr. Gemmell's inquiry for car for Christmas Holidays, quotes £21." The entry was made at the time. Witness understood at that time that three passengers were going on the trip, but he did not understand that anybody else was sharing it. Mr. Gemmell did not mention anybody else's name. An appointment was subsequently made between Mr. Gemmell and Mr. Ross. Witness at no time saw Mr. Lawrence during the negotiations.

Cross-examined: Witness did not remember Mr. Gemmell saying at the first interview that he would have to go away and consult his friend. What Mr. Gemmell said was that he would see Mr. Ross, to ascertain if he could not make the charge a little less. There was an entry on the 25th December showing this engagement, and stating that the charge was £21. Witness did not make that entry on the 25th December. He believed he made the entry on the 24th, but he would not swear that he made the entry then. The entry would not be made until an agreement had been entered into. He would not say that an agreement was made for £21.

Edward James B. Ross (the defendant) said that in May last year he had two Brooke cars shipped to him from Home. One was new, and the other was second-hand. The car to which the accident happened was the new car, and cost about £440. It was not a fast car. He did not think it was capable, on a level road, of doing more than 20 miles an hour. In gear, he did not think the car could exceed 20 miles an hour. The car was specially overhauled for this Christmas trip. Witness assisted in taking the whole of the car to pieces. The springs in the steering-gear were all intact. For some considerable time previously they had used cord and canvas to keep dust out of the doll's head joint. This was done because they had not got a leather cover. In the negotiations for the hire of the car, he had only known Mr. Lawrence as the third passenger in the car. No definite route was fixed upon. He had never regarded Mr. Lawrence as one of his debtors for the hire. Two or three days after the accident he went out to Houw Hoek, and saw the car lying in the sluit. It was broken up, and had been set fire to. Somebody had poured petrol over it, and tried to set fire to the tonneau. He did not suggest that Mr. Lawrence had anything to do with the fire. The whole of the tonneau had been pulled to pieces. He picked up the gear. On coming back to town and examining the steering-gear, he found that the steel spiral spring inside the casing had been broken. He thought the breakage might have been caused by the spring losing its tempering. If the spring had not broken, the crank would have remained in position, and the accident would not have occurred. It was the first time within his experience that such a mishap had occurred to the steering-gear of a car. Since the accident occurred, he had used the same steering gear for the car he was now using.

Cross-examined: Witness, as long as he got his fee of 15 guineas, was prepared to accept Mr. and Mrs. Gemmell and Mr. Lawrence for the tour. He did not know that Mr. Lawrence was sharing the expenses of the tour. He was not led to believe so by either of the parties. He had understood that Mr. Lawrence was Mr. Gemmell's guest. Witness did not know anything about the allegation in the plea that plaintiff negligently or improperly jumped out of the car. That information was given to his attorneys by Applegate. He did not think the car could have come down the hill, even running free, at 35 miles an hour. When the steering-gear went wrong, the proper thing to do was to put all the brakes on and stop the car. He should say that on such a hill as Houw Hoek, if the brakes were applied, they should be able to stop the car within 20 yards, unless they were travelling on sand, and the car skidded.

In reply to another question, witness said that Mr. Lawrence wanted a driver who knew the roads. He immediately afterwards corrected himself, and said he meant Mr. Gemmell.

[Hopley, J.: Why did you say Mr. Lawrence?]

Witness: I think I must have Mr. Lawrence on the brain.

Albert William Applegate said that he was a motor car driver and mechanic. He had had six years' experience of motor cars in this country. He had driven the Brooke car in question on two or three occasions before he took out the party last Christmas. He had not previously had any trouble with the steering-gear of the Brooke car. Witness described what was done in the way of overhauling the car before it was taken out on the journey. The brasses and doll's head were, he said, both in good condition. There used to be a leather cap over the steering joint, which had got lost some time before, and, in place of this, they had tied on a piece of canvas. On Christmas day, he made an inspection of the car before leaving Houwhoek. He noticed that the brakes were all right. He did not remember saying a word to Mr. McFarlane. The car could not travel above 20 miles an hour when in gear. The passengers made no complaint about the speed of the car on the level, except that it was slow.

[Hopley, J.: The car was so slow uphill that the passengers had to get out and push on some of the hills. And so, when you got to the top, did you think you would give them a little exhibition of what speed she should go at?]

Witness: No. Continuing, witness said that the car went down the hill at the rate of 14 to 16 miles an hour. The first thing he noticed was that it seemed to be running towards the bush on the right side. He turned the steering wheel, but the course of the car did not change, and he could feel that the steering gear was out of order. He supposed that the doll's head must at that time have been out of the socket. He at once applied his three brakes. The locking of the back wheels caused a swerving of the car, and it went towards the edge of the sluit. The car went gradually ahead until the front wheel went over the bank. Seeing this, he called to the passengers to look out; he pushed Mrs. Gemmell out of the car, and he jumped out. Witness struck the bank and fell into the sluit. Mrs. Gemmell, he thought, must have alighted in a similar way. She also fell into the sluit. The other passengers were in the tonneau of the car. Mr. Lawrence was lying on the top of the car and the sluit. Witness did not know why the steering gear had gone wrong until they came to examine it, when it had been brought into town. He had known these steel springs break often. There was a good deal of strain at times on the steering gear—for instance, if they struck a stone, a sluit, or sand. He could not account for the smashing of the spring in question.

Cross-examined: Mr. McFarlane did not call his attention to the hand brake at Houwhoek, and say that it was loose. Mr. McFarlane must have been mistaken when he said he had done so. Witness oiled the steering gear at Houwhoek, but he did not make an examination. Witness saw Mr. Gemmell after the accident, but he did not tell him that he (Mr. Gemmell) might have seen him tying up the steering gear, and that he attributed the accident to the cord having got adrift. Mr. Gemmell must be lying. Hogbin, the ganger, was inaccurate in his evidence as to when he came on the scene. McFarlane did not dismiss witness because of his carelessness. McFarlane's father was his employer in connection with the motor bus. He first noticed that the steering gear was out of order when they were in the middle of the road. Running at 15 miles an hour, they would be able to pull up the car by the brakes in about 20 yards. He thought it quite reasonable that the car should have leapt 26 ft. from the banks while travelling at 15 miles an hour. Witness could not say that Mr. Lawrence attempted to jump out of the car. He told the defendant's attorneys that presumably Mr. Lawrence was thrown forward by the application of the brakes, or he must have tried to jump out of the car.

Re-examined: Witness had used the brakes after leaving Houwhook, before the car descended the hill where the accident happened.

By the Court: Mr. Ashenden was mistaken when he described how the cord was fastened round the steering rod and the end of the crank.

Joo Stark, a mechanical engineer, employed by defendant, having been called,

Alfred Theo. Hennessy, of the Automobile Club, said that the piece of road in question was one of the safest portions of the Caledon-road for speed work. He thought it was safe to travel on that part at 30 miles an hour; he had travelled down at that speed. It would be a stupid thing to suppose that a steering gear would be fastened up with a piece of string in the way described in the evidence for plaintiff. The reliability of the steering gear in the Brooke car depended entirely upon the steel springs inside the casing. On several makes of cars the steering gear was on a similar principle.

Donald Menzies, motor-car engineer, said that he had examined the steering gear of the car in question. He had examined the doll's head and the brass blocks into which it fitted. The integrity of the gear depended upon the springs. He did not think the brass blocks had been worn to such an extent that they should have been replaced by new ones. The doll's head was worn, but not too much as to be unfit for use. As the design was, he did not think the doll's head and the blocks were good enough. The doll's head and the blocks were not quite so safe as new ones. Looking at what had happened in this case, he did not like the design, seeing that when one spring had broken the crank arm had come away. He was going directly against the make of this steering gear. If the springs had lasted all right he should have regarded himself as safe with that gear, even using the doll's head and brass blocks that were in use when the accident happened. He attributed the failure of the steering gear to the breaking of the spring. Witness had not seen the steering gear until quite recently. A small spiral spring actually broke in the steering gear of the car he used in his last journey. The steering became a little erratic, but there was no danger. Witness had often travelled down the hill near Houw Hoek at 25 to 30 miles an hour.

Cross-examined: Travelling on such a hill at 15 miles an hour, and applying the brakes effectually, they should be able to bring a car such as this to a standstill in two or three lengths.

Mr. Uppington: Now, you say this is a faulty design?

Witness: I might be had up for libel.

[Hopley, J.: You are quite safe in speaking freely in the witness-box.]

Witness: It is supplied to the War Office. I think this design is faulty.

Mr. Burton closed his case.

Mr. Uppington (for plaintiff) said that from the plea it would appear that the defendant wished to place in issue as a question of law, whether, in the absence of a contract between the owner of the car and the plaintiff, the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages for injuries sustained through the negligence of the defendant's agent, acting within the scope of his authority. The English authorities, which had been accepted in our Courts, were absolutely conclusive that he could. Counsel cited Atutz v. Great Eastern Railway Co. (1895, Q.B.D. II., 387); Taylor v. M., S. and L. Railway Co. (1895, Q.B.D. I., 134); Austin v. G. W. Railway Co. (L.R., 2 Q.B., 442). It was not essential to the plaintiff's right to recover that there should have been a contract between the plaintiff and the defendant. As long as defendant had contracted to carry passengers, of which the plaintiff was one, and, as long as he was lawfully in the car, he had a right to recover. In the latter case he at least had a right in tort to recover damages sustained through the negligence of the defendant or his servants. On the facts, he submitted that defendant had contracted to carry the plaintiff.

On the question of negligence, it was clear that in the case of an accident of this kind the accident itself was some evidence of negligence. He cited Gifford v. Table Bay Dock Management Commission (B. 1874, p. 96); Puckman v. Gibson (4 H.C., 410).

In this case as strong proof of negligence as could possibly be produced in a Court of law had been produced.

Mr. Burton (for defendant) said that it was denied in the plea that there was any contract at all, such as set up in the declaration, between the plaintiff and the defendant. The whole declaration was based on contract. The action was not based on tort at all, and it was quite clear that there was no contract between the plaintiff and the defendant at all. If Ross had sued Lawrence for the hire of the car, he could not have succeeded. A person who carried passengers in a vehicle was not an insurer of the passengers. The cases cited by his learned friend related to goods and not to passengers. As to passengers, counsel cited Shirley's leading cases (7th ed., p. 462); Christie v. Griggs (2 Cam., 81); Walker v. Stewart (2 Kotze, p. 146); Cowan v. Freedman (5 H.C., 22); and Moffatt v. Bateman (3 L.R. P.C. appeals, 115). The speed at which the car was running when the accident occurred was not excessive. The whole car had been carefully overhauled before the trip. The brakes worked shortly before the accident occurred. In using machinery of the kind in question, one was always liable to have accidents. The examination of the springs in the steering rod at Houw Hoek would have shown nothing which would have helped to prevent the accident. The driver was under no obligation to take the car to pieces at Houw Hoek.

Hopley, J.: The first question that arises in this case is whether or not the plaintiff has a locus standi to sue the defendant in this matter, the case being shaped on a contract, and not on a tort. I do not think that it is necessary to go into the cases which have been quoted on this point, because I am satisfied upon the evidence as it stands that the defendant knew that it was a contract with Lawrence as well as Gemmell with regard to the hiring of this car. The plaintiff has a locus standi in this matter to sue upon the contract. That being the case, we have to consider what the undertaking was of the defendant in such a matter as the present. These cars are highly scientific inventions, the machinery is complicated, the pleasure derived from them is great, a considerable charge is made for hiring, and the passengers are generally at the mercy of the goodness of the machinery, and the skill of the driver. In such a case as this, where a machine is travelling at a high rate of speed, it is incumbent to have examined it very carefully, and have made as safe as human foresight could the steering gear of this machine. Now, was that done in this particular case? I cannot say in my opinion that it was. I cannot feel satisfied, looking at the brass blocks, and looking at the doll's head, and, generally in considering the whole of the steering gear, that I should have considered, if it were my own case, that that steering gear was reasonably safe for the purpose of undertaking a trip upon dangerous roads, for all roads in this colony are more or less dangerous in this way, that there is not one that I know of, except short portions, where there are not bumps, and stones and sluits. It is said that this steering gear is used in England, but, then, the roads are much better in England. I think it is going far to say that anybody who lets out machines of this sort in this country can shield himself when an accident occurs by saying that this is the way the machines are turned out by the manufacturer. Therefore, it seems to me at once to follow as a matter of commonsense that you should see, if possible, that the doll's head, which forms part of the steering gear does not come out of the crank. It seems to me, reviewing the evidence, that there were both negligent driving and negligent construction, and a negligent state of the machinery of this car for which the defendant is responsible. As to damages, under all the circumstances, I think that the sum of £200, with costs, would be all the damages I feel inclined to award. Judgment will, therefore, be for the plaintiff for £200, with costs.

Mr. Upington applied for the plaintiff to be certified as a necessary witness, and for costs of the preparations of the plan. Counsel said that plaintiff had had to come from Kimberley for the case.

His Lordship made an order accordingly.

[Plaintiff's Attorney: G. Trollop. Defendant's Attorneys: Silberbauer, Wahl and Fuller.]

CRAFFORD V. LE ROUX.

Dr. Greer moved as a matter of urgency on the petition of Mrs. Crafford, of Claremont, for a temporary interdict restraining the sale by auction of certain movables belonging to respondent on the farm Eland's Vlei, district of Ladismith, owned by the petitioner, pending settlement of her claim for rent.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers appeared for respondent in opposition to the application.

It appeared that Mrs. Crafford's property was originally let on lease to one Pieter Johannes Nel for a term of ten years, that the respondent (Gert le Roux) had since become the occupier in place of Nel, and that the rent for the half-year commencing on the 1st July, which was payable in advance, had not been paid.

Mrs. Crafford said that there was owing to her a sum of £120 and she apprehended that if the sale was allowed to proceed she would lose her lien for her rent. The matter had previously been before a Judge in Chambers, and the application had been refused, but Dr. Greer, in renewing the application, said that the Court was now in possession of more information. It appeared that, owing to the hurry in bringing on the application, no opportunity had been had of communicating further with the respondent, and that the sale was advertised to take place on Thursday next. It was further stated in the advertisement that respondent was leaving the district, but, on his behalf, it was explained that he was merely removing to the next district. Furthermore, counsel stated that he had entered an appearance to petitioner's claim for rent, and that the rent had been paid to one Becker, for Nel, to whom respondent was liable.

Affidavits having been read and counsel heard in argument on the facts,

Hopley, J.: It seems to me that the balance of testimony in this case is that Le Roux has stepped into Nel's shoes in the matter of the lease, not by way of assignment, but by way of sub-lease from Nel, with the consent of the landlady. Of course, the rights as between Mrs. Crafford (the landlady) and Nel and Le Roux and the sureties are all matters which might have been changed very considerably by this transference of tenancy, or by this sub-letting, as the case may be, but it seems to me that, although it is true that he has paid the rent from the 1st January to the 1st July, he is also responsible for the payment of rent in advance under this lease of Nel's for the current half-year. Now, the point arises, is a sub-tenant, who is in a position like that, and has got his movable property on the ground, bound by the tacit hypothec which the landlord has? My own impression is that the sub-tenant's goods are bound in so far, at all events, as he himself owes rent to the person from whom he holds. If he is holding from Mrs. Crafford direct, his goods will be bound for the rent due to her. If he is holding from Nel, his goods, I think, will still be bound to the applicant for such rent as is due, but which he has not paid, if Nel has not paid her the rent due under the contract. At all events, I think his goods are bound one way or another, but they must be the goods upon the place itself, and such a hypothec does not embrace all his movable goods, nor can any interdict against his selling his goods be asked for, save such goods as he is proposing to move off the place belonging to the landlady for the purposes of such sale. While on her place they would be bound for the rent for the current half-year, which, according to the agreement, it is alleged is payable and overdue. I think, therefore, she is entitled to some relief. But it might very likely be that by this time there is nothing left on the ground, it may all have been moved off, and the lien may have been lost. I think that the order that the applicant is entitled to is, not to stop altogether the sale, because that would be rather hard in the circumstances as Mr. Le Roux is holding a general sale of his property for the purpose of realising and going to the next district, but an order that the auctioneer held certain of the proceeds in his hands pending payment of this debt or settlement of the dispute between the parties. Therefore, I think the order I should give, which may be transmitted by telegraph in the circumstances, is that the auctioneer (Becker) be directed to retain in his hands a sum of £120, if there be such an amount realised by the sale of the movables on the property of the applicant. I do not think I should go any further than that. Costs may, for the present, stand over. When I say the movables on the applicant's property, I mean those which were on the property when the present application was first made. I think that would be the proper time to fix because if, to avoid such an order as this, animals have been moved off, and can be identified, they ought, nevertheless, to be bound.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN and a Jury.]

MATARE, BRUNS AND CO. } 1906.
V. MOSSEL BAY MUNICIPALITY. } Aug. 15th
PALITY. } " 16th
" 17th

Municipality — Drains — Negligence—Exercise of statutory powers—Contributory negligence.

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs to recover damages against the defendants for their alleged negligence in maintaining a certain drain.

The plaintiffs' declaration was as follows:

1. The plaintiffs are merchants and warehousemen carrying on business at Mossel Bay under the style or firm of Matare, Bruns and Co. The defendants are a public body incorporated under the title aforesaid by Act of Parliament, and will be referred to hereinafter as the Council.

2. By the Act or Acts of Parliament constituting the said Council, and by section 1 of Act 20 of 1896 and section 18 of Act 23 of 1897, it is provided that the Council shall have power and authority to make and keep in repair sewers and drains within the limits of the Mossel Bay Municipality and to enter upon private property for the said purpose.

3. The plaintiffs are the owners of certain land and buildings situate between Gravo and Bland Streets and Hudson-road within the said municipality. The said land originally belonged to the Council, but was transferred by them on the 30th day of July, 1895, to one G. M. Hudson, subject to the special condition that the Council should have the right to enter on the said land and maintain and repair the drain on the said land not exceeding a width of five feet. The plaintiff craves leave to refer to the said transfer deed more particularly when produced at the trial. Thereafter on or about the 11th day of January, 1902, the said ground was sold and transferred to the plaintiffs by the said G. M. Hudson.

4. There was no artificial drain in existence on the said ground at the time of the said transfer by the Council to the said G. M. Hudson, but a natural watercourse and drain ran through the said ground and thence entered the sea. Thereafter, in or about the year 1895, the Council built a covered drain through the said ground in the place of the said natural watercourse and drain, the said G. M. Hudson bearing the expense of the cover of the said covered drain. Above the said covered drain, and communicating therewith, the Council had constructed an open barrel drain, which said barrel drain, after traversing the public park of Mossel Bay, entered a culvert running under Bland-street and thence communicated with the said covered drain. The Council further caused an iron grating to be placed where the said barrel drain entered the aforesaid culvert. The said barrel drain when completed was used for the purpose of collecting and carrying down surface and other drainage flowing along and from the western side of the municipality.

5. The Council has from time to time since the making and opening up of the said barrel drain caused more and more water to be diverted into the said drain. More particularly the said Council diverted water which would naturally drain into the eastern side of Church-street from the locality bounded by Rodgers, Klipper, Hill, High, and Montague Streets into a certain drain running along the western side of Church-street. The said water, after finding its way into the drain at the eastern side of Church-street, was carried underneath the said street and joined the drain at the western side of Church-street, and after flowing down the western side of the said street, continued its course along the northern side of Bland-street, entered the barrel drain aforesaid at or near the aforesaid culvert, and was carried thence into the covered drain. The said covered drain was not the natural water course of the said water.

6. In or about the year 1902 the plaintiffs, with the full knowledge and consent of the Council, constructed certain buildings on the said ground under which the aforesaid covered drain was.

7. It was the duty of the Council to construct the drains and works hereinbefore specified or to cause them to be constructed in a proper, workmanlike, and efficient manner, so as to carry off the water flowing into them without detriment to the adjoining property, and more particularly the plaintiff's property, and further to maintain them or cause them to be maintained in an efficient condition.

8. On or about the 24th day of September, 1905, the said covered drain under the plaintiff's property became blocked and choked and large quantities of water collected as aforesaid, flowing from the barrel drain into the said covered drain, entered from the said covered drain into the buildings belonging to the plaintiffs, as aforesaid, and the said water in the said drain destroyed the floor of the said building and caused it to collapse into the said drain, damaged the goods contained in the said buildings, and the covered drain was in whole or in part destroyed.

9. The said damage was caused by negligent and improper acts or omissions of the Council in or about the maintenance and construction of the drains and works aforesaid. More particularly, the barrel drain aforesaid was improperly and negligently constructed and maintained, and was not kept in a proper state of repair, and the junctions of other drains with the barrel drain were faulty and defective, and so made as to endanger the barrel drain at the points of junction, whereby on the evening of September 24 the water flowing down to the said barrel drain destroyed portion of the said drain and carried down stones and other material composing the said barrel drain or washed from the strata in which it rested to the entrance of the aforesaid culvert; the grating hereinbefore mentioned was not in its proper place at the said culvert, but had been negligently and improperly removed, and in consequence the stones and other material which were washed down as aforesaid in consequence of the destruction of the barrel drain entering the culvert aforesaid found their way into the covered drain and blocked and choked it, whereby the water was dammed back in the said drain. The said drain was in part destroyed and the water dammed up in the said covered drain and still poured down from the barrel drain through the said culvert to the said covered drain, forced its way through the floor, and otherwise into the buildings of the plaintiffs, and caused the damage complained of aforesaid. Further, the said Council negligently failed to make or maintain the said covered drain in an efficient condition or of a sufficient size or to increase the carrying capacity thereof when diverting as aforesaid large additional quantities of water out of their natural flow into the said barrel drain, and thence into the said covered drain.

10. The said damaged drain is a source of danger to the plaintiffs, but the Council, though requested so to do, neglects and refuses, in breach of its legal duty, to place the said drain in an efficient and proper state of repair.

11. The plaintiffs have suffered damage in respect of injury to their premises in the sum of £171 15s., and further, have been in whole or in part deprived since the 25th day of September, 1905, of the use of the said premises, whereby they have suffered and continue to suffer damage in the sum of £12 10s per mensem, but the Council, though requested so to do, neglects and refuse to pay the said sums or any part thereof.

12. The plaintiffs removed or caused to be removed the said goods stored in their buildings damaged as aforesaid and directed and caused steps to be taken for the preservation of the said goods, and thereafter caused some of them to be sold, but notwithstanding the plaintiffs have suffered loss in respect of the said goods in the sum of £278 8s., but the Council, though requested so to do, neglects and refuses to pay the said sum or any part thereof.

Wherefore the plaintiffs claim: (a) An order directing the defendant Council forthwith to construct a suitable and sufficient covered drain in place of the covered drain destroyed as aforesaid, and to make due and proper provision for the disposal of surface or other drainage water flowing through the said drain; (b) judgment for damages in respect of the premises occupied by them in the sums of £171 15s., and £12 10s. per mensem as and from the 25th day of September, 1905, under paragraph 11 hereof; (c) judgment for damages in respect of their goods in the sum of £278 8s., under paragraph 11 hereof; (d) alternative relief; (e) costs of suit.

The defendants' plea was as follows:

For a plea to the declaration the defendants say:

1. They admit paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 thereof.

2. As to paragraph 4 thereof, the open barrel drain referred to, which traverses the public park and communicates with the covered drain, was constructed before the covered drain traversing plaintiffs' property was constructed: save as above they admit the allegations in paragraph 4.

3. They deny the allegations in paragraph 5 thereof and say that there was a natural watercourse existing for many years for carrying off storm-water, on the site of the covered drain, before the said drain was constructed. No more water has been diverted into the drain since its construction than was accustomed to flow in the said watercourse in former years; the drainage water from Montagu-street used to flow into the said drain, but had been diverted prior to September, 1905.

4. As to paragraph 6 thereof, the only plan submitted was a sketch in pencil, but no ground plan was submitted, and the circumstances under which the plaintiffs' buildings were constructed are referred to in correspondence to which defendants crave leave to refer when produced at the trial. At the time of the construction of plaintiffs' buildings, one Carl Heinrich Bruns, partner of the plaintiffs, was Mayor of the defendant Council, and plaintiffs were at the date of said construction, and are, well aware of the existence and nature of construction of the said covered drain and of the watercourse for which it was substituted. Plaintiffs took the risk upon themselves when building their said premises over the said drain: save as above they admit paragraph 6 thereof.

5. As to paragraph 7 thereof, the covered drain was constructed in a proper workmanlike and efficient manner so as to carry off all the water flowing into it: the defendants admit that drains constructed by them should be properly constructed.

6. As to paragraphs 8, 9, and 10 thereof, on or about September 24, 1905, extraordinary and excessive rains fell in the town and neighbourhood of Mossel Bay, and a storm and flood lasted for some time; several properties were flooded and destroyed, and for any damage done by such rainfall and flooding, which may have been sustained by plaintiffs' buildings, defendants are not responsible, the same being due to vis major.

7. If plaintiffs had properly constructed their said buildings across and over the said drain, of the construction and existence whereof they (plaintiffs) were well aware, and if they had not placed and built concrete blocks and floors and stored and packed heavy merchandise over or in the neighbourhood of the said covered drain the said drain would not have collapsed and the plaintiffs' building would not have fallen in or been damaged.

8. The plaintiffs contributed either in whole or in part to any damage sustained by them, and owing to the construction of the building aforesaid and its overloading by means of heavy merchandise, caused the said covered drain to collapse at that part over which the said building was erected, and the said cement blocks and floor were placed by plaintiffs; and if any damage was thus sustained by plaintiffs, the defendants are not responsible therefor: no other portion of the said drain save that under plaintiffs' store fell in.

9. They admit that they placed an iron grating at the entrance of the covered drain, but say that they removed the same shortly afterwards, and some time prior to September, 1905, when it was found that the same became frequently blocked, and that the water then overflowed and in consequence caused damage, and that the said grating was properly removed in order to avert damage to the property of plaintiffs and others.

10. Save as above, they deny the allegations in paragraphs 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12 thereof, and especially that plaintiffs have sustained damages as alleged, or any damage for which defendants are responsible.

Wherefore they pray that plaintiffs' claim may be dismissed, with costs.

For a claim in reconvention, the defendants (now plaintiffs in reconvention) say:

1. They crave leave to refer to the matters above pleaded.

2. Owing to the negligence and wrongful conduct of the plaintiffs (defendants in reconvention) in erecting their said buildings over the said covered drain, with concrete blocks and floors, and in packing heavy merchandise over and near the covered drain on the said floors, the said drain has collapsed, where it passes under their said store, and has been damaged, and it will cost the sum of £100 to repair the same.

Wherefore the plaintiffs in reconvention claim: (a) That the defendants in reconvention be ordered to rebuild and restore in a proper and safe condition the portion of the said drain fallen in as aforesaid, or in the alternative, payment of the sum of £100; (b) alternative relief; (c) costs of suit.

The plaintiffs' replication and plea to claim in reconvention was as follows:

For a replication to the defendants' plea, the plaintiffs say:

1. They admit that the second-named plaintiff was Mayor of the said Council at the time of the construction of the said buildings, and that they were aware of the nature and existence of the said covered drain. They further admit that heavy rains fell in the town of Mossel Bay on September 24, 1905.

2. Save as aforesaid, and save in so far as it consists of admission, they deny each and every allegation in the plea contained, join issue thereon, and again as before pray for judgment, with costs.

And for a plea to the defendants' (now plaintiffs') claim in reconvention, plaintiffs (now defendants) crave leave to refer to the foregoing, specially denying that the defendants have sustained any damage for which they are responsible.

Wherefore they pray that the defendants' (now plaintiffs') claim may be dismissed, with costs.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Sutton), for plaintiffs; Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Mr. Bisset), for defendants.

Chas. Weidner, architect, of Mossel Bay, said he had been called in by a partner in the plaintiff firm, and made a careful investigation of the damage done. The plan he made was a correct delineation of the surroundings.

Witness gave evidence on the plan he produced.

C. H. Bruns, one of the plaintiffs, said he was a partner in the firm of Matate, Bruns and Co., which had been carrying on business for the last 29 years. For 25 years he had been a member of the Municipality, and several times had been Mayor. When the property was acquired by Mr. Hudson, he was a member of the Council. His firm bought the property from Hudson's estate in 1902, when the covered drain was already there. When Hudson bought the property there was an old open watercourse. The store was used for ordinary and rough merchandise. Witness was in Europe when the accident occurred, but on his return he went into the question of stock, and found that the floors could have stood the weight of at least half a dozen times as much as they held when they collapsed. In the meantime they had to rent a temporary store. There was nothing to show that the columns of the store stood on the drain. The removal of the iron grating at the point where the open drain joined the covered one could not possibly have avoided causing danger to plaintiff's property.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: A plan was submitted without the drain. The whole of the ground was not covered at the outset by buildings.

Frank W. Waldron, associate and member of the Institute of Civil Engineers, stated that previously he had been engineer for the harbour works at Mossel Bay. In January, 1902, he went to Mossel Bay. After the flood he was called by the plaintiff to examine the collapse of the floor in the store, and witness made a plan which he produced. He made a careful investigation of the drain underneath the store. He knew of no column which was exactly over the drain. In his opinion, the pressure of the column on the upper story was not sufficient to break the drain. Mr. Wright was correct when he said the bottom of the drain was broken. The immediate cause of the collapse of the drain, he should say, was that the lower end of the drain was stopped up, which enabled it to fill, and owing to the loose character of the stone composing the bottom of the drain and the top, the water got through and permeated the sand, and put this sand into a solution. When the water began to run, it took this sand away in solution down the drain, and the thing collapsed. It was an improbable theory that the downward pressure of the building smashed the drain. The whole thing was caused through the floor having been robbed of its support.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: It was a nice point whether the bottom was torn away by the action of the debris going down, or whether it fell to pieces through the support of the sand having been taken away. The accident might have happened without the bottom of the drain having been torn away. As an engineer, he would prefer to have the columns placed away from the drain. In such a case the columns should have been put through to the bottom of the drain. If there had been a grating, the result would have been that a considerable amount of water would have come down to the store. He did not think nearly so much damage would have been done in that way as had been done. The water would have been spread, and it would get away somehow at the side of the building.

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner: If the grating had been in its place, he did not think there would have been any serious damage to the store.

F. W. Matore, partner in the plaintiff firm, stated that he had lived at Mossel Bay since 1878. The rain commenced about 7.30 p.m., with a drizzle, and at 8 o'clock it increased very much, and it rained hard for an hour, but the heaviest rain came down between midnight and one a.m. Next morning at 10 o'clock, Mr. Black's body was found underneath the store. There had been a considerable inwash of water in the lower store. He was frequently in the store, and was in a position to say how the goods were stored. The total weight on the lower store was 96 tons. The stock was just the ordinary one. The store had often had a heavier stock. The goods were distributed over the store in an even way. There never had been any sign of the building giving way on account of over-stocking. He took steps to diminish the damage in his account as much as possible. The wholesale prices were put in for the different articles. He thought they would come to some amicable arrangement with the Municipality, and the statement of the damage was a fair estimate. Witness confirmed what Mr. Bruns had said with regard to the temporary store. On the grounds already stated, he attributed the accident to the negligence of the Municipality.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: It was a technical question to ask him how the Municipality were going to increase the drain without taking down his house. The stacking of the timber did not cause the accident. There was a lot of wire resting over the part of the drain which fell in. The rain on the night in question was perhaps the longest for twenty years, although he remembered a heavier fall for an hour.

Mr. Schreiner closed his case.

Charles Wm. Hoggard, architect, of Mossel Bay, stated he was asked to report upon the state of things at this drain by the municipality in May last. He examined the drain at the point where it had broken. It measured about 45 ft. Slop-water also came down the drain from houses above. The bottom of the drain was mostly intact. There might have been some stones displaced at the sides of the drain. He saw several of the slabs of stone which covered the drain lying around the sides of the drain. Some of the stones were two inches thick, and others six. It was not a proper thing to build this store over the drain. The columns were almost on the side of the drain, which had to carry the whole of the weight.

Wm. John Matthews, formerly a member of the Mossel Bay Town Council, stated that he was a member of the Public Works Committee, and as such went over the streets and examined the drains. He knew the drain in question very well. The drain was in order before the flood. On the night in question, for about an hour, he was detained from getting into his house owing to the extraordinary rush of water. In all his experience he had never encountered such heavy rain, the effect of which was to cover every drain with heaps of stone and debris.

Mr. Bayman, a member of the Municipal Council, gave it as his opinion that the stone must have collapsed before Mr. Black's body came down the drain, otherwise it must have been washed out to sea. He knew of no precaution that could have been taken to have prevented what occurred, considering the heaviness of the rainfall. The rain was so heavy on the night of the accident that in his house his wife could not hear witness speak.

A. I. Vincent, member of the firm of Prince, Vincent and Co., and at present Mayor of Mossel Bay, stated that in 1896 Mr. Hudson applied to the municipality to have the drain covered. Permission was granted on the condition that the work would be done at Mr. Hudson's expense. Witness was in the Council at the time when the plan was submitted by the plaintiffs. The plan did not locate any drain. He did not know that the idea of the plaintiffs was to build over the drain. As a Councillor, he certainly would not have given permission to build over the drain if his attention had been drawn to it. The grating, which witness thought was a source of danger, was removed in 1903. The soil was of a sandy nature, and the previous heavy rains had made it damp.

George Draper, the gaoler at Mossel Bay, gave evidence as to the rain-gauge. The first reading at 9.50 on the night of September 24 was 1.66. In the morning the gauge was overflowing, so he took the reading as 4.50, which was the full capacity of the gauge, thus making a total of 6.16. It was the heaviest rainfall he had ever known.

Mr. Searle closed his case.

Mr. Schreiner, having read certain correspondence, addressed the jury for the plaintiffs. He said that a Municipality was directly responsible for any works which it performed. When the course of nature was interfered with, such interference should not result in damage. The plaintiffs had a right to expect that the grating should be in its place, as it was when their store was put up. He contended that the floor of the barrel drain had been ripped up by the rush of debris. Turning to the defence of vis major, he said that this did not hold unless the rain was the direct cause of the damage.

The action of the plaintiffs in building their store over the drain might have been imprudent, but this was immaterial unless it was the weight of the store which broke the drain.

Mr. Searle, for the defence, said that some specific act of negligence should be proved against the municipality in order to fix it with liability. No such act had been proved in this case. If the manner in which the barrel drain was constructed and looked after was negligence, Heaven help municipalities in this country. The removal of the grating was certainly not negligence. It was a highly improper thing to build over the drain. The name of the builder might well be handed down to posterity. All the evidence went to show that the rainfall was exceptional.

Mr. Schreiner having replied, Buchanan, J., said that the foundation of the action was negligence. It was pleaded in the declaration that the Town Council of Mossel Bay had certain rights and privileges in the making and repairing of sewers. The guiding principle was that where a Town Council or a municipality had powers which it might exercise, if it did not exercise these powers and damage resulted no liability attached to the Council, but if they exercise them they must do so in a way that was proper and reasonable. As he understood the case for the plaintiffs, it was not so much in the way the defendants had constructed the drain at Hudson's property that they complained of, but in not keeping the drain above in such repair as to prevent the stones which formed the base of the drain being carried away. The main conflict in the evidence in the case was between experts, who very often in such cases gave very different views. The drain was covered by the owners of the land. They saw how it was done, and it was for the jury to say whether the Town Council could be held liable for any more than an open drain. In submitting the plans to the Town Council, there was no specific intimation that the building was going to be constructed over this drain. The other alleged act of negligence was the removal of the grating from the culvert at the side of the road, but if that grating had not been removed still greater injury might have been caused. Could they say that the removal of the grating was a negligent act on the part of the Town Council? It was for the jury to find if there had been any such negligent act or acts proved to them, which ought to make the municipality liable for the breaking of the drain inside the building.

The jury, after an hour's deliberation, found, by six to three that the injury was caused by the negligence of the Council in not constructing the drain down Wasung-street and the barrel drain lower down properly. The jury expressed no opinion about the grating. They awarded damages to the plaintiffs as follows: For repairs to the store, £90, the Council to replace the drain as it was before, and for damages to the merchandise, £276. The jury considered that no compensation should be awarded for rent.

Judgment was accordingly entered for the plaintiffs for £366, with costs, the plaintiffs declared necessary witnesses, and the taxing officer to allow a reasonable amount for plans numbers 1 and 8.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

MACHAN V. MACHAN. { 1906.
Aug. 16th.

This was an action brought by the husband for an order against his wife for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which, a decree of divorce. Mr. Payne was for plaintiff; defendant did not appear.

Mr. Payne said that in this case there was a preliminary difficulty in regard to publication. When a rule was granted to sue by edictal citation, an order was made for personal service, failing which, publication in the "North-eastern Daily Gazette" (England) and one publication in the "Government Gazette." Personal service could not be effected, and information was not received here until the 3rd July, and publication could not be made in the "Government Gazette" until the 6th July. The citation was returnable on the 31st July, and thus one calendar month did not elapse after publication as required by Rule 273. Counsel submitted that, although the rule of Court had not been complied with, the matter was one in which the indulgence of the Court should be extended, seeing that defendant would not be prejudiced. The difficulty was unavoidable.

His Lordship, however, said that he could not sanction the rule of Court being set aside in this way. The return day would be extended until the 15th October, and one publication must be given in the "Government Gazette." He did not regard the difficulty as unavoidable if proper forethought had been exercised.

Mr. Gutsche submitted that it was the practice of this Court to issue a writ of civil imprisonment upon a Magistrate's Court judgment when accompanied by a return of nulla bona.

Provisional sentence granted as prayed, with costs, but no order on the second part of the application, with leave granted to the plaintiff to move the Court if he can bring evidence that defendant has means of paying the debt.

Mr. Buchanan applied for costs of opposing the second part of the application.

Hopley, J., expressed his strong disapprobation of the defendant's conduct and ordered him to pay all costs.

SALKINDER V. BAUMGARTEN.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved for the removal of trial to the ensuing Circuit Court to be held at Victoria West.

Ex parte THE "EAST LONDON DAILY NEWS" PRINTING AND PUBLISHING COMPANY, LTD.

Mr. Burton moved, as a matter of urgency, for an order for the appointment of liquidators of the "East London Daily News" Printing and Publishing Company.

Dr. Greer appeared on behalf of Wiener and Co. (judgment creditors).

Mr. Burton read the petition of John Biesecker, who said that he was the chairman, and was a shareholder in the East London Daily News Printing and Publishing Company, Limited. At the last statement of the company, which was made up to 30th June, 1906, the company's assets showed £14,012 0s. 9d., and the liabilities £4,894 0s. 10d. leaving a difference of assets over liabilities of £9,117 10s. 11d. At a meeting held on the 11th July, 1906, it was resolved to approve of the raising of £5,000 on debentures, to be secured by a general debenture bond, the debentures to be £5. That resolution was confirmed at a further shareholders' meeting on the 30th July. As a result of canvassing amongst the shareholders, support had been given for 339 debentures, which would yield £1,695. Petitioner had reasonable hope that the debentures would be fully subscribed, provided official liquidators were appointed, the reason being that one creditor had sued the company in the Supreme Court and recovered judgment viz., Messrs. Wiener and Co., of Cape Town, for £1,050. That day the Deputy Sheriff of East London had made an attachment of portion of the machinery and plant. He prayed for an order for the appointment of Herbert J. R. Pope (secretary of the Board of Executors), and Charles A. Odium (secretary of the company), as joint liquidators, or, alternatively, an order of relief in terms of section 139 of the Companies' Act of 1892 by the appointment of provisional liquidators, or restraining proceedings against the company for such period as would permit of the debenture moneys being received by the company.

It was stated that the application had already been made to the Eastern Districts Court, but, under all the circumstances, and more especially seeing that the judgment of Wiener and Co. was obtained in the Supreme Court, the E.D. Court expressed the opinion that the matter was one rather for application to the Supreme Court for relief.

Mr. Burton said that there was no specific application for the winding up of the company. The petitioners asked that certain persons should be appointed liquidators provisionally, or that an order should be given, the effect of which would be that execution in the judgment of Wiener would be stayed on the grounds set forth in the petition.

Dr. Greer said that a copy of the petition had only been served on his clients that morning, and he had to apply for a postponement to enable replying affidavits to be filed.

The application was ordered to stand over until to-morrow, Dr. Greer undertaking, meanwhile, that his clients would not proceed with their execution against the company's assets.

Postea (August 17th).

Dr. Greer read an affidavit by Ludwig Wiener, chairman of Wiener and Co. (judgment creditors), who stated that there was no allegation in the petition why an order should be made under the Companies Act, as prayed. From the statement which was made as to applicant company's position, it appeared that the company was in a perfectly solvent state. His company did not desire to unduly hamper applicant company, and he was willing to give applicant company time to liquidate its liability. He attached to his affidavit certain correspondence, in which applicant company offered £100 a month until the debt of £1,050 was liquidated, to which a reply was sent by deponent's attorneys stating that they would be prepared to accept the offer so long as Mr. Malcomess would be guaranteee for due fulfilment of the offer. To this latter letter deponent said no reply had been received. In case the Court granted an order for appointment of liquidators, he urged that the creditors should be consulted as to who the liquidators should be.

Mr. Burton read an answering affidavit by G. Montgomery Walker, of Walker and Jacobsohn, applicants' attorneys, in which he said that after the correspondence he had certain communications over the telephone with Mr. Wiener as to the matter, urging him not to take judgment on the 9th, as applicants were taking steps to raise debentures. To this he would not consent, and he took judgment and had issued a writ thereon. A telegram was also put in from Mr. Drake, of East London, setting out the time that would be required to get the matter of the debentures in order.

Mr. Burton said that the application for appointment of liquidators was somewhat premature, and he was afraid he could not press it. The company, according to the statement of assets and liabilities, was absolutely solvent. His lordship would see that the object of the application was clearly to obtain a stay of execution under the judgment of Wiener and Co. He submitted that the Court should grant some relief to petitioners. It was purely a matter of finding £1,000 in cash.

[Hopley, J. (to Dr. Greer): Are you instructed to press your execution?]

Dr. Greer said that the indebtedness arose from printing machines supplied by his clients to petitioners.

[Hopley, J.: But you do not want to sell them and take the bread out of their mouth?]

Dr. Greer: We have made proposal after proposal of the fairest kind, but they have not even had the courtesy to acknowledge them. Counsel went on to say that the petitioners took no steps to satisfy this claim, and yet they had unpaid calls to the amount of £3,000, which were due, and there was an allegation which was not met that they had made no effort whatever to get in any portion of that money.

[Hopley, J.: You cannot say it has not been met.]

Dr. Greer: They assume a non possumus attitude; they refuse to do anything.

Mr. Burton said that it was impossible to communicate with Mr. Malcomess, as he was on the high seas.

Hopley, J., said it would be ordered that further steps in execution of the judgment be stayed for six weeks, and the judgment creditors (Wiener and Co.) would have leave to apply at any time within that period in case their position were in any way prejudiced, petitioners to pay costs of this application.

SUPREME COURT

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

ANDREWS V. COHEN. { 1906.
Aug. 17th.

Mr. Inchbold moved, as a matter of urgency, for discharge of the provisional order of sequestration of defendant's estate. He said that the parties had come to an arrangement, and Cohen was desirous of commencing his business again in Somerset East, but was unable to do so while the provisional order was in existence.

Provisional order set aside.

SEARLE V. WARNER.

Appeal from a Divisional Court—
Extension of time—Jurisdiction of Divisional Court—
Copies of record.

Any judge sitting in the Supreme Court, whether sitting in Chambers or as a Divisional Court, has power to grant an extension of the time prescribed by the Rules of Court for prosecuting an appeal to the Court of Appeal.

Where an appellant had not printed copies of the record ready within the time prescribed, a Divisional Court granted an extension of time.

This was an application for an extension of time within which applicant (Warner) may prosecute an appeal from a judgment of the Hon. Sir John Buchanan, sitting as a Divisional Court of the Supreme Court.

The affidavit of Robert Charles Warner stated that he had been sued by Searle Brothers for £75 damages, sustained to a certain wall by reason of the stacking of certain coal. The case was heard on the 17th May last before Sir John Buchanan, who gave judgment for plaintiff for £50, with costs, which had since been paid. On the 23rd May petitioner noted an appeal with the Registrar, and notice was also served on the plaintiff's attorney. Deponent had duly tendered to the Registrar notice to set down, but that was refused owing to the printed record not having been completed.

The answering affidavit of William Searle (one of the respondents), said that the petition disclosed no reason why this Court should grant an extension of time. Petitioner had, in fact, no sufficient ground why the Court should grant him an extension of time.

[Hopley, J.: Well, Mr. Searle has decided the case. He does not submit that it might be so, but he simply says that it is so.]

Mr. Upington was for applicant; Mr. Russell was for respondent.

Mr. Russell took the point that this Court had no jurisdiction in a matter of appeal from another division.

The matter was ordered to stand over.

At a later stage, after argument.

Hopley, J.: In this case it is not now denied that a Judge of the Court sitting in Chambers may make such an order as is at present applied for, and I should say that if he could do so in Chambers he has a fortiori a right of doing it when sitting in open Court, where both counsel are heard. The policy of the Court always is, as far as my experience has gone, to give a would-be appellant facilities for prosecuting his appeal. One does not wish, or no Court that I know of wishes, to shut out a litigant from the ultimate resources of the law, which will finally decide whether he is in the right or in the wrong. Of course, he ought, practically speaking, to follow all the steps which the law lays down to enable him to prosecute such appeal as he may be advised to prosecute, and in this case the applicant has been negligent in one particular, and that was in not complying to the full with the terms of the Rule of Court which enjoins that, when prosecuting an appeal or setting it down for hearing within three months, he should at the same time furnish to the Registrar a certain number of printed copies of the record for the use of the Judges, and of the counsel on the other side. In every other respect, the present applicant did everything that the Rules of Court enjoin, and that the state of the law makes it obligatory upon him to do. But he came within the limit of time, and asked that the case should be set down, and he was unfurnished with printed copies of the record. Under these circumstances, the Registrar refused to take his setting down paper, and it is to cure his default by putting him in the position of going on with his appeal that it is brought now before the Court. Well, I think that he should have, in that state of circumstances, the indulgence of the Court, in fact, that the Court should, to use the words of the Chief Justice, in the case of Van Niekerk v. Browne, condone that negligence which he showed in not having copies printed exactly on the right day. Therefore, the applicant will have extension of time within which to prosecute his appeal until the end of this month. As to the question of costs, I feel that there is something in Mr. Russell's point that the applicant has not given any reason why he did not have these copies printed in time. I think that, as the neglect of the applicant has caused the necessity of the present application, and as I do not see that the respondent is to blame in coming here to oppose, costs of the day should be paid by the applicant.

On the application of Mr. Upington, his lordship ordered the appeal to be set down for the 27th August.

FOORD V. FOORD.

This was an action brought by Edith Alice Foord, of Cape Town, against Sydney Henry Foord, whose present whereabouts are unknown, for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which, a decree of divorce and custody of the minor child of the marriage. Mr. P. S. T. Jones was for plaintiff; defendant, who was sued by edictal citation, did not appear.

Evidence was led by Mr. Jones.

Wm. Thomas Birch, clerk in charge of the marriage register, Colonial Office, gave proof of the marriage, which took place in Cape Town in March, 1900.

Plaintiff said that on the day of the marriage defendant went to Kimberley for the benefit of his health. At the end of September, 1900, she joined him in Kimberley, and remained with him until the following June. Witness then returned to Cape Town, and resided with her mother. Defendant came down to Cape Town in January, 1902.

After witness returned to Cape Town, he did not give her any support, except the grant she had from the military, defendant having joined the Griqualand West Corps. When he returned to Cape Town, he did not make any attempt to provide her with a home. He was engaged in winding up the affairs of the corps. He would not go and see her at her mother's. Witness in that year went to England with her mother, and he subsequently followed her. She, however, did not see him in England, though she knew he was living with his mother at Horne Hill, Brixton. She afterwards had a communication from defendant's brother, Frank Foord, stating that her husband had gone to Canada. She only communicated with her husband through his brother, who said he had been asked not to disclose his address. The last communication she had from defendant was dated January 1, 1905, from Canada, stating that he would try to find her a home if she went out.

From the correspondence handed in, it appeared that defendant alleged that plaintiff had deserted him.

Plaintiff denied that she was responsible for the desertion.

By the Court: Witness would be prepared to go out to Canada and join defendant, if he provided her with a home. If he came to this country, she would be prepared to live with him.

Decree of restitution granted, defendant to return to or receive plaintiff on or before the 31st December, failing which, to show cause on the 1st February why a decree of divorce should not be granted as prayed, personal service to be effected, failing which, order to be served upon defendant's brother, Frank Foord, of London, S.E., and copy to be sent by registered letter, care of T. R. Bayliss, of Manitoba, Canada.

CRAFFORD V. MULLER.

This was an application brought by Mrs. Crafford, of Claremont, upon notice to respondent, who was a furniture dealer, also of Claremont, to show cause why a certain provisional judgment on two promissory notes for £50 each obtained by respondent against applicant on the 1st August should not be set aside.

The grounds of the application were that one judgment was wrongfully obtained, and in breach of agreement entered into between the attorneys of plaintiff and defendant.

The case, it had been arranged, should not be heard before the 22nd August in any event, and it was the intention of applicant to either pay the amount of the respondent's claim or appear in Court and lay the facts before his lordship. Furthermore, it was said that respondent had obtained judgment for an incorrect amount, having failed to give applicant credit for £12 18s. 6d., value of a suite of furniture sold by respondent on behalf of applicant. It was also urged that the parties both resided within the district of the Resident Magistrate's Court at Wynberg, and that it was a Magistrate's Court matter. Applicant was of independent means. Mr. Brady (her attorney) had offered to settle the capital and costs by ten o'clock on the 22nd August.

The respondent's position was that the judgment was obtained under a misapprehension, and that it had been intended to apply for judgment on the 2nd August. Although Mr. Brady had made the guarantee, no part of the said capital and costs had yet been paid. As to the question of suing in the Resident Magistrate's Court, the amount of the notes was over £40, and defendant only had the usufruct in some farm in the Ladismith district. Respondent's attorney said that there had been a bona fide mistake as to the date of set down, and he denied that there had been any breach of faith. It was stated that instructions to counsel were also given for the 2nd August.

An answering affidavit by Mr. Brady stated that he had always been ready and willing to tender what was justly due to respondent, according to his guarantee.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers was for applicant; Dr. Greer was for respondents.

After hearing counsel in argument on the facts,

Hopley, J., ordered that the judgment be set aside, with costs.

At a later stage, His Lordship said that the Registrar was in all probability quite correct in setting the matter down for the 1st August, because that was the proper return day, and that was the day on which it ought to be on the cause list. Where Mr. Buirski's clerk made a mistake was in not giving counsel specific instructions to move for an adjournment on the 1st August until the next day.

CROUSE AND ANOTHER V. FOURIE.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan moved for an order to admit applicants as co-defendants in certain action. Plaintiff, it was stated, now consented, subject to costs being made costs in the cause.

Ordered that the applicants be placed on the record as co-defendants, costs to be costs in the cause.

TAILLARD (FORMERLY TALTARD) V. ASSIGNEES MYBURGH AND CO.

Dr. Greer moved for an order authorising cancellation of certain cession of life policy in the books of the Mutual Company.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte GLYNN.

Dr. Greer moved, as a matter of urgency, for a temporary interdict restraining W. B. Shaw from paying over to one P. N. Theron £34 5s., portion of an inheritance, pending an action to be brought by applicant against respondent for rent of certain premises in Cape Town. Counsel cited several recent cases in support of the application, and more particularly relied on Lawley v. Herrero (16 C.T.R., 542).

Hopley, J., said that he was not aware of any precedent for such an application as this. No judgment had been obtained, and there was nothing to show why this attachment should be allowed. He should not grant an order at present. He did not recognise any such practice as counsel sought to set up.

No order.

Ex parte VAN STRAATEN.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for an order authorising sale of certain property bequeathed to petitioner's minor children, in the estate of Nel, and appointment of Mr. Dowd, attorney, Bedford, as curator of the minors, to pass transfer. The Master's report was favourable.

Order granted, in terms of the Master's report.

Ex parte LE GRANGE.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved, on the petition of P. J. le Grange, of Prince Albert, for his appointment as guardian of his minor grandchild. Counsel read the petition, and also a deed of renunciation by the boy's father.

Order granted appointing petitioner sole guardian of the said minor, and curator of his property.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

KALK BAY MUNICIPALITY { 1906.
V. COLLIE. { Aug. 18th.

This was an application upon notice to the respondent (James Collie) to show cause why a jury trial set down for Monday next, the 20th inst., should not be postponed, and why applicant should not be given leave to amend his pleadings to enable him to lead evidence on the improper and unworkman-like manner in which the drainage scheme at Kalk Bay had been carried out by respondent.

The application arose out of an action instituted by respondent against the Kalk Bay-Muizenberg Municipality, in respect of a certain contract for the construction of drainage works, into which he entered in October, 1904. The contract between the parties was broken in January last, when the works were taken out of the plaintiff's hands by the Municipality.

The principal ground of the present application was that, in consequence of investigations which were being carried on by Dr. Mitchell, Assistant Medical Officer for the Colony, and Mr. Stainthorpe, Assistant Engineer of the Public Works Department, as a commission appointed by the Government, certain new facts had come to light which were very material to the defendant's case. Dr. Mitchell and Mr. Stainthorpe had not yet completed their labours, but they had sworn affidavits to the effect that the construction of certain sections of the sewers was defective, and that the levels and gradients of certain sections of the sewers were not in accordance with the contract. The sewers were not watertight. The Commission expected to conclude their investigations by the end of the present year.

Respondent, in an answering affidavit, strongly opposed a postponement, on the ground that applicants had had ample time in which to prepare their defence. The works, he said, were carried on under the supervision of Mr. Bennett, the Municipal Engineer, or Mr. Olive, the Acting Engineer, so that the Council's official had been in constant touch with the work. His (deponent's) attorneys had already granted the defendants an extension of time in which to file their plea. Defendants had had possession of his plant, implements, and machinery since the 19th January last, and he was without funds with which to purchase further plant. He submitted that any postponement of the action as now set down would constitute a most unfair and serious hardship upon him. His principal and most essential witness, Thomas Pitt, who acted as his foreman during almost the whole period, informed him that he was remaining in Cape Town solely for the purpose of giving evidence in the case, at considerable inconvenience, and that he intended to leave Cape Town at an early date. He submitted that the grounds upon which postponement was asked for were wholly insufficient. He was quite prepared to admit that the sewer was full of water, or had a large quantity of water in it, but it was capable of simple explanation, as the water could enter from three different sources, which deponent proceeded to describe. Any change in the gradient of the sewer from the original plans had been made in accordance with instructions from the Municipal Engineer.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Searle, K.C., and Mr. Douglas Buchanan), was for applicant (defendant in the action); Mr. Upington (with him Mr. Watermeyer) was for respondent (plaintiff in the action).

Mr. Schreiner said that they were quite sensible of the exceptional position in which they placed plaintiff in this case, and they were quite aware it would be fair that his learned friend should say that costs which had been wasted in connection with the postponement must be paid by the municipality. Beyond that they maintained that it was impossible for him to press on any ground set out in the affidavit opposition to a postponement. These matters were not known to the municipality before. By good fortune the Government had appointed a Commission, who brought forward these important new features, most important in connection with a pumping system, such as this was supposed to be. His lordship would notice that this was not a gravitation system. It was a system of drainage which was going to be dependent upon pumping. Portion of the defence was that they had actually paid to the plaintiff upon certificates of the engineer no less a sum than £16,000, and they claimed in reconvention £11,236. It was absolutely necessary in the interests of justice between the parties that the trial should be postponed.

Mr. Upington said that this was a most unusual application. The statements contained in the affidavits of the Government officials amounted to no more than this: (1) There was a certain defect in the sewer, due to the leakage of water and the sub-soil into it, and (2) that a portion of the work had not been constructed according to the plans and drawings. This contract was terminated by the municipality, so far back as January last. Up to the present time there had not been a suggestion in the correspondence or in the pleadings that the work had been improperly done. Now the defendants asked for a sort of roving order to amend their plea within very general limits.

They had turned the defendant off the work, they had interdicted his plant, and it was with the greatest difficulty that he could bring his case against the municipality with respect to these matters. He had been reduced to great financial straits in consequence of their action, and now he was asked practically to consent to this matter standing over in order that the municipality may repair what was gross negligence on their part. If they had desired to set up such a plea on record, surely they had had all the means at their disposal. There was scarcely a legal defence that could possibly be taken to the plaintiff's claim which they had not taken, and now they asked for a postponement after this long delay.

Mr. Schreiner, in reply, said that, after his learned friend's very eloquent appeal, he should say on behalf of his clients that the taking over of the works was the result of a very strenuously-contested motion, which was heard by his lordship the Chief Justice. Now it appeared that the plaintiff had been paid for the plant. The engineer, without the Council knowing it or authorising it, had given an advance, which was one of the points in issue, and the plaintiff had actually been paid for the plant out of the municipal money.

Mr. Upington (interposing) said that that was not admitted.

Mr. Schreiner rejoined that he thought it was only fair to point this out after the sentimental objections which his learned friend had taken. Proceeding, he urged that in the interests of justice to both parties, it was only fair that the hearing should be postponed in order that they should have all the facts before the Court.

Buchanan, J.: I cannot now go into the merits of this case; it would be very undesirable to do so. The only question I have to decide is whether the case is ripe for hearing on Monday next. Application is made for postponement of the trial mainly on the ground that additional facts have come to the knowledge of the defendant since the case has been set down for trial, and, consequently, he wishes to have his pleadings amended to meet the actual facts of the case, and also to enable him to get the evidence which, unless a postponement takes place, he will not be able to put before the Court. If this were a small case, or a case purely between individuals, one might hesitate somewhat in postponing it, but this is a matter of public importance, a matter affecting a municipality, and the inhabitants thereof, and a matter concerning which evidently there is some thing which the Government have thought fit to interfere with and require a report upon, a contract also with a very large amount involved on each side, heavy damages are claimed from the defendant, and with the full information as yet not at the disposal of the parties. I think on the affidavits I must hold that the case is not ripe for trial by jury on Monday next. The evidence is not available, the pleadings are not in order, and unfortunately a break at the trial will not be possible when the case proceeds, as the case has been set down for to be heard before a jury. Under these circumstances, I think that postponement of trials is by no means unusual when cause is shown to the Court, and absence of witnesses alone or inability to procure evidence in time is often relied upon and founded as a ground upon which the trial should be postponed. We have had recent instances of this kind in regard to railway disputes, which have formed the subject of litigation in this Court. In these very considerable latitude was allowed to the defendant to bring all the facts properly before the Court. I must say, however, whatever costs have been incurred in this application, all wasted costs must be paid, and paid promptly, by the applicant in this case. Whatever may be the result of the trial, these costs ought to be paid, and paid at once, by the present applicant. The trial cannot go on on Monday, and must be postponed, and, as far as the amendment of pleadings is concerned, the parties are almost entitled, if they give notice to have any amendment they like before the trial actually comes off. The trial, therefore, set down for Monday next will be postponed, and leave will be given to amend pleadings, but the applicant must pay all wasted costs. The trial will be ordered to be set down for the 8th October.

On the application of Mr. Upington, an order was granted appointing Advocate Giddy as commissioner to take the evidence of Thomas Pitts, who had been employed as foreman by plaintiff, should it be found necessary to take his evidence on commission, four days' notice to be given to defendants when the commission sits.

REHABILITATION.

{ 1906.
{ Aug. 20th.

Mr. Sutton applied for leave to mention the application of Stephanus Johannes Schoeman for his discharge from insolvency. The matter, he said, was called on Friday last, while he was engaged in another division. He had been asked to specially mention the application as Schoeman desired to be rehabilitated.

[Hopley, J.: What is the urgency?]

Mr. Sutton said that applicant was anxious to be discharged from insolvency as soon as possible.

Application granted.

REX V. WARNER.

General dealer — Licence —
Colonial produce—Act 13 of 1870, Sec. 6.

W., having taken out a general dealer's licence in Cape Town, which, however, did not specify any place of sale, was convicted of having sold "coal" at Claremont. No attempt was made by the Crown to prove that this was not Colonial coal. Conviction quashed on the ground that there was no evidence that the appellant had committed the offence of selling imported coal without a licence and had thus contravened Sec. 6 of Act 13 of 1870, the offence with which he was charged.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Assistant Resident Magistrate of Wynberg, who had convicted the appellant of the crime of contravening section 6, Act 13 of 1870, as amended by Act 38 of 1887, in that on the 19th July and at Claremont he did wrongfully and unlawfully exercise the trade, business or calling of general dealer without having previously taken out the necessary licence as required by schedule II. of Act 38 of 1887. The Magistrate had sentenced appellant to a fine of 10s.

Appellant, it appeared, had taken out a general dealer's licence for Cape Town. He had understood that he was taking out a licence to cover all his stores. He had asked the Treasury to rectify the licence issued to him and make it applicable to all his stores in the Colony. The offence, in respect of which a conviction was obtained, was selling 15 bags of coal to the caterer for the police mess from his store in Draper-street, Claremont.

Mr. Upington was for appellant, Robert Charles Warner, trading as R. Warner and Co. Mr. Howel Jones was for the Crown.

Mr. Upington referred to section 3 of Act 38 of 1887, where "general dealer" was defined as "any person who carries on the trade or business of selling, or offering, or exposing for sale, barter, or exchange, any goods, wares, or merchandise, not being the growth, produce or manufacture of South Africa." Coal was produced in South Africa, and the onus was on the prosecution to show that the coal supplied was not the produce of South Africa. This it had failed to prove. In the second place only one sale was proved, and one sale was not sufficient to substantiate a charge of carrying on the business of a general dealer. He cited Rex v. Kukard (21, S.C., 189) and Rex v. Amos (16, E.D.C., 129). In the third place the charge was vague. It was not sufficient for a witness to state that the trade of general dealer was carried on. Specific acts constituting such a carrying on of trade should be proved (Rex v. Parkins, 10, E.D.C., 167). Lastly, the appellant had taken out a general dealer's licence and was entitled to sell anywhere in Cape Town under that licence, even if the coal was kept in a store at Claremont. He submitted that the mere evidence of an isolated sale did not constitute substantial ground for convicting the defendant. The evidence was vague and insufficient; it was not enough merely to say that appellant had a general store and that he carried on business there.

Buchanan, J., put it to counsel for the Crown what the granting of a general dealer's licence meant?

Mr. Jones said that, where a licence was granted for Cape Town, it meant that the licensee was only licensed to sell in Cape Town.

[Buchanan, J.: Could he under that licence sell anywhere in Cape Town, say, at half a dozen different places?]

Mr. Jones: He could by this licence, but I am informed that the practice is to give a general dealer's licence only for particular premises.

[Buchanan, J.: But where is the authority for that?]

Mr. Jones said that the authority for that practice was derived from the case of Queen v. Rittman (4 E.D. Court Rep., 309).

[Buchanan, J.: Under this licence appellant could have sold anywhere in Cape Town?]

Mr. Jones admitted that that was so. On the question of commercial travellers going out of the district to sell, Counsel cited Queen v. Lezard (4 High Court Rep., 1).

[Hopley, J.: Yes, but in that case Lezard was carrying a cart load of jewellery about with him and hawking it; it was not merely a matter of taking samples.]

Mr. Jones said that the notice of appeal was in very general terms—that the conviction was contrary to law—and the points now taken were not taken in the Court below. Consequently, they were somewhat embarrassed in meeting the points now raised. Had the ground of appeal not been in such general terms, no doubt they would have been furnished by the Magistrate, with his reasons for judgment. As to the question of whether the coal was South African produce, counsel submitted that it was not necessary for the prosecution to produce evidence which was specially within the knowledge of defendant. Defendant did not raise the defence in the Court below that this was South African produce. As to the point that there was only one transaction proved, he submitted that it was clear that a business was being carried on at the defendant's store at Claremont. He submitted that the Court should not quash the conviction upon the purely technical grounds which were now raised for the first time, and which on the evidence were not supported.

Buchanan, J.: The accused in this case was charged with the crime of contravening section 6 of Act 13 of 1870, that is, the Stamps and Licences Act, in that he exercised the trade or business of a general dealer without a licence. The evidence in the case is very meagre. For the Crown only two witnesses were called. The first witness says he went to the defendant's store in Claremont and that he was told he could be supplied with coal. The other witness says he is the caterer to the police mess, and he ordered from the store fifteen bags of coal, which were delivered and paid for. The charge sheet also is very meagrely drawn. It simply charges the accused with the crime of carrying on the trade or business of a general dealer at Claremont without having previously taken out the necessary licence. The accused was convicted and fined 10s. Objection is taken to this conviction on several grounds. The notice to the Attorney-General says that the conviction is not supported by evidence, and is contrary to law. Counsel, in arguing that it is contrary to law, says that all that has been shown is that there was simply one isolated act, and that the Courts had previously held that a single isolated act is not sufficient to prove the carrying on of the business. If that were the only objection, I think it might be inferred in this case that he was carrying on a business. But it is also objected that the indictment does not charge the accused with any specific act, but simply says that he carries on the business of a general dealer. To ascertain what "general dealer" means we must refer to the Act, which requires a licence for such business, and which says that "general dealer" means any person who carries on the business of selling any wares or merchandise, not being the growth, produce, or manufacture of South Africa. Therefore, unless the thing sold were not the produce of South Africa, there would be no necessity to have a licence. In this case only the generic term "coal" is used, and it is well known that coal is one of the products of South Africa. Whether this coal was the product of South Africa is not attempted to be proved, and it is necessary to prove that it is not the product of South Africa before a conviction can be obtained. In criminal charges it is necessary that the authorities prove and not that the thing should be assumed; if the fact which is assumed is within the knowledge of the accused there may be prima facie evidence sufficient to call upon him to rebut the presumption, but here there is no attempt to prove that it is not Colonial coal. In consequence of the meagre charge and of the very meagre evidence and of the absence of any proof that any general dealer's licence was required for selling this coal, the conviction must be quashed. Certain other and important questions have been raised during the course of the argument, but it is not necessary now to discuss these questions. Curiously enough, the accused in this case is licensed as a general dealer in Cape Town, and on that licence he contends that he is free to sell anywhere in the Colony. It is contended on behalf of the Crown that a licence only authorises sale at a particular place. Well, it happens that this licence does not authorise sale at any particular place, and that it is most general in its terms. But there have been cases in which it has been held that under other sections of the Act a licence can only apply to a specific place mentioned in the licence, but in this case no specific place is mentioned in the licence; it simply authorises him to carry on the business of general dealer. The effect of such an authorisation, I think, it is undesirable now to discuss. It is a matter of considerable importance, and could be raised in a future case. This conviction is quashed on the ground that the crime laid in the charge has not been proved.

MOHAMMED V. MOHAMMED.

This was an appeal from a decision of the A.R.M. of Somerset West, in a case in which the plaintiff unsuccessfully sued the defendant for £19, being the balance claimed for the goodwill of a shop.

From the plaintiff's evidence it appeared that the defendant agreed to give him £20 for the goodwill of his shop, which was in close proximity to that of the defendant. The defendant paid £1, but failed to pay the balance of £19. The plaintiff had carried out his part of the agreement, and tendered the shop to the defendant on the 1st June. The defendant denied the debt, and said that he had agreed to purchase the goods in the shop. The Magistrate's judgment was absolution from the instance in convention and in re-convention, and ordered the plaintiff to pay the costs. He gave as his reasons for judgment that the evidence was unreliable.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers was for the appellant and Mr. W. P. Buchanan was for the respondent.

Counsel for the appellant having been heard in argument on the facts,

Buchanan, J.: This dispute is between two Indians. One Mohammed sued another Mohammed in the Magistrate's Court for £19, balance of purchase price, as he alleges, for the goodwill of a shop. The defendant Mohammed says the £19 was to be paid for the goods in the shop. Here was a distinct conflict of the evidence between the parties, and the Magistrate in his reasons which he supplies to us says a conflict of testimony runs all through the case, and it may be surmised from his judgment that he did not believe the stories told by either side. The appeal is solely one of fact, and the arguments by Mr. De Villiers, though good, would have been better addressed to the Magistrate. The Magistrate had the witnesses before him. We have only the record. The Magistrate upon hearing the witnesses decided that the plaintiff had not made out his case. If more witnesses were called for the plaintiff, that is only a question of quantity and not quality, and the Magistrate was better able to judge of the quality. The appeal will be dismissed, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

LOUBSER V. ESTATE BOTHA. { 1906.
Aug. 21st.
„ 22nd.

Master and servant—Wages—
Inchoate contract—Quantum meruit—Immoral consideration.

This was an action brought by Susanna J. Loubser, described as a housekeeper, of Darling, against the executors of the estate of the late Antonie Botha, of Worcester, to recover a sum of £500 and transfer of certain property in terms of an alleged verbal agreement.

This matter had previously been before the Court on an application by plaintiff for leave to sue in forma pauperis (16 C.T.R., 77). The application was refused, but the plaintiff had since been able to raise funds to bring the action.

Plaintiff, in her declaration, said that she was a housekeeper residing at Darling, and defendants were sued in their capacity as executors of the estate of the late Antonie Botha, of Worcester. On the 16th September, 1905, during the lifetime of the said Botha, the said Botha entered into an agreement with the plaintiff, whereby the said Botha engaged the plaintiff as his housekeeper, and if she looked after his household matters generally and took care of and tended the said Botha during his lifetime, and until his death, the said Botha—in consideration of the services rendered to him by plaintiff—agreed to provide her with food, lodging, and clothing, and promised and undertook that she should further receive as remuneration and reward for fulfilling her part of the agreement £500 and a certain cottage with the land thereto attached, situate at Worcester, and being undivided portion of erf No. 4 Ward, Hex River, and having a frontage to High-street. It was agreed between the parties that the said remuneration and reward should be paid to the plaintiff at the death of the said Botha. Owing to inadvertence, the said agreement was never put into writing, as the parties to the said agreement intended that it should be. It was of full force and effect during the lifetime of the said Botha. Plaintiff said that she entered the service of the said Botha, and duly fulfilled the terms of the agreement until his death on the 20th October, 1905. She claimed an order upon defendants to pay her the sum of £500, with interest a tempore morae, and to give her separate transfer of the said land and cottage, or, alternatively, failing transfer as aforesaid, payment of £450.

Defendants, in their plea, denied that any such agreement as was alleged in paragraph 2 of the declaration was entered into, and, while they said that there was no such agreement, in writing they denied that it was ever intended that it should be put in writing. They further said that if deceased did make such a promise, the same did not constitute a gift, that it was not registered, and that it was not one upon which the plaintiff could sue. If the said promise was given, the only consideration therefor was that the plaintiff should cohabit with the said Botha as his mistress, and that there was no valid or legal consideration for the said promise, if it were given. They denied that he was in a weak state of health. They denied paragraph 3, save that they admitted that the said plaintiff did cohabit with the said Botha. They said that Mr. Botha did maintain plaintiff until his death. Defendants prayed that the claim be dismissed, with costs.

Plaintiff, in her replication, denied that, in her declaration, she made the alleged admission, "save that they admit that the plaintiff did so cohabit with the said Botha." She prayed that the said statement should be struck out of the plea, otherwise the replication was general.

Mr. Sutton was for plaintiff; Mr. Upington (with him Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers) was for defendant.

Mr. Upington said that he consented to an alteration of the plea accordingly.

Frederick Wm. Lindenberg said that he was formerly an auctioneer and general agent of Worcester, and that he now lived at Woodstock. He used to be a municipal councillor at Worcester, field-cornet, and valuator. He had known the late Mr. Antonie Botha since he was a boy. He used to transact a good deal of Mr. Botha's business. Witness saw Mr. Botha in August last. Mr. Botha said that he wanted a housekeeper, and somebody to attend to him. Mr. Botha had just recovered from a severe illness. Mr. Botha was at that time living apart from his first wife, and his children were living with his son-in-law. Witness suggested to Mr. Botha that he should advertise for a housekeeper. Mr. Botha said that he did not want to pay wages, but he would keep the housekeeper, and at his death he would give her £500. Witness always took Mr. Botha to be worth about £12,000. On instructions from Mr. Botha, he inserted an advertisement in the "Cape Times" for a housekeeper on the 15th September. The advertisement ran as follows: "Housekeeper. — Widower (country) requires housekeeper, to live with family; trustworthy lady will be well remunerated and rewarded.—Apply care of P.O. Box 1,094, Cape Town." Witness was told by Mr. Lindenberg to state "widower." Over 70 applications were received in reply. Mr. Botha came to town on the 24th September. They looked at the replies. Mr. Botha picked out Miss Loubser's application. He was staying with Loubser's in Worcester, and he remarked that she might be a relative. Neither Mr. Botha nor witness had previously known Miss Loubser. They went to the address given in the letter, but they found that Miss Loubser had removed and they went to Mrs. Wentzel's, in Francis-street. Miss Loubser answered the door, and invited them into the sitting-room. Mrs. Wentzel shortly afterwards came into the sitting-room. Miss Loubser asked what wages he would give, and he said that he would not pay her any fixed wages, but if she attended him properly during his lifetime he would give her £500 and one of his cottages at Worcester. Mr. Botha said that he would put the offer in writing; witness understood that he would put the offer into a contract. He said that he would come again to town in a fortnight's time, and witness must draw up the contract. It was arranged that Miss Loubser should go. Miss Loubser came to Cape Town Station by arrangement next morning, and left by train for Worcester. Mr. Botha told Mrs. Wentzel that he would look after her niece. About a fortnight after witness received a letter from Mr. Botha stating that he would come to town, but on the day when witness expected him he received a telegram requesting him to go to Worcester at once, as Botha was dying. Witness at once went to Worcester, and proceeded to Mr. Loubser's house, where Mr. Botha was living. Mr. Botha had reserved two rooms in the house for his own use. Witness saw that Botha was in a dying state. Miss Loubser was nursing him. Mr. Botha died the following morning, on the 20th October. His children came after he had died. Witness told Mr. Botha, Jun., and Mr. Stofberg (son-in-law of deceased) of the arrangement made between Mr. Botha and Miss Loubser. Witness valued the cottage on erf 4 at £400.

Witness was cross-examined at some length in reference to a deed of sale purporting to sell to deceased's son and his son-in-law his property for £3,000, property that was valued at £10,000. Witness admitted that he drew up the deed of sale, and that he knew there was such a large margin between the purchase price and the value. At that time, Mr. Botha had some trouble in his relations with his wife. In further cross-examination witness said that he went to Worcester in answer to a telegram from Miss Loubser. He understood from the wire that he was required to put the contract between Mr.

Botha and Miss Loubser in writing. When witness got to the house, Mr. Botha was not in a fit state to transact business. He had his meals with the family he lived with. Witness did not know why Botha wanted a housekeeper; he said that he wanted somebody to attend to him, and look after him when he became ill. Mr. Botha asked him to describe him in the advertisement as a "widower," because it would be inconvenient to describe him as a man who was separated from his wife. Mr. Botha and witness also called at an hotel off Plein-street to see another applicant, but they did not care for her. He believed that applicant was a barmaid, they had an interview with her. She was, he believed, offered the same terms; Mr. Botha interviewed her at the door. Then they proceeded to see Miss Loubser. Witness was informed that plaintiff's agent had provided her with funds, with which to proceed with this action. About the time of these proceedings, Mr. Botha was inclined to take too much drink, and his illnesses may have been due to drink. Mr. Botha always told him that the property was to be re-transferred to him when the trouble with his wife was over. The arrangement with Miss Loubser was that the cottage and land should be transferred to her after his death.

Re-examined: Mr. Botha was 54 years of age at his death. He told witness that his wife had deserted him, and that his children were not living with him.

Susanna Jaomina Loubser (the plaintiff) said that she was a spinster, and lived with her mother at Darling. Her occupation was a dressmaker and housekeeper. Witness was without property. She had been in service at Darling and Malmesbury. Early in September she came to Cape Town, and she stayed with her aunt, Mrs. Wentzel, in Francis-street. She had also a friend named Mrs. Wentzel in Jamieson-street. Mr. Botha told her that he had received 73 replies to his advertisement. Mr. Botha said that he had selected her, because she was a Dutch lady. He told her that he was a widower, and that his children were not with him, because he had no housekeeper. He said he wanted her to look after him until his death, and that he intended to remove from Loubser's house to the cottage. As to terms, he said that he would pay her £500, and give her the cottage at his death. On arriving at Worcester next day, they took a cab to Mr. Gert Loubser's. Afterwards they went out, and Mr. Botha said that he was going to show her the cottage he had given to her. He pointed out to her the house shown on the photograph produced. They went to the house, which was occupied by Uys, and passed right through into the yard. He also showed her the beacons of the property at the front.

Cross-examined: Witness had had two illegitimate children. Mr. Botha was not the father of either of the children. Mr. Miller was the father of one child. She admitted having told one Mr. Wrex that Miller was not the father of her child, and said she did that because she was advised to do so by Mr. Winterbach, and because she considered that Wrex had nothing to do with the matter. She denied that she had been unduly familiar with Mr. Botha. Botha had kissed her. She could not swear that he had not kissed her in public. She told Mr. Botha that she was pregnant the day after she arrived at Worcester. She did not remember a conversation between Botha and Mr. Carroll, of the Masonic Hotel, during which the former made the remark: "She makes up my bed and lives with me." Witness occupied a separate room from Mr. Botha. She was 26 years of age. After Mr. Botha's death she saw Mr. Stofberg and young Mr. Botha, and told them that she was to receive no wages, but was to receive £500 and a cottage after Mr. Botha's death. She did not tell them that he had said he would make provision for her in his will. She said that he had agreed to put the arrangement in a contract. She admitted that she passed under the name of Mrs. Louw at Ceres and Riversdale.

Susan Wentzel, of Jamieson-street, Cape Town, and Elizabeth Wentzel, of Francis-street, having also given evidence,

Mr. Sutton closed his case, subject to the right to call Mr. Meiring, surveyor, who was on his way from Worcester.

Johannes P. M. Stofberg (son-in-law of the late Antonie Botha) was called by Mr. Upington. Witness said that he was one of the executors under Mr. Botha's will. Mr. Botha married his second wife in July, 1902, and he had had unhappy relations with her. The family by the first marriage resided at Rawsonville. There was no estrangement between the children and their father. Witness and Mr. Theunis Botha bought the property from Mr. Botha. The first that witness heard of Mr. Botha's illness was on the morning when he had died. Afterwards witness and his co-executor saw Miss Loubser, and she told them that Mr. Botha had paid her nothing, but that he had said he would make provision for her in his will. Witness pointed out to her that there was no provision in the will, and Miss Loubser then said there had been no time to make any provision in the will. It was not until about a fortnight afterwards that witness heard anything about a contract between Mr. Botha and plaintiff. Mr. Botha's farm and town property had been transferred to witness and young Mr. Botha in 1904, and at his death Mr. Botha had no property in Worcester. Mr. Linden-berg told witness that Mr. Botha had asked him to put in a kind word for Miss Loubser.

Cross-examined: Witness afterwards made arrangements for Miss Loubser to be paid £2 and her fare back to Cape Town. Miss Loubser did not get this money. There was an option of £13,000 on the farm. Mr. Botha offered the farm to witness and Mr. Theunis Botha for £3,000, it being understood that they were to have the minor children educated. He considered that the transaction was quite straight and honest. Witness refused to take transfer of the property at first, as Mr. Botha was in trouble with his wife. Witness did not want the property on those terms, and he waited until he could buy it.

Dr. Geo. W. Ford, of Worcester, in his evidence, said that Botha suffered from alcoholism. His death was due to heart failure.

J. W. Meiring, sworn appraiser (called by Mr. Sutton), said that he valued the land and cottage claimed by plaintiff at £450.

Theunis Botha (one of the executors and son of the testator) gave evidence.

In cross-examination, witness said he knew that his father had had trouble with his second wife. As to the sale from his father of his property to witness and his brother-in-law, witness had not paid anything, but the purchase price had gone off against his inheritance. Witness could not see that they had done extremely well out of the sale, because there were six minors, all of whom they had to educate. They had also had his father's debts to pay.

Andrew James Carroll, proprietor of the Masonic Hotel, Worcester, said that Mr. Botha was a fairly frequent visitor at his hotel. He recollected Mr. Botha opening a butcher's shop. Soon after he had opened the shop Mr. Botha called with Miss Loubser at the hotel, and went to witness's private quarters. He said that he had got Miss Loubser up to be his housekeeper, and that he had promised Miss Loubser £500 and a house. He said that he had money, and he made other remarks, which led witness to believe that he was on intimate terms with Miss Loubser.

Cross-examined: Witness believed that Mr. Botha was addicted to drink. Latterly he appeared to have become rather deranged in his mind.

Johannes Jacobus du Toit, wagon-maker, Worcester, said that he had seen Mr. Botha kiss Miss Loubser in his butcher's shop. Botha used to address her as "Darling" and "Susie." At the time of the incident, Botha was a little under the influence of liquor. He did not think that at that time Mr. Botha was accountable for his actions.

Jacobus Stephanus Hugo, butcher's assistant, Worcester, and John Carr, railway foreman, also gave evidence.

Mr. Sutton having been heard in argument on the facts,

Maasdorp, J.: In this case the plaintiff sues the executors of the estate of the late Antonie Botha for the payment of £500 and transfer of a cottage situate at Worcester, which is alleged to be the consideration due for her services as a housekeeper to the late Antonie Botha, in pursuance of an agreement entered into between Botha and the plaintiff on the 26th September, 1905. The defendants in their plea dispute this contract, and further allege that, even if such a contract had been entered into, it was for the immoral and illegal consideration of cohabitation between Botha and plaintiff, and that, consequently, the contract would be illegal, and plaintiff could not recover upon it. Defendants represent, amongst others, six children of Botha who are still minors, and whose interests they are bound to protect, and to see that no claims are established which would affect these children, except upon the clearest evidence. The very clearest evidence must be given that this contract was entered into between the plaintiff and the deceased man Botha, who now, of course, is unable to speak for himself. It is interesting to inquire what the circumstances are under which this contract was alleged to have been made. Mr. Botha was the father of a large family, consisting of three sons and seven daughters. He was married to a second wife, from whom he was separated, in consequence of serious differences that had arisen between them. Under the circumstances, he had let a large house of his at Worcester to a Mr. Gert Loubser, to occupy with his family, he (Mr. Botha) retaining two rooms in the house for himself, on condition also that he should become a boarder of Mr. Loubser's. The idea seems to have occurred to him that he should look for and obtain the services of a housekeeper. In pursuit of that notion he came to Cape Town, and he ultimately interviewed the plaintiff, who resided with her aunt (Mrs. Wentzel), a midwife. The plaintiff herself had been the mother of an illegitimate child some little while before. At that time she was pregnant, and in the following February she gave birth to another child. Mr. Botha was accompanied by Mr. Lindenbergh. It is alleged that at this interview, at the house of the plaintiff's aunt, this contract was finally concluded between the parties, the terms of which were that the plaintiff should enter the service of Mr. Botha as a housekeeper, and that he should pay her upon his death £500 and transfer this cottage to her. It may be remarked, in passing, that that cottage did not at that time belong to him; he had sold it some time before. I will say at once that, whatever Mr. Botha's frailty of health may have been, if this contract had been clearly proved to me, I would consider that it should be enforced. He was not in such a state of mind that he was not able to carry on his own business at the time, and a contract in those circumstances, if those terms were clearly agreed to, was one which could be sustained by the Court. But the question arises, was any such final contract entered into? The Masters and Servants' Act is not directly applicable to this case, because the term of service did not extend to a period of 12 months. I am not prepared, under the circumstances of the conversation that took place, to find that this contract was finally concluded upon the terms stated in the declaration. According to Mr. Lindenbergh's evidence, there was something that would still be required to be done, in the way of executing a contract. Mr. Botha was liberal in his terms, and those terms were readily jumped at by Mrs. Wentzell, the aunt of this girl, in a manner which does not do much credit to her judgment. Mr. Lindenbergh's evidence was unsatisfactory upon other points, and I merely say this in respect of his memory, and will not put it upon any stronger ground. Consequently, I cannot accept his evidence upon an important contract on a matter that took place some little while ago. The question is, whether, in the subsequent conversation that took place between the executors and the girl and Mr. Lindenbergh, there is not some evidence which would satisfy the Court that even in the minds of the parties a contract had not been concluded at that time. That conversation amounted to this, that some liberal promises had been made, but that they had never formed the terms of a concluded agreement, and the girl had never insisted that that was the case. If the plaintiff had gone with Botha to Worcester in the bona fide belief that she was entering into his service by a contract he would be bound by it, whatever liberties he may have had afterwards with her. But having found that this contract is not proved upon satisfactory evidence, the Court might still consider whether the plaintiff is not entitled to something for services actually rendered by her, and, in that shape, the question arises upon what relations she was with Botha at his house. I may say at once that there is not the slightest evidence that she rendered him any service, except that on one or two occasions she put on his socks and his boots, and I may also say that there is a good deal of evidence to prove that the relations between them were of a most improper character. He was in a frail state of health from the excessive use of intoxicating liquor. She must have known it, and she lives in what I may call a very improper manner with this old man. Consequently, I come to the conclusion that there was no service of any kind rendered by her for which the Court can now award her anything. Judgment must be given for the defendants, with costs.

Mr. Sutton asked his lordship to hear him on the question of costs, and proceeded to urge the Court that his client should not be mulcted in costs.

Maasdrop, J.: In my opinion she ought to have left Botha as soon as she discovered what relations she was on with him there. There is no consideration that can be shown to her at all in the matter of costs.

Ex parte CLOETE AND DURANT. { 1906.
Aug. 21st.

Mr. Close moved as a matter of urgency for a temporary interdict, restraining the trustees in the estate of one David Naude, of Lady Grey, from selling certain leasehold erven, the interest in which the insolvent disposed of to the petitioners.

Interim interdict granted, returnable 12th September, with leave to telegraph the interdict.

SINCLAIR AND PYPERS V. MATZ.

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs to recover the sum of £89 17s., balance of account for work and labour done.

The declaration set out that the plaintiffs were contractors at Simon's Town, and that the defendant, who resides at Plumstead, was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of £89 17s. The defendant pleaded that a written agreement was entered into between the plaintiffs and the defendant, but the plaintiffs did not carry out the work in accordance with certain plans and specifications of the architect. The defendant paid £20 on account. It was agreed that the plaintiffs should occupy a certain house at Simon's Town, belonging to the defendant, and that their occupation should apply in reduction of the sum. The plaintiffs owed for rent £22, and this sum the defendant was entitled to set-off against the contract price. The plaintiffs wrongfully, and in breach of contract, omitted to carry out a portion of the work in terms of the plans and specifications to the value of £18, which he was entitled to deduct. The defendant contended that he was entitled to deduct the amounts of £20, £22, and £18 from the contract price of £110, and there was therefore due to the plaintiffs the sum of £50, which was tendered, with costs, and refused.

Hopley, J., remarked that it was a pity to waste the time of the Court with a case of this description, while up-country witnesses were waiting on more important cases. The point was, whether he should not have to refer this matter to an expert, but that, after all, meant more expense to the parties.

Mr. Van Zyl was for the plaintiffs, and Mr. Roux was for the defendants.

Evidence having been called, and counsel heard in argument on the facts,

Hopley, J.: I regret very much this case has come before this Court, for more than one reason. One is because the dispute between the parties, upon a little careful examination between themselves or their legal advisers, would have shown that the dispute narrowed itself down to such a small amount that it really was not worth risking the heavy expenses of a suit in the Supreme Court for the purposes of settling the matter. Another was, that any ordinary practical man could have settled the dispute. His lordship, after reviewing the evidence and the terms of the contract, gave judgment for the plaintiff for £58, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

WOLFAARD V. BROIDO. { 1906.
Aug. 22nd.

Magistrate's Court—Judgment by default—Claim in reconvention.

The plaintiff, being sued in a Magistrate's Court for a debt, was not in a fit state to appear, and judgment was given against him by default. The plaintiff had a counterclaim against the present defendant, then plaintiff, but having failed to file a claim in reconvention, he now brought an action for the amount in the Supreme Court. Held, that the plaintiff would be entitled to recover if he clearly established his claim; but in the absence of clear proof thereof, absolution from the instance was granted.

This was an action brought by Guillaume Jacobus Wolfardt, farmer, Ladismith, against Nathan Broido, general dealer, also of Ladismith, to recover three sums amounting to about £75, goods sold and delivered.

Plaintiff, in his declaration, said that defendant was indebted to him in the following sums for oat-sheaves and barley delivered to him in 1898, 1899, and 1900, viz., £49 1s. 9d., £12 13s. 9d., and £13 10s., for which sums he claimed judgment.

Defendant, in his plea, said that whatever goods he had purchased from plaintiff he had paid for either in cash or goods, and if any goods had not been so paid for they had not been delivered to or received by him. Alternatively, he said that he was entitled to plead compensatio and to set off a judgment of £102 18s. 10d. obtained by him against plaintiff in the Resident Magistrate's Court at Ladismith, which amount had not been satisfied in whole or in part, there being a return of nulla bona.

Plaintiff, in his replication, said that he admitted the judgment.

Mr. Russell was for plaintiff; Mr. McGregor was for defendant.

Evidence having been led on both sides and counsel heard in argument on the facts,

De Villiers, C.J.: It appears that on the 29th May, 1905, a summons was served upon the present plaintiff at the suit of the present defendant for a sum of £102 18s. 10d. in the Magistrate's Court. This amount is made up of balance of promissory note, goods sold and delivered, and cash lent. The defendant appeared in the Magistrate's Court on the day fixed for the trial, that is on the 2nd June, 1905; he appeared through his agent or attorney, and he pleaded payment and asked for a postponement. The case was postponed until the 9th August to enable specified detailed account being submitted, showing how the payment was effected. Then on the 9th June the record says: "At this stage Mr. Johnson (that is the agent for defendant) expressed a wish that he be allowed to withdraw from the case, and that judgment be granted by default." On the day named the defendant did not appear, there was no evidence forthcoming and the explanation now given is that he had been drinking of late, and that he was not in a fit state to appear. The plaintiff has chosen to bring his action in this Court, and no fault is to be found with him for choosing this forum; but, of course, it lies upon him to prove that the forage for which he sues the present defendant has been actually delivered, and that the barley has also actually been delivered to the defendant. Unfortunately, the plaintiff kept nothing in the way of books, except a little note-book, which is not of much assistance to the Court in deciding the matter. Then there are discrepancies in the accounts which he has sent to the defendant. Further, there is nothing to contradict the defendant's books. The only point which is against defendant's evidence is the fact that he seems to admit that where he pays cash there is no entry in his books at all. That seems to me a most extraordinary way of bookkeeping. I do not see how his books can be expected to balance at the end of the year if they do not show what the cash payments were in respect of goods bought by him on behalf of the business. It lies upon the plaintiff to satisfy the Court that all the produce in respect of which he claims has been delivered to the defendant. He says there was a man called Reid, who lived at Ladismith, a feather sorter, to whom these loads of produce were delivered. Reid, however, has not been called. In the absence of anything like corroborative evidence of the statement of the plaintiff, I do not see how the Court can give judgment in his favour. The judgment of the Court will be absolute from the instance, with costs.

On the application of Mr. McGregor, defendant was certified by the Court as a necessary witness.

DODOWITZ V. LENG. } 1906.
} Aug. 22nd.

Interdict to prevent issue of summons for arrest—Defendant leaving the Colony.

The applicant, having been informed that the respondent was about to issue summons for his arrest, applied to the Court for an order restraining the issue of such summons on the ground that he had landed property in the Colony and intended to be absent for a short period only. It appeared, however, that the landed property was heavily mortgaged, and that the period for which the applicant would be absent was doubtful.

Held, that, even if it were competent to make the order, there were not sufficient grounds for the interference of the Court.

This was an application brought by Jacob Dodowitz, of Cape Town, upon notice to S. B. Leng, calling upon him to show cause why the Court should not grant an order preventing respondent from arresting applicant under the 8th Rule of Court.

Applicant's affidavit stated that he intended to proceed to England by the mail steamer this afternoon, and he had reason to believe that respondent, unless restrained, would effect his arrest later in the day on account of a debt which he owed to him. Applicant said that he had taken a return ticket, and that he was going to England in order to buy the plant for the South African Co-operative Bootmakers' Union Ltd.

Respondent, in an answering affidavit, said he had told applicant that, if he found a surety for the debt, or if he paid half the amount owing, he would not apply for his (Dodowitz's) arrest. He submitted that the present proceedings were wholly unnecessary.

Mr. Alexander was for applicant; Mr. Benjamin was for respondent.

Mr. Alexander having been heard in argument on the facts,

De Villiers, C.J.: The applicant admits in his affidavit that he owes the respondent £156. He says that he is going to England on a purely business matter, and has taken a return ticket. He adds that "the business I am proceeding on is in connection with a matter relating to the South African Co-operative Bootmakers' Union, Limited, with which I am connected." But, reading these paragraphs together, I should come to the conclusion that he was going to England, to transact his business there, the business relating to the South African Co-operative Bootmakers' Union. I find that in the documents which he has signed under the Aliens' Act, 1905, he says that he is probably going through to Germany. He has not satisfied me that he is going only for a temporary purpose, nor has he satisfied me that he has left any property that could meet the debt. It is true that he has landed property, but the statement is made that the property is heavily mortgaged, and, if it be heavily mortgaged, with the present depression in landed property, it is not likely that that landed property would be much of a security to the respondent. It is an unusual application, and I am not prepared to say that it could not be made in any circumstances, but, at all events, the applicant has not shown sufficient cause why the Court should make a special order in this case to prevent the issue of a summons for his arrest. The application must be refused, with costs.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

DUMBLETON V. DUMBLETON. { 1906.
Aug. 22nd.

This was an action for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce.

Mr. Lewis was for the plaintiff, and the defendant was in default.

Evidence was called for the plaintiff. Arthur R. Dumbleton said he was married to the defendant in New Zealand in 1885. He lived happily after his marriage until about 1896, and then there was trouble through the defendant's misconduct. He condoned his wife, and in July, 1900, the defendant left him again, and a deed of separation was drawn up. He vested all his property in his wife, for her benefit and that of the children.

Hopley, J., ordered the matter to be postponed sine die, awaiting the production of the certificate of marriage and the deed of separation.

INSOLVENT ESTATE ALLY V. ISMAIL.

This was an action to recover £747, the price of stock sold and delivered.

The plaintiff's declaration was as follows:

1. The plaintiff is the trustee in the insolvent estate of Carriem Ally, a general dealer, in Cape Town.

2. The estate of the said Ally was duly placed under sequestration as insolvent on the 17th April, 1906, and the plaintiff was thereafter duly elected as trustee thereof, which election was confirmed on the 11th May, 1906.

3. In or about December, 1905, an arrangement was entered into between the said Ally and the defendant, whereby it was arranged that the former should proceed to various country towns in this colony in order to select sheep for purchase on behalf of the defendant, the terms of the arrangement being that the said Ally should from time to time notify the defendant when he found sheep suitable for such purchase; whereupon, if the defendant approved of the proposed purchase, the said Ally was to buy the sheep at a price to be fixed by the defendant, and the defendant was then to give the said Ally the money wherewith to settle the said purchase price, and also pay his travelling and other expenses in connection with such purchase as well as a commission (according to the condition of the sheep purchased) for his services in the matter.

4. Thereafter, still in December, 1905, in pursuance of the said agreement, the said Ally proceeded to various towns, and concluded purchases of sheep, and the defendant paid the said Ally the purchase price, and also a commission and his expenses.

5. On or about the 8th day of January, 1906, the said Ally, in pursuance of the said agreement, purchased 200 sheep from one Olivier at Tulbagh, on behalf of the defendant, who took the sheep over from the said Ally at the price arranged with the said Olivier, viz., £195, and agreed to give him £5 as commission on the purchase. The defendant, however, has not yet paid anything in respect of this purchase, and owes the sum of £200 therein.

6. On or about the 23rd January, 1906, the said Ally in pursuance of the said agreement purchased 391 sheep from one Snyman at Ceres for £381 4s. 6d., which sheep the defendant took over for £391 from the said Ally, the extra £9 15s. 6d. representing the commission agreed upon. The defendant paid the said Ally the sum of £330 in all in respect of this transaction, and still owes the said estate the sum of £51 thereon.

7. On the 7th February, 1906, the said Ally, in terms of his said agreement, purchased another 432 sheep from the said Snyman for the sum of £475 4s. The defendant took over the said sheep from the said Ally at the same price, and agreed to pay him a commission on this purchase of £10 16s. The defendant still owes the whole sum of £486 in respect of this transaction.

8. The defendant neglects and refuses to pay the said amounts due by him or any of them or any part of them and the plaintiff as representing the estate of the said Ally, is entitled to recover the said sums from the defendant.

The plaintiff claims: (a) Payment of the aforesaid sums of £200, £51, and £486—in all, £747; (b) interest thereon a tempore morae; (c) alternative relief; (d) costs of suit.

The defendant's plea was as follows:

For a plea to plaintiff's declaration defendant says:

1. He admits paragraphs 1 and 2.

2. He denies paragraph 3. He at no time authorised Ally to purchase sheep on his behalf.

3. He denies paragraph 4. He at no time paid Ally moneys for purchase of sheep on his (defendant's) account, or any commission or expenses in connection with any such purchases, but he did from time to time during the months of January and February, 1906, purchase from Ally direct at Maitland a number of sheep to the value of £238 in all, which sum he duly paid to Ally.

4. Defendant says that he has no knowledge of the purchase in paragraphs 5 and 6 set forth. He denies generally the allegations in the said paragraphs, specially denying that he at any time authorised Ally to make the said purchases or any such purchases on his behalf, or that he paid the said Ally £330 in respect of the transaction in paragraph 6 set out, or that he is or was at any time indebted to Ally in any sum in respect of any such transactions.

5. With reference to paragraph 7 of the declaration, defendant says that he and one Abbas, also a butcher, agreed to purchase jointly from Ally direct at £1 per head a number of sheep which Ally had previously pointed out to defendant at Ceres, and represented that he was able to obtain. The said sheep were subsequently consigned to plaintiff and Abbas on an order from them, but they declined to accept the same, in consequence, inter alia, of Ally wanting 21s. 6d. per head and the amount of carriage. The sale was thereupon cancelled by mutual agreement, the sheep were taken possession of by Ally (plaintiff and Abbas signing the consignment-note to enable him to take delivery) and thereafter disposed of by him to various purchasers on his own account. Defendant at no time authorised Ally to purchase the said sheep on his behalf, at no time took possession of the said sheep, and at no time received any part of the proceeds thereof. Subject to the foregoing, he denies the allegations in paragraph 7.

6. Defendant admits that he refuses to pay the sums of £200, £61, and £486, but otherwise denies the allegations in paragraph 8.

Wherefore he prays that plaintiff's claim may be dismissed with costs.

Mr. Burton (with him Dr. Greer) for plaintiff. Mr. Bisset (with him Mr. Alexander) for defendant.

C. P. Snyman, farmer, of Ceres, stated he knew both Ally and Ismail. He had known them in connection with the purchase of sheep. The price which was fixed Ismail knew on both occasions.

C. H. Snyman, brother of the last witness, stated that in bargaining for the sheep Ismail took a part. Ally paid the money. The documents were signed in witness's house. Ismail figured out the account. He corroborated the last witness as to the conversation with Ismail.

Cross-examined by Mr. Alexander: Ally was the man who always spoke, but he would do nothing without consulting Ismail. He could not understand the conversation between Ally and Ismail, as they were talking in their own language. He could not say whether or not Ismail was the principal in the transaction. Witness thought that Ismail was a partner, yet he did not take the trouble to have his name on the paper. He had never demanded the money from Ally.

Re-examined by Mr. Burton: The signature, "C. Ally," he took to mean as representing the business.

A. Olivier, a butcher, of Tulbagh, stated he had transactions in sheep with both Ally and Ismail. He met the pair of them on one occasion, when Ally said he could speak Dutch. Witness asked Ismail if he could speak Dutch, and he smiled. The sheep were sold to the pair of them for 19s. 6d., and promissory notes were made out to pay the whole amount for two hundred sheep. Witness had received nothing out of the transaction.

Cross-examined by Mr. Bisset: He believed that when Ally was speaking to Ismail that he was asking him what price he should offer for the sheep. Witness looked upon both of them as buyers.

The defendant, in his evidence, said he did not tell the witness Snyman that he and Ally would take the sheep. Witness did not tell Snyman to see that he (Snyman) got the money for the sheep. The transaction witness had was solely with Ally.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: He told Mr. Olivier that he could speak Dutch. Witness did not pay Ally's expenses on every occasion when he went in search of sheep. He had nothing whatever to do with any farmer. Witness only dealt with Ally. Snyman sold the sheep to Ally for £1 2s. each, and Ally sold them to witness for £1 each. Witness would swear positively that he did not know what Ally paid for the sheep. When the sheep arrived at Maitland, Ally demanded from witness £1 1s. 6d. each and the carriage, and the sale fell through. The evidence that he handed over £395 to Ally for the purchase of the sheep was false. Ally never got anything for commission.

Alfred Marchent, railway foreman at Maitland, stated that in his capacity as foreman he delivered from time to time consignments of sheep to the consignees. He remembered a consignment of 341 sheep coming to Maitland which was signed for by Kahn. Ally was not there at the time. On a subsequent occasion witness gave delivery of 436 sheep to Ally.

Mahomed Ebrahim, butcher, of Cape Town, stated that he remembered the consignment of over 400 sheep arriving at Maitland. Witness bought some of the sheep from Ally at £1 2s. 6d. each.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: He paid for the 100 sheep in gold and silver, and got no receipt. Indians, as a rule, did not trouble about receipts. Witness disposed of 200 sheep a month at his shop in Sir Lowry-road. There were a lot of Indians in Cape Town with the same name as witness.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

Hopley, J.: This case has been very ably argued by Mr. Bisset. I do not think he has missed a single point that could have been made for his client, but his arguments do not convince me that this case is misconceived in its form, or that I should refuse the plaintiff the relief now prayed for. It is a case which has given me a great deal of trouble, because it is a case I have had to listen to very carefully, and because I must admit the case, to a certain extent, rests upon suspicion of such a nature that I cannot get over it in my own mind. As to the form of the action, it is said that the evidence shows that Ally did act as disclosed principal of Ismail. In answer to that, I would say, though Ismail was present, there was nothing in what happened to disclose him as the actual principal. He was there, and he was the principal if he bought. He was the principal, but the undisclosed principal, who allowed the agent to take upon himself the responsibility which the agent did. He had undertaken all the responsibility, making himself the debtor, without mentioning his principals in any documents. That would make the agent the liable man, but it would not estop him or his estate thereafter from claiming against the principal for any contracts which were thus made for him, through his agent, or adopted, as he had seen them made, by his agent. I do not think I need trouble about the method of adopting the contract, because, as a matter of fact, the principal was present only as an undisclosed principal. The contract was made for him by the agent, and eventually now the agent comes and says that the principal has to pay him. It is a question of credibility between these two men as to what took place, and their evidence must be weighed by the other evidence brought into the action. His lordship, after reviewing the evidence, said he believed in the main Ally's statement, and there would be judgment for the plaintiff as prayed for, £747, including commission, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

BECKER AND OTHERS V. { 1906.
WOLFAARD. { Aug. 23rd.

Security—Heirs—Legacy of farm on condition that a sum of money be paid by legatees for the benefit of the heirs.

By the mutual will of the second plaintiff and his wife, a farm was bequeathed to the defendant on condition that the survivor should enjoy the usufruct and that on his or her death the defendant should pay into the joint estate the sum of £700 for the benefit of the heirs. His wife died first, and the defendant induced his father, the second plaintiff, to sell his usufruct and pass transfer of the land, as executor, to the defendant.

Held, that the first and third plaintiffs, who represented the heirs, were entitled to demand that security be given to the second plaintiff, as executor, for the due payment on the death of the second plaintiff of the sum of £700, less such sum as was owing by the joint estate to the defendant at the time of the death of the testatrix.

This was an action brought by (1) Jan Abraham Becker; (2) Jacobus Albertus Wolfaard, in his capacity as executor testamentary of the estate of his late spouse, Cornelia Christina Wolfaard, born Van Zyl; and (3) Zachary Gertruida Wolfaard, born Nel, widow of the late Petrus Hendrik Wolfaard, in her capacity as the mother and natural guardian of her minor children, Jacobus Albertus Wolfaard, and Johannes Petrus Wolfaard, against Guillaume Jacobus Johannes Wolfaardt.

The declaration was as follows:

1. The first plaintiff is a farmer residing at Elansvley, in the district of Ladismith; the second plaintiff is a farmer residing at Elansvley aforesaid, who sues in his capacity as executor testamentary of the estate of his late spouse, Cornelius Christina Wolfaard, born Van Zyl; and the third plaintiff is a widow residing at Cape Town, who sues in her capacity as the mother and natural guardian of her minor children, Jacobus Albertus Wolfaard and Johannes Petrus Wolfaard, by her marriage with the late Petrus Hendrik Wolfaard, of Elandsley aforesaid.

2. The defendant is a farmer residing at Elandsley, in the said district of Ladismith.

3. By the last will of the said Jacobus Albertus Wolfaard and his wife, Cornelia Christina Wolfaard (one of whose children was the said late Petrus Hendrik Wolfaard), the testators, who were married in community of property, after appointing the survivor with their children the joint heirs of their estates, bequeathing to their sons Guillaume Johannes Jacobus Wolfaard (the defendant) and Frederick Johannes Wolfaard, certain two pieces of redeemed quitrent land situate in the division of Ladismith, being the lots No. 4 and 18 of the said divided farm Elandsley, measuring respectively 114 morgen 448 square roods and 39 morgen 45 square roods, for the sum of £1,400, subject to the following conditions, viz., that the survivor of them should retain a life interest in the said properties, and that the same should not devolve upon the said sons until after the death of the survivor, when the said sum of £1,400 should be paid into the joint estate of the testators. The plaintiffs crave leave to refer to the terms of the said will in full when produced at the trial.

4. The said Cornelia Christina Wolfaard died on or about the 22nd January, 1900, leaving her husband and her said two sons, Guillaume Johannes Jacobus and Frederick Johannes, her surviving, and leaving the said mutual will of full force and effect. The said son, Petrus Hendrik Wolfaard, had predeceased the testatrix, and his children were specially appointed in the said will as heirs in his stead.

5. In or about June, 1900, the said Frederick Johannes Wolfaard, surrendered his estate as insolvent, and thereafter the trustees in the said estate sold to the first plaintiff the said Frederick Johannes Wolfaard's right to take over the one-half share in the properties aforesaid, as well as all the insolvent's right and title to any inheritance coming to him as one of the residuary heirs in the joint estate of the testators.

6. Transfer of the said half-share in the said properties has been duly passed to the first plaintiff, and the purchase money due in respect thereof secured to the heirs of the said joint estate by a mortgage bond in favour of the estate payable after the death of the survivor.

7. On or about the 25th November, 1904, transfer of the other half-share of the said properties was passed by the survivor, the said Jacobus Albertus Wolfaard, senior, who was also executor under the said will, to the defendant, who simultaneously with the passing of the said transfer, and shortly afterwards encumbered the said half-share by mortgages to the extent of £800.

8. The defendant has not either paid into the joint estate in terms of the said will, the purchase money (£700) of the land so transferred to him, nor has he given any valid or sufficient security that the same will be duly paid when it falls due.

Plaintiffs claim: (a) That the defendant may be ordered either to pay the sum of £700 into the hands of the Master of this Honourable Court, to be administered by him during the lifetime of the said survivor, or else to give good and sufficient security for the due payment of the said purchase money to the said estate when the same becomes payable; (b) alternative relief; (c) costs of suit.

The defendant's plea was as follows: For a plea to the plaintiffs' summons (standing by order of Court as the declaration in this suit), the defendant says:

1. His correct name is Guillaume Jacobus Johannes Wolfaard.

2. He admits paragraphs 1, 2, 4, 5, and 6, and says, as to paragraph 6, that the transfer therein referred to was passed to the first plaintiff in or about December, 1905.

3. As to paragraph 3, the defendant admits that Petrus Hendrik Wolfaard was a son of the testators. He admits the execution and validity of the will therein referred to, but, as to the true terms of the said will, defendant craves leave to refer to the will when produced at the trial hereof, and he does not otherwise admit paragraph 3.

4. As to paragraphs 7 and 8, the defendant says that, prior to the passing of transfer to him in November, 1904, by the executor in the estate of the late Cornelia Christina Wolfaard and the second plaintiff, the said estate had become indebted to him in a large sum of money. On the 1st November, 1899, the said estate was indebted to him in the sum of £380 3s. 9d., as shown in the account hereto annexed marked A.

5. The sums of £600 and £30 10s. referred to in annexure A were on the 1st November, 1899, advanced by the defendant, to and for the benefit of the joint estate, of which the second plaintiff is the executor, to pay off a certain bond (with interest), held by one Maskew over the property of the estate. The said moneys were so advanced at the special instance and request of the said second plaintiff, who agreed to pay interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, as from the 1st November, 1899.

The sum of £40 represents moneys paid by defendant for and on behalf of, and at the request of the second plaintiff, in connection with the erection of a millwheel belonging to the said joint estate, in September, 1895, and includes charges for the said millwheel.

6. The defendant was indebted to the second plaintiff on the 1st November, 1899, in the sum of £290 6s. 3d. for amounts previously advanced by the second plaintiff, as shown in detail on the said annexure A, leaving the balance of £380 3s. 9d. aforesaid.

7. Prior to the 21st March, 1904, the second plaintiff agreed to waive his right to the usufruct of the land now in suit, and to pass clean transfer to the defendant. The second plaintiff, on behalf of the estate, acknowledged that the bequest price was (as in fact it had been) settled with him in account, the defendant being willing to forego his claim against the estate to so much of his share in the estate residue as was required to liquidate the balance left after deducting the amount of the estate's indebtedness to defendant from the bequest price of £700.

8. The Registrar of Deeds thereafter at first refused to pass transfer, but the second plaintiff signed the statement, copy of which is hereunto annexed, marked B, as showing the position in account between the defendant and the estate. The Registrar thereupon passed clean transfer as aforesaid.

9. The defendant craves leave to refer to the acknowledgment by the second plaintiff in the said annexure B, that the bequest price had been settled in account; the defendant says that by reason of the premises the second plaintiff is estopped from making the claims set forth in the summons (standing as declaration).

10. There are seven heirs who have vested in them the right to an equal share each in the residue of the joint estate. The defendant contends that in any case his own share in the said £700, to wit £100, must be taken in account, and that he is not at the suit of the plaintiffs, other than the second plaintiff, bound to find security to pay over such share, to wit £100, while as to the second plaintiff, he is estopped, as aforesaid, from making claim in respect of the said £100 or otherwise.

11. The state of accounts as between the estate and defendant on the 25th November, 1904, is correctly shown in the account hereto attached marked C, which shows a balance in defendant's favour, after taking into account the bequest price of £700, and the sum of £240 (as being 1-7 heir's share now vested in defendant). The first sum of £9 2s. 6d. shown in annexure C represents the share in the inheritance awarded on the liquidation and distribution account and paid by defendant at the request of the second plaintiff to the first plaintiff (to whom it was due); the second sum of £9 2s. 6d. represents an amount paid, at the special instance and request of the second plaintiff, to the minor children of the third plaintiff, the other sum of £9 2s. 6d. represents the similar share due to defendant under the said account, and not otherwise paid or settled save as aforesaid in annexure B set forth.

12. Subject to the above, the defendant admits paragraph 7 and denies paragraph 8, and says that he is not liable to pay the sum of £700 or to find security therefor.

13. Alternatively the defendant says that by set-off against the bequest price (£700) of the amounts due to him by the estate, as aforesaid, including interest to date of summons, there is a balance due to defendant by the estate as aforesaid. Wherefore defendant prays that the plaintiff's claim may be dismissed with costs.

And for a claim in reconvention as against the said plaintiff in convention, in his aforesaid capacity (should this honourable Court decide against the contentions of the defendant as aforesaid, but not otherwise) the defendant (now plaintiff) says:

14. He craves leave to refer to the aforesaid.

15. The estate of which the defendant in reconvention is executor is indebted to the plaintiff (in reconvention) in the sums of (a) £380 3s. 9d., as aforesaid, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum thereon from 1st November, 1899 to date of payment; (b) £9 2s. 6d. paid by plaintiff (in reconvention) on behalf of defendant (in reconvention) to the first plaintiff (in convention) as aforesaid; (c) £9 2s. 6d. paid as aforesaid to the minor children of the third plaintiff (in convention), and, (d) £9 2s. 6d. being the share of the plaintiff (in reconvention) as awarded to the heirs on the liquidation and distribution account, as aforesaid.

16. All things have happened, all times have elapsed, and all conditions have been fulfilled necessary to entitle the plaintiff (in reconvention) to claim from the defendant (in reconvention) in his aforesaid capacity, the sum of £380 3s. 9d., with interest as aforesaid, and the three sums of £9 2s. 6d., as aforesaid, but the defendant has failed and neglected to pay the same or any part thereof.

Wherefore plaintiff (in reconvention) claims: (a) Judgment for the sum of £380 3s. 9d., with interest at 6 per cent. per annum from 1st November, 1899, as aforesaid; (b) judgment for the three sums of £9 2s. 6d. as aforesaid; (c) alternative relief, and (d) costs of suit.

Plaintiffs' replication was as follows:

1. As to paragraphs 4, 5, 6, and 11 of the plea, the plaintiffs admit that prior to the death of the said Cornelia Christina Wolfhard the defendant had made certain advances for the benefit of the said joint estate, but they say that at divers times payments were made to the defendant by or on behalf of the said estate, and they deny the correctness of the accounts annexed to the plea.

2. The plaintiffs crave leave to refer this Honourable Court to the liquidation and distribution account of the movables in the estate of the said late C. C. Wolfaard, dated the 3rd of November, 1903, from which it will appear that there was a settlement of accounts between the defendant and the said estate at the said date. Copy of the said account is hereunto annexed marked "D."

3. They say, moreover, that the defendant, in or about 1903, obtained possession, from the second plaintiff, of certain promissory notes owing by certain of the heirs to the said estate and representing debts to the value of about £545 (which said debts figure on the credit side of the said liquidation and distribution account). The defendant has retained possession of the said promissory notes and refuses to restore the same to the second plaintiff, and the plaintiffs say that, even if there was at the time of the framing of the said account any sum owing to the defendant by the said estate, such sum was more than covered and secured by the said notes.

4. As to paragraphs 7, 8, and 9, of the plea, the plaintiffs admit that the second plaintiff signed the statement therein referred to, but they say that while he so signed it, he was an aged man, being then upwards of eighty years old, infirm in mind, and incapable of transacting business, that he acted therein under the influence and at the instigation of the defendant, who then and for some time previously had assumed control of the said estate; that the second plaintiff when he so signed the said statement, did not understand the import of the same and acted bona fide upon representations made to him by or on behalf of the defendant that the said statement was in order whereas the said statement was and is in fact erroneous and misleading, to the prejudice of the said estate and the heirs thereof.

5. The plaintiffs admit that the second plaintiff agreed to waive his right to the usufruct of the said land and to pass transfer thereof to the defendant. They also admit that the Registrar of Deeds passed such transfer as stated in the declaration.

6. As to paragraph 10 they admit that there are seven heirs who have vested in them the right to an equal share each in the residue of the joint estate.

7. Save as aforesaid, and save as to admissions contained in the plea, the plaintiffs join issue with the defendant thereon and again pray for judgment in terms of the declaration, with costs.

The plea of the second plaintiff to the claim in reconvention denied the allegations set forth in the claim in reconvention.

Mr. Van Zyl for plaintiffs; Mr. Close (with him Mr. Roux) for defendant.

R. D. Steyn, record clerk in the Master's Office, produced the last will of the Wolfaards, and the liquidation and distribution account and inventory in the estate of Mrs. Wolfaard.

Jan Abraham Becker said he was a law agent, carrying on business at Ladismith. Witness acted for defendant's father after the death of his wife. It was not until after the expiration of a year, and after the usual notice from the Master calling upon him to file an account, that Mr. Wolfaardt filed an inventory. Witness believed defendant drew this up. The bequest price of the landed property (£1,700) was put down in the inventory, and the movable property at £135. Liabilities were brought up. A considerable amount owing to the estate by some of the heirs on promissory notes was not brought up in the inventory. One of the heirs becoming insolvent, his expectancy was sold, and witness's son bought the heir's interest. In 1903 witness ascertained that no account had been filed with the Master, who was not aware that there were these promissory notes, and understood that the liabilities exceeded the assets. Defendant said the promissory notes had nothing to do with the estate, as the heirs could not pay. Witness pointed out that they had expectancies. Witness returned the promissory notes, but kept notarial copies. Witness made a draft account, and sent it to the Master's office, showing the amount of the promissory notes, plus interest. An amount of £32 11s. 3d. was shown as left for distribution amongst the heirs. Witness received the share of his son. The promissory notes were good, and could have been realised. Witness would have been prepared, and was now prepared, to take a cession of the notes. The expectancies of the heirs after the death of the survivor more than covered their respective liabilities. The witness went in detail through the accounts and transactions with defendant. He had paid various amounts on behalf of defendant, totalling £193 9s. 3d. There was a promissory note of £100 and other obligations, which left a balance due to defendant at the time of his mother's death of £302 19s. 3d. Witness signed the vouchers in the estate on the understanding that defendant had taken over the promissory notes in the estate, and that in that manner the defendant's claim on the estate had been satisfied.

Mr. Close said the defendant's position was that the promissory notes were still in the estate. Defendant's contention was that the promissory notes were a wholly independent matter. The defendant would be prepared to render up the promissory notes if the Court thought they should be handed over.

Witness, in answer to the Court, said he would accept the promissory note as security. The only amount for which security had not been given was the £700 owing by the defendant.

In cross-examination, witness said that he had complained about the way the executor administered the estate. Witness was suspicious that the promissory notes would never be accounted for when they were taken from him in 1903. When the notes were taken away, the defendant's father said defendant would settle the matter himself. Witness produced to the Master the notarial copies of the promissory notes, which, together with the interest, amounted to over £1,000. Witness was not aware that some of the notes were for moneys advanced in 1867, and that it was because of an arrangement that the notes should be brought into collation that the notes were not included in the liquidation account.

Further evidence was given in support of the allegations in the declaration.

Mr. Van Zyl closed his case.

The defendant said that the debt to him was in no way settled by the promissory notes. Witness paid off a bond by Maskew. His father was satisfied with what witness had done to discharge his obligation, and signed a document to that effect, and agreeing to give witness transfer of the property. Witness agreed to let his father have the interest on a bond on the property purchased by a Mr. Botha. Botha paid a year's interest, but subsequently went insolvent, and witness agreed to give his father a third of the profits on the farm. His father was quite satisfied with the arrangement which had been made. The estate still owed him money. Witness, when sued for the £700, took up the position that he was entitled to hold the promissory notes as security, as the estate would have owed him the money which he had treated as having been accounted for in the £700. He thought they were suing him for the £700 again.

Cross-examined: The estate was indebted to him, and he held the notes as security. It was not the case, as stated by him in an affidavit, that he took the notes as security. He did not understand that he was saying that in the affidavit. When he was given the promissory notes, he did not regard that as a squaring off of the indebtedness of the estate to him.

De Villiers, C.J., said that he had read the evidence of the testator given on commission, and that he would like to hear Mr. Close.

Mr. Close said that the plaintiffs had misconceived their action. They should have taken proceedings to have the statement by the executor, acknowledging the estate's indebtedness to defendant, set aside. They did not now sue for restitution in integrum. The executor could not now impugn the transfer, which was a quasi-judicial act, passed coram lege loci, nor could the first plaintiff impugn it, as he knew all along what was going on. They did not ask to have the document set aside, because they did not wish to allege fraud.

After further argument and after having heard Mr. Van Zyl on the question of interest and costs, De Villiers, C.J., said that there was an amount owing to the defendant in connection with the mother's estate of £302, and if the notes were given up as security against the £700 from the father's estate, that £302 would have to be paid to the defendant.

Mr. Van Zyl said that the defendant had himself chosen to retain the notes, and he had prevented them from being realised.

The Court ordered that the defendant pass a bond for the sum of £460 without interest on the land to secure payment of the sum payable by him to the estate of his parents on the death of his father, and interdicted defendant from parting with or mortgaging the said land until such bond shall have been passed, the said sum of £460, to be reduced to £38 if the defendant forthwith hand over to the second plaintiff as executor the promissory notes. Judgment was given for defendant (plaintiff in reconvention) on the claim in reconvention against the second plaintiff for £422, with interest a tempore morae on condition that the defendant forthwith deliver the promissory note to the second plaintiff and on the further condition that the £422 and interest shall not be paid to the defendant until the death of his father, but shall be held by the second plaintiff as security for the sum payable by defendant to the estate of his parents on the death of his father.

His Lordship intimated that he would consider the question of costs to-morrow.

Postea (August 24th).

De Villiers, C.J., intimated that he had considered the question of costs in this case, and he had come to the conclusion that defendant should pay the costs. As he originally stated, defendant had absolutely refused to give security when asked, and he had never tendered delivery of the promissory notes. It was absolutely necessary therefore, that the plaintiffs should come into court for the purpose of asserting their rights. His lordship also gave directions as to the payment of £38 into the Master's Fund in case the defendant delivered the promissory notes.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

COOPER AND CO. V. LEVISON { 1906.
AND CO. { Aug. 23rd.

Mr. Payne moved for a provisional order of sequestration to be superseded. Provisional order superseded.

ROOD, PEMBERTON AND CO. V. PYWELL.

Mr. Inchbold moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £35 9s. 7d., with interest and costs. Order granted.

GOURLAY, CAVANAGH AND CO. AND OTHERS V. BROWNE.

Mr. Benjamin (with him Mr. Swift) moved for the provisional order of sequestration of the defendant's estate to be made final. Counsel stated that the petitioning creditors represented claims to the amount of £116 5s. His liabilities exceeded his assets.

Defendant read an affidavit, stating that his liabilities were not, as alleged, in excess of his assets. On the contrary, his assets were in excess of his liabilities. The present proceedings had been brought in breach of an agreement Mr. Cavanagh and others had entered into with him, and were really attributable to the fact that he had withdrawn his work from a certain firm of attorneys in the city. Defendant, it seemed, had been proprietor of the International Hotel, Durbanville.

Mr. Swift read a replying affidavit by W. S. C. Harsant, of Harsant and Harsant, attorneys, Cape Town, who said that, as far as he was aware, there was no agreement between Browne and the petitioners whereby they undertook to wait until such time as he received the money due to him from one George Nettleship. Mr. Harsant entered at some length into the relationships of his firm with the defendant. Mr. Swift also read an affidavit by Mr. Gourlay, of Gourlay, Cavanagh, and Co., and Harry Hands, of Cape Town.

Mr. Benjamin submitted that defendant was clearly insolvent.

Defendant again stated his position at some length, and claimed that his estate should not be finally sequestrated.

Buchanan, J.: In this case Gourlay, Cavanagh and Co. are creditors in respect of a promissory note not yet due for £50. It is admitted that the promissory note is not yet due, but the section of the Act 38 of 1884, under which the proceedings are brought, states that a debt need not be due, it may be a future debt, which would entitle the petitioner to petition the Court. Therefore, the fact that the promissory note is not yet due cannot be relied upon as an objection in this case. The next requirement of the Act is that the petitioner must show that the debtor is insolvent. The grounds set forth in the petition are not correct, but from the statement now made in Court by the respondent it is clear that his assets are not sufficient to pay his liabilities. The deficiency is not very large. I would warn attorneys that when they come before the Court they must strictly comply with the Ordinance. The provisional order will be made final.

DONNELLAN V. FORD.

Mr. Lewis moved for a provisional order of sequestration to be made final. Final order granted.

MALLET AND CO. V. EAST LONDON DAILY NEWS PRINTING AND PUBLISHING CO., LTD.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan moved for judgment, under Rule 319, in default of plea, for £338 18s. 1d., with interest a tempore morae and costs.

Mr. Benjamin (for respondents) said that he consented to judgment, but wished to apply for a stay of execution.

Judgment granted.

Mr. Benjamin then applied for a stay of execution for a period of six weeks, and read an affidavit by Mr. Walker, of Walker and Jacobsohn, applicants' attorneys, who called the Court's attention to the recent application made by the East London Daily News Co., in consequence of which the Court had granted a stay of execution for six weeks, in regard to the judgment obtained by Messrs. Wiener and Co.

Mr. Buchanan read an affidavit by the present respondents' attorneys, who opposed the application for a stay of execution, stating that they had received instructions from East London to push on the matter, and that no security had been offered by the applicants.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

Buchanan, J.: There has been a previous judgment against the present defendant, and in that case the Court has already stayed execution of the writ for six weeks. It appears that the defendants carry on a large business, that it is a going concern, and that they have a very substantial surplus of assets over liabilities. Under these circumstances, I think it would be only fair in this case to follow the order in the other case. Execution stayed for six weeks from the 17th inst., provided no other creditors take out a writ against the defendants. Should any such writ be issued, this order to lapse. Leave also reserved to respondents to move to set this order aside should their interests be prejudiced.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

BRIGHT V. THOMPSON. { 1906.
 { Aug. 23rd.

Dr. Rainsford moved upon notice to respondent to show cause why an order for personal attachment should not be granted against him for contempt of Court by reason of his non-compliance with an order made on the 2nd August to restore and deliver to applicant scrip of certain 200 fully-paid shares in the Saldhana Bay Harbour and Estates, Ltd.

Writ of attachment granted, returnable on the 30th August, with leave to respondent to apply at any previous time to set aside the judgment.

FINLAYSON V. FINLAYSON.

This was an application for stay of certain action instituted by respondent (the husband) against applicant (Katherine Finlayson) for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce, custody of the child, and forfeiture of the benefits of community. Applicant also applied for removal of bar and an order upon respondent to pay to her a sum sufficient to enable her to defend the action.

From the affidavits it appeared that there had been proceedings, between the parties so long ago as 1902 (12 C.T.R., 598, 789), when applicant was proposing to sue her husband for judicial separation on the ground of his cruelty and drunkenness. This action, she said, she could not bring, because her husband failed to provide her with funds. She was now willing to consent to a divorce, but she claimed to be entitled to continue to have custody of the child, and said that she intended to ask the Court for custody.

It was stated that applicant was a professional nurse, and that her husband was living in Oudtshoorn. The divorce case had been set down for hearing to-morrow.

Mr. Upington was for applicant; Mr. Benjamin was for respondent.

Mr. Upington said that there had been absolute non-compliance by Finlayson with the previous order of Court, except in so far as the return of the child to Mrs. Finlayson was concerned. He submitted that before Finlayson was allowed to go on with this action he should pay the costs of the previous proceedings.

Mr. Benjamin said that if the facts now laid before the Court had been known to the Court on the previous occasion, no such order would have been made. It was unfortunate that respondent, through ignorance, did not then appear. The applicant was earning twelve guineas a month, and she had been in a position to bring an action. The respondent appeared to be acting perfectly bona fide in this matter.

Mr. Upington said that Finlayson actually did appear during the proceedings in 1902, so that his learned friend was not strictly correct.

Mr. Benjamin said he was referring to the first proceedings.

Mr. Upington said that the respondent appeared by counsel when the writ of attachment was applied for.

Buchanan, J.: The wife, who has been barred, will have leave now granted to her to plead, and she must file her plea forthwith and go to trial on the 3rd September. As plaintiff had previously been ordered to pay £10 to defendants' attorneys to enable the wife to put her case before the Court, that order will now be renewed. This money must be paid before the 1st September. If he fails to make this payment, the hearing of this action will be stayed, question of costs to stand over until the trial.

Mr. Upington said that he was afraid it was impossible to file plea forthwith.

Buchanan, J., said that reasonable time would be allowed to defendant to file her plea.

Petitioners also applied for leave to sue by edictal citation.

Leave granted to attach property of respondents ad fundandam jurisdictionem, and to sue by edictal citation, citation to be returnable in the 1st November, personal service to be effected.

In re ESTATE VENTER.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan said that this was the return day of certain lunacy proceedings. A telegram had, however, been received on Tuesday last to the effect that the lunatic had died. He therefore asked that the costs so far incurred might be costs in the estate. Counsel (at the request of his lordship) read the report which had been furnished to the Court by the Magistrate as to a visit he had paid to the lunatic when the preliminary order was granted.

Buchanan, J., said that the proceedings had apparently been justified by Mr. Venter's condition, and the costs would, therefore, come out of the estate.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

SACCO, LTD. V. GILCHRIST & 1906.
AND POWELL, LTD. { Ang. 24th.

This was an application upon notice to respondents to show cause why they should not pay, on behalf of applicant, to Harry Gibson, as trustee of the insolvent estate of Charles Henry Stevens: (a) £250 as salary due to the said Stevens by the applicant; (b) £38 2s. 6d., cash lent and advanced by Stevens to applicant; and (c) costs and charges of Alexander John MacCallum, the attorney acting for the trustee, in and about the issue of a summons for payment of these said claims, the said claims being lawfully due by applicant to the said trustee, and payable by respondents in terms of a certain written agreement made and entered into by applicant and respondent on the 19th January last.

Mr. Benjamin was for applicant; Mr. W. Porter Buchanan was for respondents.

Mr. Benjamin said that, after the affidavits that had been filed, he did not think that this was a matter which the Court could decide upon motion. The matter should really be decided by way of action, and he would therefore ask that the notice of motion should stand in lieu of summons, costs to abide the result of the action.

Mr. Buchanan said he agreed that the matter should be decided by action, but he thought that the applicant should pay wasted costs.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I am not inclined to let costs abide the result, but to leave it open to discuss the whole question afterwards.]

Mr. Buchanan said that that would meet his views.

Applicant was ordered to proceed by action, notice of motion to stand in lieu of summons, and question of costs to stand over.

Ex parte ESTATE STOCKHAM.

This was an application for an order confirming certain action of executors, and authorising them to conclude certain articles of partnership, and sign them on behalf of the estate of the late Horatio Wm. Stockham, or, in the alternative, for the appointment of a curator ad litem to represent the minor heirs.

Mr. Russell was for petitioners; Mr. W. Porter Buchanan appeared for Tom Loveridge Stockham, son of the deceased.

From the affidavits it appeared that the applicants were one of the executors and the agent of one of the executors under the will of the late H. W. Stockham, who died in England on the 18th February last. Mr. Stockham had carried on business in partnership with Mr. F. Hurst at the Grand Parade Restaurant, Cape Town, but had resided in England since 1901, paying occasional visits to the Cape. Mr. Stockham had left two minor heirs.

Petitioners said that at the death of Mr. Stockham the said Hurst was to continue the business, but the said Hurst had declined to pay for any goodwill, and the matter was further complicated by the fact that Stockham's partnership did not cover the entire period of the lease. The widow of Mr. Stockham desired to continue the business so as to ensure a steady income for the maintenance and support of herself and the children. It would be in the interests of herself and to the benefit of the heirs that the business carried on by deceased, in partnership with Mr. Hurst, should be continued until the expiry of the lease. Petitioners had drafted articles of partnership, leaving blank the amount of capital to be contributed by the estate of Stockham.

Mr. Russell said that his application at the present stage was for the alternative prayer—i.e., the appointment of a curator ad litem. Their submission was that this matter might be decided on motion entirely, but, even so, they thought his lordship might appoint a curator ad litem as the interests of minors were concerned.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It seems to be a pure question of law arising out of the will.]

Mr. Russell: And out of the documents.

Mr. Buchanan said he thought it would be satisfactory to all parties to have the matter determined upon motion, without having further expense.

Mr. Russell said that he should like the Court first to appoint a curator to represent the minors.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The interests of the minors would be the same as Mr. Steytler's, wouldn't they?]

Mr. Russell: Mr. Steytler was not the guardian; he is one of the executors. He represents both the minors and the survivor, and the survivor's interests might possibly be antagonistic to the minors' to a certain extent under the will.

De Villiers, C.J., asked why the matter could not be gone into and disposed of at the present stage.

Mr. Russell said that he was not prepared to argue the matter at present. It would be a question to consider whether the estate capital should be continued in this business or not, and that would largely depend upon whether this was a good business to carry on, and whether it would be to the benefit of the minors that it should be carried on. Therefore, they thought some business man should go into the whole question.

Mr. Buchanan said that their position was that they wanted the draft partnership to go through, but there was a question between the executors and his (counsel's) clients upon the document given by the father to the son, which, they said, was given to the son as portion of his estate. Their contention was that as the partnership came to an end there should be a paper dissolution between Stockham and Hurst, and that of Stockham's portion at the dissolution Tom Loveridge Stockham should get one-half. The executors, on the other hand, contended that he did not get that at all, but it was difficult to tell what it was they said he should get.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Is Hurst willing to continue the partnership?]

Mr. Buchanan: Oh, yes, and he knew of this agreement between Stockham, senior, and Stockham, junior. Counsel added that he did not object to the matter standing over until a curator representing the minors had looked into the question of whether this was a proper investment.

Mr. Russell suggested that Mr. J. E. P. Close should be appointed curator ad litem.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I suppose it is quite possible that the parties may come to some agreement, and that the case may not again come into Court, except to confirm the action of the parties.]

Mr. Russell: Of course, we should like confirmation of the action of the executors in any case in entering into or continuing this partnership on be- confirm the action of the parties.

De Villiers, C.J., said that Mr. Close would be appointed curator ad litem of the minors. He did not think it would be necessary to appoint special attorneys. The same attorneys might appear for both the executors and the minors.

1906.
JOHNSON V. R.M. OF WOOD- { Aug. 24th.
STOCK. { Aug. 25th.
{ Sept. 6th.

Law agent—Attorney—"In practice"—Act 43 of 1885, Sec. 8.

An attorney is "in practice," within the meaning of Sec. 8 of Act 43 of 1885, in any place where he opens an office, even although he does not personally attend at that office, provided that he is always available for consultation when required.

This was an application for an order upon respondent to admit and enrol applicant as an agent of the R.M.'s Court, at Woodstock.

Mr. Molteno (with him Mr. Rowson) was for applicant.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones appeared for the Law Society, and asked for leave to intervene.

Mr. Molteno objected to the Law Society appearing in this matter on the ground that the society had no locus standi. This, he said, was a matter between a person who applied to be enrolled as a law agent and the Magistrate.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Who appears for the Magistrate?]

Mr. Molteno: I believe the Attorney-General does not appear.

Mr. Jones said that the society desired to intervene on the general ground of the interests of the profession. The Magistrate found that there were two attorneys practising at the Woodstock Court.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I do not think the Law Society has sufficient locus standi to appear. It is of direct interest possibly to attorneys practising in Woodstock, but it is not a matter in which the attorneys of the country as a body have an interest. Therefore, the application to intervene cannot be entertained.]

Mr. Molteno proceeded to read the affidavits of applicant (James C. A. Johnson), H. O. Badnall (Acting R.M. of Woodstock), and others, from which it appeared that the Magistrate took up the position that since Woodstock was constituted a separate magisterial district on the 1st January, 1906, there had been not less than two attorneys practising in the Woodstock district. Applicant, however, contended that there were not two attorneys actually practising in the said district. It appeared that he had twice applied for admission, but had been refused on each occasion, and that several other agents (Messrs. Shaw, Smith, and others) had also been refused admission. Counsel submitted that between the 30th June and the 5th July there was only one attorney, Mr. Foley, practising at Woodstock, and cited In re Ash's Estate (6 N.L.R., 243); R. v. Jansen (15 C.T.R., 269); and Voet (19-2-34). The applicant had been wrongfully refused admission as an agent. The Act contemplated that an attorney must be bona fide "in practice" in the district. It would be manifestly unfair if an attorney were allowed to open an office and put a boy there to refer clients to the head office in Cape Town and then pretend that that attorney was "in practice" in that district. The Court, he submitted, would never sanction such a method as that of keeping out enrolled agents.

De Villiers, C.J., said that before he gave judgment he would like to hear the explanation of Mr. McLeod, attorney, in reference to a certain letter which he had written. The Court would be sitting to-morrow (Saturday) morning, and he hoped Mr. McLeod would be in attendance.

Postea (August 25th).

Rufus R. J. McLeod (in answer to his lordship) said that he had been negotiating for some time with a Mr. J. C. Behr to take charge of his office at Woodstock. On the 30th June last Mr. Behr wrote witness a letter accepting his offer (letter put in). Mr. Behr was appointed. He was not an attorney. The office was taken charge of on Monday, the 2nd July. Occupation of the premises was given to witness on the first business day in July. It was a mistake to say that the office was still to let on that day. The man whom witness appointed was to have charge of the office when he (McLeod) was not there. Witness could not explain why a certain date was left blank in a letter that he had written. Behr was always at the office, and he gave advice to clients except in intricate matters, which were referred to witness. Witness considered that he was practising at Woodstock.

Cross-examined by Mr. Molteno: Witness had his head office in Cape Town, but he considered that Woodstock was one of his offices.

De Villiers, C.J., remarked that, had he known the name of the landlord of the office at Woodstock, he would have directed that he should appear and give evidence.

Mr. Molteno having been heard further in argument,

Mr. McLeod was recalled, and in reply to the Court, said that he had practised in the Woodstock Court before the 2nd July, and had had cases in the court.

Mr. Lewis said that he was instructed to apply on behalf of Mr. Foley for leave to intervene, and put his position before the Court, and also bring further evidence before the Court.

[De Villiers, C.J.: How is Mr. Foley interested in the matter?]

Mr. Lewis: He is practising in Woodstock as an attorney.

Mr. Molteno: We do not impugn Mr. Foley's position at all. We have admitted all along that he is practising there.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Well, Mr. Foley, perhaps does not want an interloper. I am afraid that if Mr. Foley comes forward I must hear him. The Law Society had too indirect an interest to be allowed to intervene.]

Mr. Molteno: We submit Mr. Foley is the one bona fide attorney practising there.

De Villiers, C.J., said that he was sorry that there should be this delay and increase of expenses, but he did not see how it could be avoided under the circumstances. The matter must stand over until Thursday next, so that Mr. Foley could present affidavits and the landlord and Mr. Behr could make affidavits in regard to the 2nd July and for any other evidence that might be produced.

Postea (September 6th).

Mr. Molteno said that at the last hearing the Court asked for an affidavit by the landlord with regard to the letting of the office to Mr. Macleod and for an affidavit by Mr. Behr, Mr. Macleod's clerk in charge of the office.

Mr. Lewis read an affidavit by Joseph Cloete Behr, who stated that in June last he was approached by Mr. R. G. R. Macleod, and that on July 2 an office was hired and that he had occupied the office since that date as managing clerk for Mr. Macleod. The affidavit of Mrs. Stead stated that she let an office at Woodstock to Mr. Macleod on July 2 at £2 per month. She considered Mr. Macleod as her tenant from July 1. Further affidavits were read by Cape Town attorneys who stated that they often conducted cases in the Magistrate's Court at Woodstock.

Mr. Molteno said that in view of the affidavits now before the Court he could not contend that the office was not taken on July 2, but it did not affect the argument that an attorney who simply took an office and left an unqualified person in attendance, could not be said to be in practice. An attorney's work was personal, and an attorney could not be said to be in practice at Cape Town and at Woodstock at the same time. Behr, the man engaged, was not qualified in any way, and Macleod could not be said to have been in practice at Woodstock. An Act which imposed disabilities on persons had to be strictly construed.

De Villiers, C.J., said that Section 8 of Act 43 of 1885 enacted that "no person in any district where not less than two attorneys are in practice, shall be admitted and enrolled as an agent in the Court of any Resident Magistrate." It was common cause that on July 2 last Mr. Foley was in practice in the district of Woodstock and the only question was whether there was another attorney in practice there. The evidence adduced at the last hearing left it somewhat in doubt as to whether Mr. Macleod was at that time actually in practice, but the Court was now satisfied on the further affidavits that Mr. Macleod might reasonably be taken to have been in practice in Woodstock. He had on several previous occasions conducted cases in the Resident Magistrate's Court at Woodstock, but it was unnecessary to decide if that was sufficient practice. The Court was satisfied that he practised there on July 2. He had hired a room and left Behr in charge. Behr was not an attorney or an articled clerk, but that was not necessary. The test was whether an attorney was at hand to be consulted when necessary. Woodstock was very near to Cape Town, and he (the Chief Justice) presumed that there was a telephone between the two places, and, in any case, if a telegram was sent by the clerk in charge of the office, the attorney could be there in a very short time. All requirements were complied with if the attorney was within hailing distance of Woodstock. It was perfectly clear that two attorneys were in practice on the day on which the Magistrate refused to enroll the applicant, and the application had to be refused, with costs, including the costs of the intervening attorney Foley. An example should, however, be made of attorneys who did not attend in court when their cases were being dealt with. When certain information (about the service of affidavits) was required, Mr. Foley's attorney was not in court, and the costs would therefore not include the attendance charges of the attorney. Attorneys should be in court if they charged for appearance.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

Ex parte BURGDOFF AND CO. { 1906.
Aug. 24th.

Mr. Pohl moved for a certain interdict restraining the paying over of certain inheritance to one C. S. Weihs to be discharged. Counsel said that a consent paper had now been filed.

The Court ordered the discharge of the interdict.

NEWMAN V. NEWMAN AND JULIUS.

This was an action for divorce and damages brought by Henry Christian Jacobus Newman, a wagon driver, of Roger-street, Cape Town, against his wife, Rosetta Johanna Newman and Abraham Julius, both of Cape Town, against the latter of whom £50 damages were claimed.

Dr. Greer for plaintiff; defendants in default.

The plaintiff said he was married to the first defendant in September, 1889. There were two children of the marriage, one of whom died. The surviving child—a girl of 10 years—was now with the mother, and witness paid £1 a month for her maintenance, as well as for her schooling and clothing. Witness went away in 1903, but in consequence of certain information he came back, and resumed living with his wife in Cape Town. When he returned the co-defendant, who was defendant's cousin's husband, was living in the house. Afterwards witness had his leg broken, and while lying in the house he saw what was going on. He wanted to send Julius away, but his wife said: "He has done nothing; if you send him away I will go with him." She refused to give witness food, and Julius assaulted him. Julius and defendant had been living together in Stone-street as man and wife, and the latter had had three children, of which witness was not the father. Witness was suing in forma pauperis. He did not press for damages, but asked for costs of suit against the co-defendant.

Evidence was given by co-defendant's wife, who said her husband drove her out of the house, and had since lived with defendant.

Decree of divorce granted, plaintiff to have the custody of the child, and judgment against co-defendant for costs.

MARAIS V. MARAIS.

This was an action brought by Wilhelmina Sarah Marais, of Carnarvon, against her husband for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which for a decree of divorce.

Mr. De Waal was for the plaintiff; defendant was in default.

Plaintiff said she was married to the defendant in community of property on May 29, 1906. After marriage she lived with defendant on his farm in the Fraserburg district until November. In that month defendant asked her to leave and go to her parents, saying he did not love her. He said if she left he would fetch her some time later on, as he was going away. Witness left, but defendant did not fetch her, and she went back in about three weeks' time, being accompanied by her little brother and sister-in-law. He asked her to leave again on the day she arrived. She went away back to her parents, who brought her back again. She remained on the farm one night with defendant, but on the following morning—about November 19—he again asked her to leave, threatening that if she did not go she would lose her life. Witness was expecting her confinement at the time, and defendant said he would not do anything for her in her illness. Witness's father saw defendant, and afterwards told witness what her husband had said. She thereupon fainted, and her father put her on the cart and took her away. In January, three weeks after the birth of the child, she went back to the farm and spoke to the defendant. Previously, in December, witness received a letter from defendant's attorney suggesting a separation on the basis of a division of the joint estate. Witness asked for a decree of restitution of conjugal rights, failing which for divorce, with equal division of the joint property, and witness to have the custody of the child.

In reply to the Court, the witness said she would be 17 years of age on the 24th of October next. Defendant was 19 years of age at the time of the marriage.

Johannes Josias Nicolas Vos, farmer, in the district of Carnarvon and father of the last witness, gave evidence, as to the visit to the defendant in November. Defendant told him to take his daughter away; otherwise he would drive her out of the house.

[Buchanan, J.: Altogether he seems to have behaved like a blackguard.]

Witness: Yes, my lord.

Order for restitution granted, defendant to return to or receive plaintiff on or before the 1st October, failing which rule to issue calling upon defendant to show cause why a decree of divorce should not be granted as prayed.

PANNELL V. PANNELL.

This was an action brought by the husband for divorce on the ground of adultery.

Dr. Greer was for the plaintiff; respondent was in default.

John Richard Pannell said he was married to defendant in November last year at Cape Town, and afterwards lived with her in Wale-street. They were very unhappy on account of defendant's intemperate habits. On the 21st April, 1906, he left defendant, and told her he was not coming back. She was so drunk the previous night that he thought he must leave her. He returned, however, the same afternoon, and she told him there was a man in her bedroom. On other occasions he went to the house, and at 8 o'clock on the following Tuesday night he saw a man named Wadsworth there. Wadsworth came from his wife's bedroom; defendant was lying down drunk. There was no property in the estate.

Further evidence having been given as to the adultery, a decree of divorce was granted.

LINSOTT V. LINSOTT.

This was an action brought by the husband, Arthur B. Linscott, an engineer, residing at Cape Town, against his wife for divorce on the ground of her alleged adultery with a man named Marsh.

Mr. Pohl was for the plaintiff; Mr. Van Zyl was for the defendant.

The plaintiff said he was married to the defendant before the British Consul in Paris in October, 1898. They came to South Africa in January of last year, leaving their child—a boy—in London. From September of last year his wife had been at Somerset Strand, whither she had been ordered by the doctor. Witness went there every Saturday. Defendant was staying at a boardinghouse at the Strand. Witness had seen co-defendant on two occasions at the Strand. His wife introduced them. Witness received certain information, as a result of which he brought this action.

Cross-examined by Mr. Van Zyl: They lived after the marriage for about a fortnight or three weeks in Paris. They were very happy. Afterwards defendant went to Australia in order to settle matters concerning some property which she had inherited. She came back in June, and returned to witness in 1901, and they lived in London until 1904. There was some difference between them on account of witness asking his wife to entertain his friends. Witness wanted her to invite people to their home who had invited them, but she complained of the strain. His wife paid her passage to the Cape from her own income of about £75 a year. Witness received an appointment at the South African College at £350 a year. The circumstances under which defendant paid her own passage were that she suddenly made up her mind to accompany witness, and booked her passage on the previous day, whereas it had been arranged that she should, on account of her health, remain in England for some months. His wife's health declined here, and she was obliged to be removed as a lunatic to Valkenberg in March, 1905.

Did you before that throw her down in the road at Rondebosch?—No; I remember her lying down on the road because she refused to go back to the house.

She says you threw her down because she did not walk fast enough?—I absolutely deny it.

In further cross-examination, the witness said his wife left Valkenberg in September, 1905, and she was taken by her sister—Mrs. Barton—to Somerset West Strand.

In November, 1905, you wrote her a long letter?—Yes.

You were then considering the matter of getting rid of her?—Oh, no.

You were anxious to get a divorce?—No.

Continuing under cross-examination, the witness said that in his letter he put it to his wife that it would require a strong effort on her part to keep up a social standing in Cape Town. The only intimacy he noticed at Somerset Strand was that when his wife's veil became detached, she asked Mr. Marsh to fix it, instead of asking her sister or witness. That, however, witness regarded as trifling. He last visited his wife at Somerset Strand at the end of June, and in consequence of what he heard, he employed certain people, including Osberg, a private detective. He did not employ a man named Cooper.

A witness named James Prior, a fisherman, living at the Strand, said that on two or three occasions he had seen Marsh and the defendant together on the beach at twilight, under circumstances which the witness detailed.

In cross-examination, the witness said Detective Osberg had seen him, and asked him about the case. A policeman came to his house one night, and said Osberg wanted to see him at the Police Station.

By the Court: The policeman was on duty at the time.

Mr. Van Zyl: You are living with another man's wife?

Witness: Yes, her husband deserted her, and I took her and keep her children.

A witness named Mrs. Van Niekirk said she had seen the defendant and Marsh walking together.

Dinah Adams said she had seen defendant and Marsh walking together.

Mr. Pohl closed his case.

Mrs. Beatrice Lily Maud Linscott, the defendant, was called. She said that she stayed at Somerset West Strand with her sister at a boarding-house. After her husband wrote the long letter spoken of to her, she expressed her willingness to go back to him, but he demurred as to this and also on other occasions when she spoke to him. She was introduced to Marsh in January. Marsh had taken witness and her sister to dances and to football matches. He used to come to the boarding-house and play cards with a Mr. McGuire, witness, and her sister.

Mr. Van Zyl: It is alleged that there has been improper conduct between yourself and Mr. Marsh?—I emphatically deny that.

You have heard the evidence of Prior?—Yes. I emphatically deny all his allegations.

In cross-examination, the witness said she had never walked arm-in-arm with Marsh. She had never gone alone for a walk with Marsh on an evening.

[Buchanan, J.: After these proceedings have gone so far, would it be pleasant for you to live together? Would you agree to a separation, or would you return to your husband?]

Witness: I am quite willing to return to my husband.

Buchanan, J., said he did not think it necessary to hear any further evidence for the defence.

After hearing Mr. Pohl, and without calling upon Mr. Van Zyl.

Buchanan, J.: This is an action for divorce on the ground of adultery. The evidence discloses the fact that a private detective was engaged in this matter to work up evidence. This private detective must, I presume, have been watching for some time, but he has only been able to produce to the Court the evidence of a witness, who has been described as a highly respectable fisherman, but who lived with another man's wife. This man has stated that in a public place, near a boat, he saw impropriety between the respondent and Marsh. The defendant has been called, and has flatly contradicted this. Now, I am not satisfied with this evidence, considering the way in which this case has been worked up, and the way in which this man has been induced to come forward to give his evidence. The allegations that the defendant is unconventional and that she has walked arm-in-arm with a gentleman might perhaps be things that might lead up to support other evidence, but I must say, sitting as a juror, that in this case there is an absence of such evidence as would induce any Court to come to the conclusion that the defendant has been guilty of adultery. Absolution from the instance must be given, with costs. His Lordship said there was one other remark he must make. It was applicable to other cases as well as this, but he would take this opportunity of drawing attention to the matter. He wished to say that private detectives were not justified in going to the police for assistance or in describing themselves as police, or in using police constables for the purpose of getting evidence. He was in hopes that the private detective in question would have been called, but he had not been put in the box, and had not had an opportunity of giving any explanation; but he (the Judge) must say that a private detective was not justified, and was acting improperly, in describing himself as a policeman, and in using police constables for the purposes of his case.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

KRAMER V. VAN DER MERWE. { 1906.
Aug. 25th.

Mr. Lewis moved as a matter of urgency for the discharge of a certain interdict granted by Mr. Justice Hopley on the 24th August, or, in the alternative, for an order requiring respondent to furnish security in the sum of £100 to the satisfaction of the Registrar of this Court.

This matter, it appeared, arose out of a judgment obtained in July by the present applicant against one Morris Brodie, of Sutherland. A writ of execution was issued, whereupon the respondent, Van der Merwe, claimed as his property certain mules, cart, and harness, which he said he had bought from Brodie. Kramer said he did not think the alleged sale had taken place, and he brought the present application, because, counsel explained, he feared that Brodie, the debtor, might become insolvent at any moment.

The interdict granted on an ex parte application by Mr. Justice Hopley temporarily restrained the Deputy Sheriff of Sutherland from selling the goods in question, pending an action to be brought by the then applicant (Van der Merwe) to have the ownership of the goods determined.

Mr. Lewis was for applicant; Mr. J. E. K. de Villiers was for respondent.

Mr. De Villiers said that the mules, etc., were in the hands of the Deputy Sheriff already, and the present applicant, Kramer, was perfectly secured. He submitted that the application should be refused, with costs.

Mr. Lewis argued that the interdict should be discharged, or Van der Merwe should be ordered to furnish security. Kramer's position was such that, whether he won or lost on the interpleader case, he was absolutely unprotected. Van der Merwe would not be prejudiced in any way if ordered to give security.

Mr. De Villiers submitted that, prima facie, there was a bona fide sale from Brodie to Van der Merwe.

De Villiers, C.J.: An order has been made by a Judge restraining the sale pending an action which is to be brought forthwith by Van der Merwe. I am of the very strong opinion that if notice had been given a different order might have been made. If all the facts had been brought to the notice of the Judge, probably he never would have made an order. This case is an illustration of the necessity of giving notice to people of motions which affect their rights. Here Van der Merwe must have known, when the application was made, that Kramer had a claim in respect of these goods, and, notwithstanding such knowledge, he proceeded to get an ex parte order from the Judge, which might never have been granted if notice had been given. From the form of the contract between Van der Merwe and Brodie, it does not appear perfectly clear that there ever was a true contract of sale. This is a form very often adopted, when parties wish to give a kind of security, a kind of pledge, without being an actual contract of sale. Brodie still remains in possession. It seems that Van der Merwe at one time had had possession, but he did not remain in possession long. At the same time, the order stands, and I am not satisfied that the present applicant would suffer at all from the continuance of the order. The only prejudice to him is the possible delay in getting his judgment debt paid. I am not inclined to make an order on this application, but I do think that the question of costs ought to stand over until after the trial. The Court will then be in a better position to judge as to how far the present application was required.

Mr. Lewis again mentioned the matter at a later stage, and said that perhaps he had not made his position quite clear as to the reason of the application. The application was made in view of the fact that the respondent Van der Merwe might become insolvent any day.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Do you wish me now to review my own previous decision?]

Mr. Lewis said that he had been asked to bring this fact before the Court, as he thought it had not been made clear previously.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What is the use of mentioning it? The order has been made, and there is nothing new before the Court. There is really no danger to your client. The order will stand.]

ALGOA MILLING CO. V. { 1906.
BELL AND CO. { Aug. 25th.

Foreign plaintiff — Security for costs — Time when security can be demanded.

The plaintiff, being a foreigner, sued the defendant, who filed his plea, and thereafter objected to the plaintiff filing his replication until he gave security for costs that might subsequently be incurred by the defendant.

Held, that the objection was a good one, and although the replication was allowed to be filed, all further proceedings were stayed until such security should be given.

This was an application upon notice to respondents calling upon them to show cause why a replication filed by them on the 15th August should not be removed from the record until respondents have furnished security for costs in an action instituted by them against applicants, and why respondents shall not be barred from further proceeding with their action until such security has been entered into.

Applicants' position was that respondents had filed their declaration and described themselves as a partnership, trading in Australia and Durban, Natal. On the 31st July, immediately on receipt of instructions from their Port Elizabeth correspondents to the effect that security for costs had not been given, and before pleadings had been closed, applicants' attorneys addressed to respondents' attorneys a letter calling upon Messrs. Bell to provide security for costs before filing replication. Respondents had, however, filed their replication without providing security.

Respondents' attorneys said that, after considerable delay, applicants were

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Philip's Town, who had convicted the appellant, Charl van der Walt, of contravening section 21 of the Scab Act (No. 20 of 1894).

Mr. Watermeyer was for appellant; Mr. Howel Jones was for the Crown.

Mr. Watermeyer said that the whole ground of appeal was the construction of the section. He relied upon the case of Ree v. Van der Berg (16 "Cape Times" Reports, 216) for his contention that it was sufficient if the owner did either one or other of the duties set out in the section. It was sufficient if he gave notice of the outbreak of scab or if he made proper and diligent efforts to cleanse. Mr. Justice Hopley, in the case of Van der Berg, found that under the second part of the section the owner had an alternative. Counsel pointed out that this was a criminal enactment, and that the words of the section must be construed strictly, and in accordance with their grammatical meaning.

Mr. Jones said that, with very great respect to the learned Judge who decided the case in question—a decision which, being the decision of a single Judge, would not be binding in other cases—came to a wrong conclusion. He did not say that the learned Judge was wrong in upsetting the conviction in that case, because there was some evidence that the accused had hand-dressed the sheep. But he submitted that his lordship was entirely wrong when he went on to discuss the general effect of the Act and the judgment, if he might say so, was inconsistent. Counsel went on to contend that the inspector under the Act must have notice given to him of the occurrence of scab. The Act said that the owner must give notice of any outbreak of scab, and the question was, was there anything which said that he should not give notice? He contended that there was not.

Mr. Watermeyer having been heard in reply,

Buchanan, J.: The accused in this case is charged with having contravened section 21 of the Scab Act (No. 20 of 1894) in that having become aware that his flock of sheep was infected with scab, he failed to give notice within seven days to the inspector. It is perfectly clear from the evidence that the accused did fail to give the notice required. It is also clear on the evidence that he had attempted to cleanse his sheep by hand-dressing. The twenty-first section requires every owner of any flock of sheep both to give seven days' notice to the inspector when he is aware that there is scab amongst his sheep, and he shall forthwith proceed to make proper and diligent efforts to cleanse such sheep. That is clear; there is no mistaking the clear, grammatical meaning of this section so far. Two duties are cast by the section upon the owner—one is to give notice within seven days, and the other is forthwith to commence cleansing his sheep. Then there is a second paragraph of the section, which says that every owner failing to make such efforts or to give seven days' notice shall be deemed guilty of a contravention of this Act. This clearly means that if an owner fails to perform one or other of the duties which the Act imposes upon him, he shall be guilty of the offence. Learned counsel for the accused wishes to read this paragraph as meaning that the owner cannot be prosecuted unless he fail in both these duties. If that had been the intention of the Legislature they would have used the word "and" instead of "or." It is clear what the Legislature's meaning is. Reliance, therefore, upon the grammatical meaning of the section cannot be sustained. The learned counsel goes on to rely on a decision given by my brother Hopley in the case of Ree v. Van der Berg (16 "Cape Times" Reports, 216). This case was quoted before the Magistrate and the Magistrate said that the case did not apply to the one before him. In this respect the Magistrate is perfectly right. In the case of Ree v. Van der Berg, the person did give notice, and he was charged with having failed to cleanse his sheep, and my brother Hopley, in commenting upon this section, says these duties no doubt are concurrent, and the Act means that he should not sit still, but he should do his best to try and eradicate the disease, and he must also tell the inspector. It is clear that my brother Hopley took the same reading of the Act as we are taking now. It is quite a different case from this, and there is no conflict between that decision and the present decision. The appeal must be dismissed.

Maasdorp, J., concurred.

WARREN V. LEWIN.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Oudtshoorn in an action brought by appellant against respondent to recover £20 damages for trespass to land and a mare.

From the record, it appeared that the parties are owners and occupiers of adjoining erven situate in High-street, Oudtshoorn. There was a mud wall dividing the erven. The ground of the claim was that the defendant's stallion leaped the partition wall, entered the plaintiff's ground, and trespassed upon it and covered his mare. Defendant denied liability or that plaintiff had sustained any damages. He further said that, without prejudice to his legal rights, he had tendered £5 to the plaintiff in settlement of any damages.

The Magistrate's decision was absolute from the instance, with costs. In his reasons, he said he was not satisfied that the mare had been put in foal by the defendant's stallion. Plaintiff did not found any part of his claim upon trespass upon his land.

Mr. Benjamin was for appellant; Mr. Alexander was for respondent.

Mr. Benjamin submitted that the balance of testimony was distinctly in favour of the plaintiff. He contended that plaintiff was entitled to claim prospective damages in respect of the covering of the mare. Judgment ought to have been entered for the plaintiff for a substantial amount of damages.

Without calling upon Mr. Alexander, Buchanan, J.: Plaintiff had a mare running in his camp, which adjoined the camp of the defendant, and in which latter camp the defendant had a stallion running. The two questions that arise in this case are: (1) Whether the stallion had covered the plaintiff's mare, and (2) whether the mare, if so covered, has been rendered unfit for work thereby. The plaintiff says that the only damage he claims is, not for any trespass, but simply for the damage done through being deprived of the services of the mare. The witnesses were heard before the Magistrate, and on both the questions at issue the Magistrate has found against the plaintiff, and he has given absolution from the instance, as he is not satisfied that the plaintiff has made out his case. The only witness called for the plaintiff to show that the stallion had covered the mare is the boy Aries, and Aries' statement is such as to give the Magistrate sufficient ground for saying that he does not credit the statement that the mare was covered at all. Then, as to the second question, the Magistrate says there is nothing to show on the evidence whether the mare is in foal or not. Sufficient time has not elapsed. A test was applied to the mare, but the Magistrate did not consider it a satisfactory test. Mr. Benjamin has argued that the balance of testimony is in favour of the plaintiff. The Magistrate had the witnesses before him, and he has not been satisfied that the balance of testimony is in favour of the plaintiff, and he has given absolution from the instance, with costs. The defendant applied for a postponement to enable it to be seen whether the mare was in foal, and to this the plaintiff objected. Under the circumstances, I think the Magistrate's judgment cannot be interfered with. I am inclined to go with Mr. Benjamin so far, that, if it had been clearly established, and if the Magistrate had found that the stallion had covered the mare, prospective damages might have been taken into consideration, and something might have been awarded, but no prospective damages have been established. I think, under the circumstances, we cannot interfere with the finding of the Magistrate upon the facts, and it is only a question of facts. The appeal will be dismissed, with costs.

Maasdorp, J., concurred.

DU TOIT V. DZINQWA AND A.R.M. OF MATATIELE.

Magistrate's Court—Costs—Taxation.

A Magistrate has jurisdiction to review the taxation of costs in his court allowed by his clerk.

This matter came in review from a decision of the Assistant Resident Magistrate of Matatiele in reference to taxation of certain costs.

The matter, it appeared, arose out of a claim brought by applicant in the Magistrate's Court for £12 18s. 6d. for work and labour done and material supplied in the completion of certain building belonging to defendant at Mount Fletcher. Defendant admitted that he had agreed to pay £11 15s., but he put in a claim in reconvention for £10 5s. The Magistrate found for plaintiff for a certain amount, with costs, in convention, and for defendant for a certain amount, with costs, in reconvention. Plaintiff's costs were taxed by the Magistrate's clerk, and allowed at the sum of £18 11s. 9d. Upon review, the Magistrate struck out the expenses of two witnesses (£11 10s.), thus reducing plaintiff's taxed costs to £7 1s. 9d.

Mr. Benjamin was for appellant; Mr. Upington was for respondent.

Mr. Benjamin said the matter was brought under review by this Court by procedure laid down in Knyasa Municipality v Jackson and others (6 Juta, 85). Counsel submitted that the Magistrate was wrong in disallowing costs that the clerk had already allowed. It was an unusual thing for a Court to interfere with the discretion of the Taxing Master in determining a question of costs.

[Buchanan, J.: The only question is whether these two witnesses were material.]

Mr. Benjamin said that plaintiff called the two witnesses to prove a certain agreement, and the Magistrate found that the agreement was not proved.

Without calling upon Mr. Upington.

Buchanan, J.: A case was brought by the present applicant against one Piet Dzingwa, in the Magistrate's Court of Matatiele, in which the plaintiff set up an agreement upon which he founded his claim. Witnesses were called to support the fact that such an agreement had been entered into, and the Magistrate found that no such agreement had been entered into, but on other grounds he gave judgment for the plaintiff for a portion of his claim. The matter went before the Magistrate's clerk for taxation of costs, and under the 36th Rule of Magistrates' Courts, the clerk, in taxing the costs, ought to allow the parties any witnesses whose evidence was necessary to establish the claim brought by the plaintiff. The clerk allowed the expenses of two witnesses who had been called by the plaintiff to prove the agreement. The matter came in review before the Magistrate. The Magistrate, who had heard the case, held that these two witnesses were not necessary, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to include their expenses in his bill of costs, and he therefore amended the clerk's taxation by striking out these witnesses' expenses. It is candidly admitted now that the witnesses were not necessary to establish the case set up by plaintiff. We cannot now interfere with the Magistrate's decision in this case. The proper procedure, although not recognised by the Rules of Court, has been followed in this matter. It is on the ground that the witnesses have been proved not to have been necessary that the application is refused with costs.

Maasdorp, J., concurred.

VAN BLOMMESTEIN V. VAN DER VENTER.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Acting Resident Magistrate of Bredasdorp in an action brought by Van Blommestein against Van der Venter to recover £5 damages for trespass by defendant's goats on plaintiff's land on four occasions. Van Blommestein had also sued for £1 expenses of assessors, but he had withdrawn that part of the claim.

The Magistrate found that damage had only been proved on the last occasion, and he gave judgment for one-fourth of the amount claimed, viz., £1 5s., but made no order as to costs.

The appeal was of a two-fold character. Van Blommestein appealed on the question of costs, and Van der Venter appealed on the merits.

Mr. McGregor was for Van der Venter; Mr. W. Porter Buchanan was for Van Blommestein.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

Buchanan, J.: An action was brought in the Magistrate's Court for £3 damages for trespass and £1 expenses for assessing the damage caused. The Magistrate heard the case, and he gave judgment for £1 5s. without giving any costs. Against that decision an appeal has been brought on the merits of the case for the defendant, and a cross appeal on the question of costs by the plaintiff. There is no doubt a conflict of evidence between the plaintiff's and defendant's witnesses as to whether any trespass took place, but the Magistrate, having had the witnesses before him, has found as a fact there was a trespass, and, though the Court is not precluded from setting aside on appeal on a question of fact, still I think the probabilities would support the Magistrate's finding as to trespass having taken place. Judging from the record, I think the Magistrate's decision was perfectly right, that a trespass had taken place. Then, as to the amount awarded, the plaintiff claimed £20 originally, but the assessors reduced his damages to £5. The Magistrate has reduced the damages to £1 5s., because there were no less than four separate trespasses, and he presumes that the damages assessed by the assessors were for the whole four trespasses, and the plaintiff had made no complaint as to the first, second, and third trespasses. I do not follow the Magistrate's reasoning in this respect, but still there has been no cross appeal on the amount awarded. The Magistrate took one-fourth of the amount awarded by the assessors, and that judgment has not been appealed against, and it still stands. The remaining question is whether the Magistrate ought not to have given costs when he found for the plaintiff for £1 5s. Both on matters of fact and questions of costs the Court is very loth to interfere with the discretion of the Magistrate. In this case the Magistrate has refused costs, because he says that the plaintiff's overseer did not act in a straightforward manner when the defendant's goats trespassed on the first, second, and third time, in not giving notice to the defendant. Well, I do not think there has been any want of straightforwardness on the part of plaintiff's overseer in not advising the defendant every time his goats trespassed, but when they trespassed on the fourth occasion, and did considerable damage, then he instituted these proceedings. Then the Magistrate goes on to say that the plaintiff acted in an off-hand manner. But there is no evidence of that. Then he alleges that the plaintiff must have acted in spite. He may have known something of the parties which is not on the record. I have listened to the evidence being read in this case, and I must say I find no grounds whatever for holding on the record before me that there are any grounds for saying that there was spite on the part of the plaintiff. I certainly think the Magistrate ought to have given costs in the case, but I still would have been loth to interfere with his discretion if I could have found any firm ground to justify the Magistrate in exercising his discretion. Judgment ought to be entered in the Court below for the plaintiff for £1 5s., with costs in the Court below. The appeal has failed on the merits in this case, and I think the appellant (defendant in the Court below) must pay the costs of appeal. The judgment of the Court below will be altered to judgment for the plaintiff for £1 5s., with costs, and the appeal will be dismissed, with costs, defendant in the Court below (appellant on appeal) to pay the costs of appeal.

Maasdorp, J., concurred.

AMERIKA V. GROBBELAAR.

There was an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant for transfer of certain property, failing which a compliance of the contract.

The plaintiff's declaration was as follows:

1. Plaintiff is a coloured farm labourer. Defendant is a retired farmer.

2. Both plaintiff and defendant reside at or near Riebeeck West, in the Malmesbury Division.

3. On or about the 1st February, 1909, the defendant, by verbal agreement, contracted and agreed with the plaintiff to sell, and did sell, to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff agreed to purchase, and did purchase, the portion at that time occupied by and in the use of the plaintiff, extending from the street side to a distance of 101 feet by 53 feet in width of erf, No. 2, also known as Vincknest, in the village adjoining Riebeeck West, for the sum of £30 sterling, upon the terms and conditions following viz., that the plaintiff should pay the purchase price by him and his family rendering certain services to and performing work for defendant and by payments in money as he could find same.

4. The plaintiff by cash payments and wages has paid £12 of the purchase price.

5. All conditions have been fulfilled, all things happened, and all times elapsed to entitle the plaintiff to have the said contract completed and performed, and transfer of the said property given by the defendant to the plaintiff, and though the plaintiff has always been ready and willing to do all things required of him by the said contract of sale and purchase, and before action tendered, and still tenders, the balance of the purchase price, yet the defendant has refused and neglected to complete and perform his said contract entered into as aforesaid.

Wherefore the plaintiff prays: (a) That the defendant be ordered forthwith to give transfer and conveyance to him of the aforementioned property; (b) failing compliance with which, cancellation of the contract, return of the money paid under the contract, and £60 as and for damages for breach of contract; (c) alternative relief; (d) costs of suit.

The defendant's plea was as follows:

1. The defendant admits paragraphs 1 and 2 of the plaintiff's declaration.

2. As to paragraph 3 thereof, he says that on or about the said date he entered into an agreement for the provisional sale of a certain portion of the said erf with one Asia Amerika, not the plaintiff. The portion as provisionally sold was that in the occupation of the purchaser at the time up to ten feet below a certain well thereon.

3. The purchase price of the said portion was, under the said agreement, to be the sum of £30, with 6 per cent. interest thereon, per annum; should the seller demand the same, and it was a term of the said agreement, that the seller, i.e., the defendant, retained full owner's rights on the said erf and house as long as he lived.

4. Another term of the said agreement was that the purchaser bound himself and his family to work for the seller, when the latter required them to do so, for the same wages as could be obtained from others, and that payments on account of the said purchase price were to be made only by way of work done by the purchaser or his family.

5. The seller had the right under the said agreement to cancel the said provisional sale if the purchaser did not fulfil the conditions thereof, e.g., if he hired himself to others, or upon three months' notice, written or verbal, and the purchaser also had the right to cancel the said agreement at any time. The said agreement was embodied in a document signed by the defendant, whereof a copy was handed to the said Asia Amerika and to the terms whereof the defendant craves leave to refer at the trial.

6. Save as aforesaid, the defendant denies paragraph 3 of the declaration.

7. As to paragraph 4 thereof, the defendant admits that the said Asia Amerika and his family did work for him to the value of £12, but otherwise the defendant denies the said paragraph.

8. He denies paragraph 5, save that he admits the tender of £18 in cash, and his refusal to accept the same or to make transfer of the said property.

9. The said Asia Amerika and his family frequently refused to work for the defendant when called upon to do so, and the defendant, in or about November, 1906, gave the said Asia Amerika notice in terms of the said provisional agreement that he cancelled and did cancel the said agreement by reason of the said breaches thereof, and the defendant at the same time tendered to return the said £12, for which work had already been done, but the said Asia Amerika refused to accept the same. The defendant has always been, and still is, willing to refund the same sum to the said Asia Amerika.

10. Thereafter in or about January, 1906, the defendant sold the said property to his son, C. A. Grobbelaar, jun., to whom transfer thereof was duly passed, on or about the 22nd March, 1906, and the said Asia Amerika hired the said property from the defendant's said son from the 15th January, 1906, at a rental of 12s. a month.

Wherefore the defendant prays that the plaintiff's claim may be dismissed, with costs.

Mr. Pohl was for the plaintiff and Mr. Burton was for the defendant.

Hopley, J., after hearing the evidence, and counsel in argument on the facts, gave judgment for the defendant with costs.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

CARELSE V. ESTATE DE VRIES. { 1906.
Aug. 28th.
Sept. 3rd.

This was an action brought by Mary Elizabeth Carelse, of Cape Town, against the executors dative of the estate of the late Marthinus Christian Terence de Vries, who died intestate on the 13th September, 1905.

The plaintiff, in her declaration, stated that on or about the month of March, 1884, De Vries, on promise of marriage, seduced her, and thereafter cohabited with her up to the time of his death. Plaintiff had had several children, of whom De Vries was the father, and there were now living as issue of plaintiff and De Vries seven children, of whom the eldest was 20 and the youngest four. De Vries did not fulfil his promise to marry the plaintiff, who did not discover until a year after the seduction that De Vries was a married man. Plaintiff was in impoverished circumstances, and wholly unable to provide for or support herself or her children, save as to the two eldest children, who were earning sufficient to maintain themselves. The assets in the estate were amply sufficient to provide for the support and maintenance of the remaining children. Plaintiff claimed in her individual capacity £500 damages for seduction and breach of promise, and in her capacity as mother and natural guardian of the children claimed an order for payment of £25 per month, or, alternatively, that the defendants be ordered to pay into the hands of trustees such sum as will yield interest at the rate of £25 per month for such maintenance, which sum had been regularly paid by De Vries for a considerable period prior to his death. Alternatively, the plaintiff claimed, if not entitled to claim such maintenance, that the defendants be ordered to pay such sum as damages.

In their plea the defendants admitted that the income of the estate was at present sufficient for the support of deceased's legitimate children, but the estate was almost entirely dependent for the present upon certain income which it enjoyed from the estate of the deceased's father and his predeceased spouse during the lifetime of the former, who is now nearly eighty years of age. At the death of the deceased's father, the estate would be substantially diminished, and it was doubtful if it would be sufficient for the support of the eight legitimate children, of whom four are minors. Defendants, without admitting any liability for the sum claimed for seduction and breach of promise, pleaded that, in any event, the claim was barred by prescription. They denied the validity of the claim for maintenance, and said that the amount claimed was unreasonable and excessive, having regard to the value of the estate. Should the Court hold that the plaintiff was entitled to claim maintenance on behalf of the minor children, the defendants contended that the allowance should be limited to the lifetime of the deceased's father, or that defendants should be at liberty at any time to apply for a reduction in the amount fixed.

Mr. Close was for the plaintiff; Mr. McGregor (with him Mr. Swift) for the defendants.

Mary Elizabeth Carelse, the plaintiff, said that she met the late Mr. De Vries in 1884 and became intimate with him. She understood that he was a single man. He promised to marry her, and on that she allowed him to seduce her. When the first child was two weeks old she found that De Vries was a married man. He always made her a regular allowance, and in all eleven children were born, of whom seven were alive.

By the Court: De Vries was a chemist. He continued to live with his wife.

Continuing, witness said that the late Mr. De Vries allowed her £4 10s. a week, and he also paid the rent and for the schooling of the children. Last year she received a telegram from Mrs. De Vries, informing her that Mr. De Vries had died. She went out to Claremont where he was living, and her children went to the funeral. After the death of the late Mr. De Vries she received small amounts from his father, but the old gentleman had now ceased to support her.

In cross-examination, she said that she was in a tobaccoist's shop in Plein-street when she met the late Mr. De Vries. Her parents were both dead, and she was at that time living with a brother. De Vries told her he lived over the chemist's shop in Grave-street (now Parliament-street). In November they went to live together. Two weeks after her first child was born she found out that De Vries, who had repeatedly put off marrying her, was married already. He said that his wife had found out all about her and threatened him with a divorce. Her two elder children were earning their own living. The eldest girl was earning £2 10s. a month and the eldest boy £8 10s., out of which he paid the house rent.

By the Court: She was earning no money herself—only looking after the house and the children. She used to take in sewing, but could get none now. She was 21 when she met De Vries.

Gerald E. D'A. Orpen, who represented Mr. Syfret in connection with the defendant estate, said that the present annual value of the estate was £787 net per annum from rents. When the rentals ran out and on the death of Mr. De Vries' father there would be some re-adjustment. Mrs. De Vries had eight children, seven of whom were still living with her. Mrs. De Vries required about £40 per month for house-keeping. Half of the estate belonged to Mrs. De Vries.

In cross-examination, he said that the rent of the one building was £110 per month, out of which old Mr. De Vries received £30 and the rates and taxes had to be paid.

Mr. Close, in argument, cited the case of Levensvelt (4 J., p. 64), where the relationship began in 1852 and continued till the death of the man in 1878, and the Court granted relief. In Kramer v. Findlay's executors (B. 1878, p. 51), the Court ordered a certain sum to be paid out monthly by way of damages for the seduction. On the question of prescription, he said that Holl Consultatie (Vol. I., No. 148) was against him, but on the other hand Voet (48, 5, 5) laid down that the period of prescription in cases of this kind was 30 years. On the death of the seducer he could not be ordered to marry the plaintiff, but an action lay against his estate for damages. There was no authority that the continued cohabitation would deprive the seduced party of her action. Schorer (Maasdorp's translation, p. 660) also laid down the period of prescription as 30 years. The payment had to be made out of the goods of the father.

Counsel further cited Voet (25, 3, 5; 34, 1, 3; and 38, 17, 8). As long as there were goods of the father, the children were entitled to maintenance out of those goods. (Matthaeus Paroemia 1, 18; also Justinian's Novels 89, 12, 6; Christian 3, 143, 7, and Van Leeuwen's Censura Forensis 1, 3, 13, 7, and 1, 1, 10, 3.)

Mr. McGregor submitted that the period of prescription in those cases was five years (Holl Cons. I. 148; Nasseu la Leek sub. voc. deffloratio and maagd), De Villiers (De injuriis, pp. 228-230) did not accept the period of 30 years either. The 30 years' period mentioned by Schorer referred to the lex Cornelia Stuprum was based on the lex Julia de Adulteris, and the action under that law would be prescribed in five years. Voet (48, 5, 5) cited no authority (see also Dig. 48, 5, 28, 5 and 6). As to the breach of promise, that would be governed by the same rules as the seduction, especially where the case of a breach of promise of marriage did not come suitably or aptly from one who continued living with the party against whose estate she brought the action. The claim for maintenance could not be sustained in both cases in our Court (Levensvelt's case and Kramer's case) the executors submitted to the judgment of the Court, because in neither of those cases were there any legitimate children. Here there were legitimate minor children, as well as the illegitimate children. Counsel further referred to Groenewegen ad Cod (5, 27, 2).

De Villiers, C.J., said that if there was a conflict of authorities he personally would be inclined to give some maintenance out of the estate of the man who was the author of the children's being.

Continuing, Mr. McGregor said that Matthaeus (referred to by Mr. Close), stated the law of Friesland which was more like the Roman law than the law of Holland.

Mr. Close, in reply, cited Carpozovius Crim. Quest. (68, 3), and Van Zyl (p. 420).

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (September 3rd).

De Villiers, C.J.: In the year 1884 the plaintiff, who was then 21 years of age, was seduced by one De Vries, who was then a married man with several children. She states—and there is no reason to disbelieve her statement—that she was not aware of his being married, and that she yielded to his solicitations on his promise that he would marry her. Two weeks after the birth of her first child she discovered that De Vries was a married man, but she continued to be visited by him, and had six more children, of whom he was the father. During his lifetime he always maintained the plaintiff and the children, for whose maintenance he made her an allowance of £28 a month. He died intestate in 1906 without having made any provision for the further maintenance and support of the plaintiff and her children, and the object of the present action is to secure such maintenance out of his estate in addition to a sum of £500, which is claimed by way of damages for her seduction, and for the breach of De Vries' alleged promise to marry her. The defendants' plea, while admitting that the present income of the estate would be sufficient for the support of De Vries' children, states that the estate is subject to diminution, which may render it insufficient for the support of the legitimate as well as the illegitimate children of the deceased. The evidence, however, shows that there are more than sufficient assets for the support of all the children who require support. The plea further denies the liability of the estate for any part of the claims, and states, moreover, that the claim for damages is barred by prescription. Upon the question whether the obligation of a father to support his children passes to his heirs, the authorities are by no means agreed. Voet, in several passages of his Commentaries (notably in 35, 2, 82), maintains that the obligation ceases upon the death of the parent, while Groenewegen (ad. dig., 34, 1, 15) maintains the opposite view. The question was discussed in ex parte Levengeid (4, Juta, 84), but was not definitely decided as the executors consented to a sum of money being paid to the mother of the children for their past and future maintenance. In the previous case of Kramer v. Findlay's Executors (Buch. Rep. for 1878, p. 51), the executors raised no objection to monthly payments being made to the mother of the illegitimate child of the deceased. In the present case the executors object to the payment of any sum whatever for the support of the illegitimate children of the deceased, and the question must be definitely decided whether the objection holds good in our law. The obligation of a father to support his illegitimate children rests upon the ground that, as the author of their being, he is bound to assist their mother in keeping them alive and in health, and bringing them up as useful members of society. If it be held that this obligation ceases with the death of the father, it would follow that the obligation of a father to support his legitimate children ceases with his death. An unnatural father possessed of ample means might bequeath all his property to strangers, and leave his own legitimate offspring unprovided for, and a burthen on the rest of the community. Under the Dutch law he was bound, at all events, to leave to his lawful children their legitimate portion, but as this obligation no longer exists in this colony, the claim of legitimate and illegitimate children stands on the same footing. The difference between the Dutch authorities may, perhaps, be reconciled by confining Voet's statement as to the non-liability of heirs for maintenance due by the deceased to cases in which the inheritance accruing to the heirs is insufficient for the purpose. Under our law, as explained in Fischer v. Union Bank (8 Juta, 46), the executor stands on a very different footing from the heir of the Dutch law, and would not in any case be liable to pay more than he has actually received. Where the estate of the deceased is more than sufficient to pay for the support and maintenance, according to their condition in life, of his legitimate children, I am of opinion that under our law, it is competent for the Court to award to the mother of his illegitimate children, as their natural guardian, such sum as shall enable her to supply them with the means of subsistence, until they are old enough to earn it for themselves. To do more would be against the policy of the law, which discourages all illicit relations between the sexes; to do less would be absolute cruelty to the innocent illegitimate offspring, besides being a gross injustice towards the mother in throwing upon her the whole burthen of maintaining the children, for whose existence the deceased was primarily responsible. In the present case the deceased fully recognised his duty during his lifetime by allowing the plaintiff £28 a month for the maintenance of the children, but, for some unexplained reason, he neglected to make any provision for them after his death. The two elder children are old enough to support themselves, but some of the younger ones will for some years still require support. The estate of the deceased is amply sufficient to maintain his legitimate children in comfort, and provide them with a good education. The plaintiff, on the other hand, is in needy circumstances, and having personally to attend to the children, is wholly unable to earn the bare means of subsistence for them. Under all the circumstances, I am of opinion that the estate might justly contribute the sum of £500 towards the future support of the children. In regard to the plaintiff's claim for damages for seduction and breach of promise of marriage, the seduction took place twenty-one years before the death of De Vries, and during the interval he made ample provision for supporting her in comfort. After consenting to be kept by him as his mistress for that long period, she is not, in my opinion, entitled to damages for his alleged breach of promise to marry her, whatever the legal period of prescription for that form of action might be. The same remark applies with even greater force to her claim for damages for seduction. It is impossible to hold that the action was kept alive by his continued intercourse with her. The cause of action arose when she was deprived of her virginity, and De Vries' subsequent intercourse with her did not add to his liability. On the contrary, by deliberately electing to receive favours from him, instead of breaking the connection and suing for damages for seduction, she reduced and ultimately extinguished her claim for damages. It is true that if she had sued him after the birth of her first child she would have been entitled not only to compensation for her seduction, but also for the lying-in charges and for the maintenance of the child. But she would not have been entitled on the birth of subsequent children to claim any further compensation for herself. Any claim she might have had would be, as mother and natural guardian of the children, to obtain that support for them which she was unable herself to render alone. That claim he fully satisfied during his lifetime. In this view of the case it is unnecessary for the Court to decide the question whether the claim for damages for seduction is barred by prescription. It is a question upon which great diversity of opinion existed among Dutch lawyers. Most of them class the action among the actiones injuriarum, but the action is really not founded on injuria. The term seduction presupposes consent on the part of the girl, and where there is consent there can be no injury. The action is sui generis, and was, according to Grotius (Intro. 3, 36, 8), allowed in the Netherlands, on account of the weakness of women. At first it was an action to compel the seducer to marry the woman, but, it being found that the effect was that many maidservants enticed the sons of honourable citizens into immorality, the seducer was allowed the alternative of making compensation in money. If the action were classed among the actions for injury, the term of prescription would be one year, but, according to the opinion of P. van der Meulen (1 Holl. Cons. 148), the true period is five years. Voet (48, 5, 5), on the other hand, maintains that the action can be brought within the full prescriptive period of thirty years, and he adds that it may be brought against the heirs of the seducer. In the case of Kramer v. Findlay's Executors (Buch. for 1878, p. 51), the action was brought after a considerable interval of time, but prescription was not pleaded. It would, moreover, appear from the report that the claim for damages for seduction was not included in the declaration, which was confined to a claim for maintenance for the child. The sum of £1 10s. per month was awarded, but the report must be mistaken in adding that it was by way of damages for seduction. What was probably intended was to give judgment for maintenance in lieu of damages. But, whatever the period of prescription might be, I am satisfied that no Court of law would ever award damages for seduction under the circumstances disclosed in the present case. As to the claim for maintenance, there must be judgment for the plaintiff, as mother and natural guardian, for the sum of £500 for the support and maintenance of her five younger children, of which £100 must be paid to her forthwith, and the balance of £400 paid into the Guardians' Fund, with direction to the Master to pay to the plaintiff the sum of £80 at the end of the first year, with such interest as may then have accrued; the sum of £50 at the end of the second year; the sum of £50 at the end of the third year; and thereafter at the rate of £40 per annum, until the capital and interest shall have been exhausted. The costs of the action will be paid out of the estate.

His Lordship added that Mr. Justice Maasdorp, before whom also the case was heard, concurred in the foregoing judgment.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

KLEYNHAUS V. KLEYNHAUS; 1906.
AND PARBONS. { Aug. 28th.

This was an action for decree of divorce against the defendant on the ground of misconduct with the co-defendant, and £1,000 damages from him. The defendant counterclaimed for a decree of divorce from the plaintiff on the ground of misconduct.

Dr. Greer (with him Mr. Van Zyl) was for the petitioner; Mr. Burton (with him Mr. Lewis) for the defendants.

The petitioner, Theodorus Barnardus Kleynhans, stated that he was a farmer residing in the Barkly East district. He was married to defendant on November 2, 1891, but the marriage was an unhappy one, in consequence of his wife's jealousy. Shortly before the war the co-defendant, who was then about 20 years of age, came to live on his (plaintiff's) farm, Branksome, residing in the house as one of the family. In March last defendant refused to live with witness as his wife, and in May she suggested that they should part and divide the property. When the division was made she said she wanted a divorce as well. Witness made inquiries and as a result this action was brought.

Cross-examined: His wife often accused him of misconduct with various women. He denied that he misconducted himself with a certain Mrs. Pretorius or with Tyna Kleynhans. He had never struck or kicked his wife.

Johannes J. Niewenhuis alleged that on December 22, 1905, he surprised the defendant and co-defendant in a compromising position.

Isak J. van Biljoen said he had seen Parsons kissing Mrs. Kleynhans, and had also seen them coming out of the former's bedroom together.

Dr. Greer closed his case.

Mrs. Katrina Wilhelmina Kleynhans, the defendant, stated that their married life had not been happy. Mrs. Martens told her that petitioner had made improper suggestions to her, but he denied it. During the war he admitted misconduct with Mrs. Pretorius.

Cross-examined by Dr. Greer: She denied that she offered a woman named Krokobell money if she would tell her (witness) something in connection with the case. Since she left the farm she had resided at Barkly East with one of her relations. Parsons had visited her at that house, but he had never stayed the night there.

Re-examined by Mr. Burton: Parsons visited her at Barkly East in connection with the present case.

Jacobus Johannes Parsons, the co-defendant, stated that he resided at the farm Kelvingrove, in the Barkly East district. It was about an hour and a half's drive from plaintiff's farm, Branksome. While he resided with Mr. and Mrs. Kleynhans they lived at times very unhappily together. On one occasion when Mrs. Pretorius was leaving the farm Branksome after a visit she kissed both witness and plaintiff, and when witness asked plaintiff why she did that, the latter replied that Mrs. Pretorius was very fond of kissing. Subsequently plaintiff informed witness that he (Kleynhans) had misconducted himself with Mrs. Pretorius. Witness knew of the quarrels between Mr. and Mrs. Kleynhans about Mrs. Pretorius. The first time witness heard that he was to be involved in the present proceedings was on May 29 last.

Cross-examined by Mr. Van Zyl: He was always on the best of terms with Mr. and Mrs. Mrs. Kleynhans. He had remonstrated with the former with regard to his immoral conduct. Witness denied that he had invented his evidence with reference to petitioner's repeated acts of misconduct. Witness denied that he had been discovered by Johannes J. Niewenhuis in a compromising position with Mrs. Kleynhans on the sofa in the dining-room. Witness kissed Mrs. Kleynhans when he left the farm, but he denied doing this frequently. He had never misconducted himself with defendant.

The next witness was a native woman employed by plaintiff during the war.

She alleged that she saw petitioner with a Bastard woman, under suspicious circumstances. Kleynhans had made improper overtures to her on more than one occasion.

A coloured mason, named Thomas Theron, residing in the Barkly East district, and his son Klaas, also gave evidence. The latter said he had been offered £30 to "keep out of the case."

William Pretorius said he had "cruised" through the whole of the Barkly East district. Together with his wife and seven children he went to live in a house on the farm Branksome, staying there from September, 1900, to March, 1901. At that time his wife was in a sickly condition, and was never well throughout that period.

Mr. Burton closed his case.

Buchanan, J., suggested that the parties might arrive at a settlement between themselves. They were both of them young, and at one time were in love with one another. They had had fifteen years of married life, and had three children, and for their sakes and for their own, he suggested that they should both of them forgive and forget. He would adjourn the case until the following day, and in the meanwhile they could talk the matter over, and he hoped that the solicitors on both sides would assist in bringing about an amicable understanding.

Postea (August 30th).

Mr. Burton said that he had been informed that the parties had unfortunately not been able to agree. He thought it right to say that he thought Mrs. Kleynhans would agree to a settlement on account of the children, but the plaintiff (the husband) would not hear of it.

The case was then proceeded with, and counsel were heard in argument on the facts.

Buchanan, J., said the plaintiff (the husband) brought an action against his wife for a decree of divorce on the grounds of her adultery, and cited Parsons as co-defendant. In answer to this claim, both the defendants denied adultery, and the wife brought a claim in reconvention for divorce on the grounds of the husband's adultery. Now, when a person went into court and asked for a divorce, it remained a very serious consideration with the Court that the person making such application came into the Court with clean hands. It was therefore desirable to look into the charges brought by the wife against the husband, and see if the evidence substantiated them. The charges were that he had committed adultery with three different people. Sitting as a juror, one would have to ask himself if the charges had been proved. He had very carefully followed up this case, and as a juror, he arrived at the conclusion that the plaintiff was lewd, vicious, and unfaithful to his marriage vow, and he therefore found on the facts before the Court that the plaintiff was not entitled to succeed. He would have been glad to have allowed the case to remain there, but for the claim in convention; and here again he had followed the case very faithfully, and had reluctantly had to find that the defendant had been unfaithful to her husband, and he thought it would have been impossible for anybody who had followed the case to arrive at any other conclusion. On the claim in convention, he gave absolute from the instance, with costs against plaintiff, and on the claim in reconvention, there would also be absolute from the instance, the first-named defendant to pay her costs. Now the Court had next to consider the custody of the children. If either party had been innocent of the charges alleged against them, they would have had the custody of the children, but they were not, and the Court had to look to the interests of the minors, and he decided to give the plaintiff the custody of the two eldest boys, and the defendant the custody of the girl and the youngest boy, and the plaintiff would have to pay to the defendant the sum of £3 per month for each child until they reached sixteen years of age. He thought it right to say that after the evidence disclosed, he strongly urged that the parties might come to some amicable arrangement. He was not surprised at the wife being willing to come to a compromise, knowing that the mother's affection for the children would accentuate that. He really did not think that the resistance would have come from the plaintiff. He apparently thought he was going to get a divorce, and completely overlooked his own misconduct. He thought it would have been far better if the parties had agreed to allow bygones to be bygones, and attempt to live together again, knowing what they did about each other, for the sake of their children. Parsons would also have to bear his own costs.

Harbour Board—Harbour Master
Act 36 of 1896—Negligence Ultra vires—Servants' scope of employment.

The 38th section of Act 36 of 1896 enacts that if it shall appear necessary to the Harbour Master of E. L., he may order any vessel to shift or change her berth to any other berth to be pointed out. The plaintiffs' vessels were duly licenced to lie up in the Buffalo River, and they were duly and safely moored in proper berths assigned to them. A regatta being about to be held in the River, the Harbour Master ordered the temporary removal of the vessels, and as he knew that they had no master or crew on board, he employed servants of the Board to attach them to a hulk lying nearer the side of the river. There was negligence in attaching these vessels to the hulk, and the Court, moreover, found that the work was done in a negligent manner. A freshet arose, causing one of the vessels to be stranded and thereby open to drift into the sea.

Held, that the Board was liable for the damage.

These actions were consolidated for the purposes of the hearing. The Caledonia Company sued the East London Harbour Board for £4,000 damages for loss of a tug, and the Fisheries Company sued the Board for £345 for damage to a hulk and loss of coal.

The declaration of the Colonial Fisheries Company was in the following terms:

1. Plaintiffs are a limited liability company incorporated under the Companies' Act No. 25 of 1892, and having their registered office at East London.

2. Defendants are the Harbour Board of East London, as constituted under the Provisions of Act No. 36 of 1896.

3. Plaintiffs are, and were, at the dates hereafter referred to, the owners of the wooden ship "Nini," then used as a coal hulk.

4. On or about 6th October, 1905, the said ship was lawfully lying, well, properly, and sufficiently moored in a clear berth in the Buffalo River, East London.

5. On or about the said date, defendants, through themselves, their agents, or servants, wrongfully and unlawfully, and without cause and without the consent of plaintiffs, removed the said ship to a new berth in the said river, and wrongfully, unlawfully, negligently, insufficiently, and without due and proper care, attached and fastened her alongside another vessel, to wit, the Alpha, to which the said defendants also fastened and attached another vessel, to wit, the Caledonia.

6. On or about the 11th of October, and by reason of the said wrongful and unlawful removal, without cause, and wrongful, unlawful, negligent, and insufficient attachment and fastening without due and proper care, or one or other of them, the said ship broke adrift after a heavy rain and floated down the aforesaid river, and ultimately washed up on the west bank thereof in a seriously damaged condition, and is thereby lost to plaintiffs.

7. At the time of the wrongful and unlawful acts complained of, the said ship contained a considerable quantity of coal, whereof 50 tons, of the value of £100, are submerged, and wholly lost, and of the remainder, to wit, 120 tons, the cost of removal will amount to £30, over and above the ordinary cost of removal when the said ship lay at her anchorage.

8. The value of the said ship and her moorings at and before the time of the said wrongful and unlawful acts was the sum of £215.

9. Plaintiffs are entitled to claim the said sums of £215, £100, and £30 respectively, but defendants wrongfully and unlawfully refuse to pay the same.

Wherefore the plaintiffs pray (a) Judgment for the sums of £215, £100, and £30 respectively; (b) interest a tempore morae; (c) alternative relief; (d) costs of suit.

In their declaration the Caledonia Company said they were a joint stock company incorporated in Edinburgh under the Companies Acts. At the dates stated the plaintiffs were the owners of the iron or steel steam tug Caledonia. The allegations were identical to those in the Fisheries Company's declaration, except as to what happened after the flood. In paragraph 6 it was alleged that, after wrong and unlawful removal by the Board, "the said tug broke adrift after a heavy rain and floated down the river, and was wholly lost." "By reason of the said loss of the said tug," the declaration continued, "plaintiffs have suffered damages in the sum of £4,000, being the value of the said tug and appurtenances, for which sum defendants are liable, but which they wrongfully and unlawfully refuse to pay." Plaintiffs claimed judgment for (a) £4,000; (b) interest a tempore morae; and (c) costs of suit.

To the Caledonia Company's claim the defendants pleaded as follows:

1. The defendant Board admits the allegations in paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of the declaration.

2. With regard to paragraphs 4 and 5 the defendant Board admits that the said tug was lying moored in a certain part of the Buffalo River previous to and on the 4th October, 1905, but does not admit that she was there moored so well, properly, and sufficiently as to be safe there, in the circumstances which subsequently occurred, as hereinafter set forth.

3. On the said 4th October, for the purpose of clearing the course before a regatta which was not under the control or management of the defendant board, the said tug was, not by the act of the defendant Board or of anyone acting within the scope of his authority on its behalf, moved from that berth lower down the river alongside the Alpha, alongside which the Nini was thereafter also moored, and there the said tug was moored at least as strongly and safely as she had been moored before she was moved. Save as aforesaid, the allegations in paragraphs 4 and 5 are denied.

4. The defendant Board says that the tug was so moved at the request, and with the knowledge and consent, of one Womersley, representing the firm of Palmer, Womersley and Co., and acting as the agent of the owners of the said tug.

5. The defendant Board further says that the above-mentioned moving and re-mooring were carried out executed with all due and proper care and skill, according to the custom of the port, by a properly qualified pilot, duly licensed for the port of East London, which is in terms of section 87 of Act No. 36 of 1896, a compulsory pilotage port, and the defendant Board is not responsible for any loss, damage, or accident that may occur through the act, omission, or default of any such pilot.

6. The defendant Board denies paragraph 6, save that it admits that in the early morning of October 11, 1905, by reason of an abnormal, extraordinary, and excessive flood or freshet which, throughout the night of October 10, swept down the river after heavy rains, and which it was not possible to provide against or control, the said tug broke adrift from its moorings, floated down the river, and was, as far as the Board has knowledge, lost.

7. The defendant Board has no knowledge, and does not admit, the alleged value of the said tug and appurtenances, and denies that it is liable to make good the sum of £4,000, or any part thereof, to plaintiffs. The Board admits the alleged refusal to pay, but denies that such refusal is wrongful or unlawful.

8. In the alternative to so much of paragraph 3 hereof, as sets forth that the tug Caledonia was moved and moored, as therein alleged, not by the act of the defendant Board, or of anyone acting within the scope of his authority on its behalf, and in case the said moving and mooring be held to be the act of the defendant Board, it says that the said tug was lawfully moved and moored as aforesaid in the exercise of the powers of control and management vested in the Board by the aforesaid Act and the regulations lawfully made thereunder, and that the Board is not liable in the premises for any loss or damage which the plaintiff may have sustained.

Wherefore the defendant Board prays that plaintiff's claim may be dismissed, with costs.

The plea to the Fisheries Company's claim was in similar terms, except that no allegation of knowledge or consent on the part of the plaintiffs was made.

Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Mr. Benjamin), for plaintiffs: Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. W. P. Buchanan), for defendants.

Captain Scholefield said that he was a master mariner, and was employed by Palmer, Wormesley and Co., of Port Elizabeth, as manager of their stevedoring business. He had charge of the firm's plant. He took the Caledonia to East London on August 30, 1905, for the purpose of laying her up for safety. The tug was of composite construction—steel frames and wooden plankings. Witness described the moorings of the Caledonia in the berth to which he was directed by the Harbour Board's pilot (Barrie) in the Buffalo River. A caretaker was left in charge of the tug. The anchor was exceptionally large, and, in fact, he was ridiculed by Pilot Parrie for bringing such an anchor. The tug was moored with her bow up the river; he knew of no better way of mooring. He did not think it was right to moor a boat with her stern up the river. The Caledonia's tonnage was 47-30, and her length 69 feet. Witness was shown a model of the way in which the Caledonia, Nini, and Alpha were moored when the flood took place, and he said that he objected to such mooring. He did not think that two large ships should have been moored in such a way to a small ship like the Caledonia. Again, he did not think that the Caledonia should have been moored with her stern up the river.

Archibald Marshall, a mate, also gave evidence as to the removal of the tug from Port Elizabeth to East London.

James Anderson, a shipwright, employed by Mr. Godfrey (engineer in charge of the Buffalo Bridge construction works), said that he had charge of the Government hulk Alpha. Witness spoke to the change of berths. The Caledonia, he said, had slipped her anchor higher up. The tying up of the Caledonia was done by Harbour Board people under the direction of Pilot Barrie. On the same day the Nini was brought down, and was slacked down alongside the Alpha. The ships were put to these fresh moorings on the Friday. The regatta took place on the following Monday. There would have been ample time to take the ships back to their original moorings. On Tuesday night about 9 o'clock he heard the ropes of the Nini parting. The Nini broke away, and came back several times and struck the Alpha three times. Witness went aft, and found that all the chains attached to the buoy had gone, Alpha's, Caledonia's, and Nini's. The Alpha immediately began to drag. The Nini sheered off towards the west bank, and drifted down the river among some piles. The Alpha dragged down the river with the Caledonia, and swung round about three times, with the result that the Caledonia was brought round the bow to the Alpha's port side, and went down the river on the Alpha's port side. About midnight the Alpha got down to the pontoon with the Caledonia, held only by the breast ropes, ranging about heavily. This continued until about half-past three, when the Caledonia broke adrift, went out in mid-stream, and drifted down the river, when he lost sight of her. Witness thought the mischief was caused by the Nini striking the Alpha in her bow, causing the Alpha to drag. Witness believed that a tug could have come to their assistance. The river began to rise about half-past six on Tuesday evening, but the current did not become really strong until about three o'clock next morning.

Joseph James Godfrey, engineer in charge of the Buffalo Bridge works, said that he had been engaged on this work about four and a half years. Some two years ago he objected by letter to the Port Captain to a steam lighter being tied to the Alpha. If permission had been asked to tie the Caledonia or Nini to the Alpha, he should not have given his consent. About £30 or £40 damage was done to the Alpha. Some damage was also done to the staging by the Nini. The Government had made a claim for this damage upon the Harbour Board, and negotiations were pending.

Cross-examined: Witness considered that he was entitled to safeguard the interests of his department, and he had a right to protect against anybody tying other vessels to the Government's property.

By the Court: Witness was told before the flood occurred that the other ships had been fastened to the Alpha. He did not raise any objection.

Harry Blandford Womersley said he represented Palmer, Womersley and Co. in East London. Before the regatta he heard that the Caledonia was to be moved. He communicated with Captain Munn. Witness informed Captain Munn that he did not mind where the tug was put, as long as she was in a safe berth. Witness, after the disaster, saw Pilot Barrie, who pointed out the hulk Nini as the cause of the mischief.

Cross-examined: Witness did not remember having asked Captain Munn when he was going to take the Caledonia off the regatta course. He asked Captain Munn when he was going to shift the Caledonia. Witness did not remember having suggested to Captain Munn that the Caledonia should be put alongside the hulk Alpha.

Samuel John Womersley, of the firm of Palmer, Womersley and Co., of Port Elizabeth, said that they were agents of the Clan Line. They did not know the Caledonia was not insured until November. The value of the tug was £4,900.

Robert B. Jackson, Ferry Superintendent, East London, said that the original moorings of the Caledonia were very heavy for such a vessel. The Caledonia was fastened bow down the river. He did not think that was the correct way of mooring a vessel, except alongside a wharf. There was heavy rain on the day following the regatta. The river rose about midnight, the rise being gradual. The current was strongest about 3 a.m. on Wednesday, the rate being about 13 knots. Witness did not know of any reason why the Harbour Board's tug could not go up the river on the night of the 10th October. Between two and three a.m. he drew his ferry boats ashore. As he was beaching the last boat he saw the Caledonia floating down.

Spiera Carroll, fisherman, James Henry Carey, and George Wm. Phoebe, all of East London, were called to speak mainly in regard to the tug Caledonia.

George Edward Austin, salvage contractor and shipwright, East London, gave details as to the specially strong moorings which were laid for the hulk Nini.

Witness was cross-examined at some length in reference to certain wire-ropes which had been used for the first and second moorings of the Nini. He considered that the first wire would, with the aid of the anchor, have been sufficient to enable the Nini to ride out the flood.

Mr. Schreiner: I put it to you that the Nini, riding to a 4-inch wire, was riding to a stronger mooring than she was at the first mooring?

Witness: I cannot agree that it was a 4-inch wire. I agreed with all the surveyors, and they did not find that. There was some talk at the time of its being a 4-inch wire, but we all agreed that it was 3½ inch.

In further cross-examination, witness said that he did not think the Nini was riding more strongly at the second mooring than the first. He had had about eight years' acquaintance with the Buffalo River. He knew that anchors dragged in places there. He did not think the Caledonia would have dragged from her first moorings during the flood; her anchor was in blue mud, and would not have shifted. If the Caledonia had remained at her first berth, there would have been considerable risk of collision from the New Blessing, and the Caledonia might have been pushed on to the west bank. He did not remember having seen ships moored in the river, stern up, as the Caledonia was, except ships at the wharves. He remembered now, however, having seen H.M.S. Pelorus moored in the river stern up. He saw three ships moored stern up in the photograph of the Buffalo River produced. He still thought the fact of the Caledonia being moored stern up was the principal reason of the breakage of her stern moorings.

Albert Edward Brown, a storeman employed by the Colonial Fisheries Co., said that he saw Pilot Barrie and other employees of the Harbour Board taking steps to move the Nini from her moorings early in October. Permission was not asked for. After the Nini had stranded, about 50 tons of Welsh steam coal were submerged or lost. It would cost 4s. to 5s. per ton extra to get out the rest of the coal.

Hopley, J., suggested, as a means of shortening the evidence, that the parties should agree upon some figure as the value of the coal, say £90 or £100.

Counsel accepted this suggestion.

George Frederick Monck, manager of the Fisheries Company, said he was not consulted by the Harbour Board or anyone else as to the moving of the Nini from her moorings in October. The Nini was brought up in the company's books at £300.

Cross-examined: Witness heard that the Nini was being shifted, and he raised no objection at the time, though he made a report to the company. He had not made any complaint to Captain Munn that Austin had not properly moored the Nini in the first instance. The contract stipulated that the work must be done to the satisfaction of Captain Munn.

By the Court: Witness took no part in getting up the regatta. He had expected that the Nini would be moved to clear the course, as was done in previous years. The storeman reported to him on the day the Nini was moved, and witness raised no objection until after the bulk had stranded.

John Gilbey Wiggins, local attorney for plaintiffs at East London, said that during part of 1904 he was chairman of the Fisheries Company. Some question arose in 1904 as to moving the Nini to clear the course for the regatta, and he communicated with Captain Munn by telephone, in these terms: "We have no objections, provided you take responsibility for her, and undertake her safe return to her moorings." Captain Munn said, "Oh, yes, that is all right."

In cross-examination, witness said he was quite sure that he had this conversation with Captain Munn, and not with the secretary of the regatta.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It does not carry the law much further, whether the port captain said so or not.]

George Smith, manager at East London for Richard Irwin and Sons, said that about half-past eight on the night of the flood he saw the hulks Nini and Alpha ranging. He tried to communicate with the port office, but could get no answer by telephone.

Joseph Martyr said that he resided at Kenilworth, and was a master mariner, and one of the younger Brethren of Trinity House. He had during the past fortnight, visited East London. Vessels moored together, as the Caledonia, Nini, and Alpha had been, when the flood occurred, were decidedly not as safe as vessels in separate berths. He considered that it was decidedly wrong to tie the Caledonia stern up the river. The Caledonia should have been bow up the river. As the Nini was moored, she would be taking the pressure of both the Alpha and Caledonia. He had inspected the chains of the Caledonia, and found them to be amply sufficient for her first mooring—sufficient, in fact, for a ship double her class. There ought to have been some means provided on board for enabling the Caledonia to be brought up in case she broke her moorings. He thought the Caledonia would have been quite safe on her first moorings, with her anchor and cable, in case of a freshet. He had often moored vessels abreast in the Buffalo River, and in the Thames. There were no freshets in the Thames, because they were controlled by locks. He did not know the nature of the bottom of the Buffalo River. In his opinion it would have been better to have used a "stock" anchor than a "stockler," which was used.

Captain W. E. Cliff, Harbour Master at Port Elizabeth, stated he knew the Buffalo River well. He had supplied the moorings to the Caledonia. They were much heavier moorings than her tonnage required, and were quite sufficient to hold her in the river. It was more dangerous to moor three vessels alongside each other than to give them separate berths. He thought the Caledonia was quite as safe with a stockler's anchor as with a stock anchor. He valued the Caledonia at £3,800.

William Gowan, at one time Lloyd's surveyor, stated that vessels moored as these were were not safe, because they were entirely dependent on the Alpha. The long cable would allow the Nini to range and part her breast ropes, and then bump against the Alpha. He thought a 10-inch coir rope was sufficient to attach the Caledonia to the Alpha. He objected to the way the Caledonia was moored. In cross-examination, the witness admitted that the Chamber of Commerce at East London agitated to get him out of his position. The Harbour Board also had something to do with it. He often visited East London.

Captain Harrison, marine superintendent for the Union-Castle Company, at East London, gave corroborative evidence, and added that on the night in question the river was running very strong.

In answer to Mr. Schreiner, the witness said he knew the port of East London for many years. He had never witnessed such a rough time as he did on the day in question at East London, and he hoped he would never see such a time again. Witness did not suggest that the Port Captain had been guilty of negligence in putting the three vessels together.

In reply to Mr. Searle, the witness said the Port Captain should not have left the vessels in that position, as they knew the river was coming down.

[Hopley, J.: Did you expect trouble that night?—Yes, and made arrangements for it.

What arrangements did you make?—We put out extra lines.

Did you sleep aboard?—No, but I was convenient if wanted.

Mr. Searle closed his case, and intimated that the correspondence between the parties was being arranged, and would be put in.

Captain Munn, Port Captain at East London, stated he was a master mariner, and his last command was the Trojan. He had been Port Captain for twelve years, but knew the port well before that, having visited it in the Trojan and other craft. The plans of the port as put in were correct. As Port Captain, he had control of the harbour. On the occasion of the regatta in 1905, he received no instructions from the Board with regard to giving facilities. What he did, he did of his own accord. He had never heard of any application being made to the Board for facilities. The bottom of the river was not good holding ground. He had been averse to putting hulks in the river. There were screw pile moorings, which were for the purpose of securing large craft. The Nini had been secured to screw-pile moorings. He remembered when the Caledonia was brought round from Port Elizabeth. Witness sent Pilot Barrie to superintend her mooring. The port was a compulsory pilot port, but he had the right to allow small vessels to go in and out without a pilot in fine weather. He selected the position at the second creek because he understood the Caledonia would not be required for some time. She was well found in appliances. The Caledonia arrived on August 30. The Nini had been there for some years. He had taken exception to the mooring appliances of the Nini. Witness requested the owners to get new rope for her. Witness saw the wire produced when she was moored in August. On the day witness went aboard the Nini, the river was very quiet. He saw the wire produced on board, and it certainly seemed an old wire. He did not consider it could bear the strain of the Nini. He presumed it was just a steadying wire, for fear a gust of wind might come down. In his opinion, even in the moorings which she originally occupied, she would have been swept away through the river coming down.

[Hopley, J.: What is the width of the river where she was moored?]-250 feet.

Witness (continuing) said he thought it was probable that the "New Blessing" would have collided with the Caledonia, and there would have been a snapping of the weakest link in the cable. During further evidence, witness described the effects of the storm on October 10 as disclosed from observations on the river. He denied plaintiffs' allegation that there was negligence or want of proper care in fastening the Nini or Caledonia to the Alpha.

Cross-examined: Witness had power to move a vessel without consulting the Harbour Board. The boats were moved by Harbour Board employees during working hours. He did not know whether the members of the Board were aware that the boats would be shifted for the regatta. He had not specially brought the matter under the attention of the Board. The Nini was specially moored in August at his request, so as to make it quite safe. The work was done by Austin, and witness was quite satisfied with the fresh moorings. Witness did not suggest that anything that passed between himself and Womersley shifted the responsibility as to the lower moorings. But it was with Womersley's knowledge and consent that the Caledonia was taken lower down. Witness had no communication with the Fisheries Company as to moving the Nini, but he thought the company had knowledge through their Mr. Brown. The Nini had been moved on similar occasions in previous years. He remembered Mr. Godfrey making objection some years ago to other vessels being tied to the Government hulk Alpha. The matter was adjusted on that occasion. Mr. Godfrey making objection some years ago to other vessels being tied to the Government hulk Alpha. The matter was adjusted on that occasion.

Further cross-examined, witness said that the Nini was slacked down and her stern anchors were not of much use to her. These anchors were for the time being dispensed with. There was no strain on any wire or cable, because the ship was quite stationary. He had intended to put the two ships back as soon as possible. Witness was not at the regatta. He was at the Port Office at 11.20 on the night of the disaster. On Tuesday, the 10th October, there was a strong south-easter blowing, and rain was falling. In the afternoon he had advised the berthing masters to give special attention to the moorings of the ships on the wharves. He had not thought there was any danger to the Caledonia and Nini. He did not go down to them, but he had the report of his subordinate. The range would not be so extensive where the Caledonia and Nini were lying. He did not think there was any need to specially strengthen the moorings of these boats on the day in question.

Mr. Searle: With regard to the practice of tying three vessels together, is there no danger in case of a range?

Witness: If they are well moored they would be all right. Where those vessels lay there is little or no range in the river.

In answer to the Court, witness said that he put the accident down to the tremendous current from the freshet.

Re-examined: When witness used the term "range" he meant a range coming from the mouth of the river, caused by the heavy sea at the bar and the swell. Witness had not desired to get the boats back as quickly as possible because he feared for their safety. The reason was that he had moved the vessels and he wanted to put them back.

By the Court: If witness had taken back the ships he should have done so as Port Captain, because he should have sent port officials to do it.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You acted as Port Captain under authority of the Board?]

Witness: Yes, on the authority of the Board regulations, which give me certain powers in certain paragraphs.

Some argument ensued as to the position of the Harbour Board on the pleadings.

Mr. Searle said that plaintiffs founded their case upon the Board's negligence.

Mr. Schreiner: We say we are under no liability for anything done by Captain Munn outside the scope of his authority as an official of the Board.

Ernest Charles Barrie, pilot, of East London, said that he had been on the Buffalo for ten years. Witness moved the two boats lower down the river preparatory to the regatta, under directions from Captain Munn. He left the Caledonia's old moorings where they were. It would be a wicked thing to leave her moorings behind unless they put down as good instead. He took the Caledonia alongside the Alpha. It was a common thing to moor vessels stern up the river. He had often done it, even with men of war. He considered that the moorings of the Caledonia were sufficient and satisfactory: he considered that she was lying in a safer berth than the one from which she had been taken. He thought it very probable, if she remained in her old position, that she would have been struck by the "New Blessing." Witness described the steps he took to moor that "rotten old tramp," as he called the Nini. He considered that she was well and sufficiently moored in her temporary berth. Witness did not remember such a big flood occurring in the river as on the night of October 10. It was a daily thing to moor three boats together, as was done in this case. Anchors dragged a good deal in the Buffalo River. He would like to find some of the "hard blue ground" that certain witnesses had spoken about. Dropping an anchor into the Buffalo bed was like dropping an anchor into a keg of soft soap. Even screw pull moorings, which had hitherto been regarded as their safeguard, went on the night in question. Witness would not deny that he might have told Womersley that the Nini was the cause of it all. He did not know why he should have said that, because the poor wretch (the Nini) was a victim—she was lying on the beach high and dry.

Ernest Charles Barrie, Harbour Board pilot, was recalled. In cross-examination by Mr. Searle, witness said he did not profess to have a very good memory. The Nini at her first mooring had two stern chains and two stern anchors, while at the moorings to which she was temporarily moved she had only a 34-inch wire rope at her stern. That was equal to an 4-inch chain.

Witness remembered that they had had lots of trouble with the "Bravo," "Nini," "Alpha," and every hulk they had on the river. The "Nini" was not in good condition. The "New Blessing" was a derelict old schooner which had been on fire. She was beached as high as she could go. During the storm she dragged her anchor. She could not have helped going into the middle of the river; she would not go down on the side of the river. The "Alpha" had now been moored with a rope to the shore and an anchor forward and stern. The head moorings of the three vessels tied together were in soft mud, but the anchorage was not in soft mud. Witness did not think there was anything extraordinary in mooring two vessels abreast as was done with the "Alpha" and "Nini." He would not call the "Caledonia" a "vessel"; she was only a little tug.

By the Court: Witness had been in this country ten years. He had known previous freshets, but no mischief had resulted. The storm in October last was the worst he had known on the river. He had seen three ships tied together on the Buffalo during the war. He was not aware of any accidents arising from that cause.

Robert Stirling, port coxswain, East London, speaking from 27 years' experience of the Buffalo, said that the freshet or flood of October last was the worst he had known. On the evening in question he went out to haul the lifeboats on the ship. The lifeboat jetty was carried away about half an hour after a craft that he assumed to be the Caledonia went down the river. A tremendous quantity of trees and debris began coming down the river about nine o'clock at night. He thought both the Nini and Caledonia were as safely moored in their temporary berths as they would have been in their first berths.

S. R. Pockley, secretary of the defendant Board, was next called.

Cross-examined: As far as he was aware, the Board had no record of a flood in 1874. That was beyond his recollection.

Re-examined: His Board, as a Board, had no knowledge of the moving of either the Caledonia or the Nini before the freshet occurred. He had never heard of 20 ships being wrecked when the river came down in 1874.

William Henry Fuller, chairman of defendant Board, said he had occupied that position a little over two years. He used to be chairman of the old Bouting Company. The flood in October last was the most serious he had known. Within his recollection the river had never previously come down and done damage to the shipping. He had had search made in the records concerning the flood in 1874, but as far as he could find the damage was nothing like so serious. About a quarter to six on the morning following the storm, the river was coming down in a boiling flood. He found that very extensive damage had been done. He considered that the Caledonia was in greater safety in her temporary moorings than she would have been in her original moorings. On the 10th October, the Board had had no warning of heavy water coming down the river. Usually, when the river was heavy, they had a communication from King William's Town. Among the debris brought down were numbers of live snakes, showing how sudden and heavy had been the flood. Witness was acting Lloyd's agent at East London. It was a custom of the port to moor two ships abreast. He had never known any accident from that cause. Ships were as frequently moored with their bows down the river as otherwise. Gunboats like the Pelorus had lain stern up the river. During the war the Barrosa lay for nine months with her stern up the river. The Board had never framed any regulations or adopted resolutions for mooring ships to clear the course for the regatta.

By the Court: The Port Captain had put ships to fresh moorings, so as to clear the course.

[Hopley, J.: If he does it, he does it qua Port Captain?]

Witness: I understand, my lord, that that is a more or less legal point.

In further evidence, witness said he considered that the Nini and Caledonia were placed in less risk of damage in the position they occupied than if they had been left in their first position.

By the Court: Even if they had received intelligence that a big freshet was coming down the river, he was not aware that they would have done anything different from what was actually done.

Cross-examined: Witness had been acting Lloyd's agent for 21 years. As to the equipment of the Caledonia, she was given a buoy when she was removed, which replaced her anchor. The Port Captain had instructions as to mooring vessels, with the assistance of the pilot. It was an ordinary thing in the port to tie two vessels together or two hulks together. Witness did not remember any other specific instance in which two hulks had been tied together. Witness was president of the Rowing Association.

By the Court: In case the Port Captain had declined to clear the course, he supposed the Regatta Committee would have sent a deputation to the Harbour Board.

[Hopley, J.: What would you do then?]

Witness: I do not know, in the light of this case.

Mr. Searle: Yes, but apart entirely from this case?

Witness: One thing I can distinctly answer—the Board would not have accepted any responsibility for the mooring of the craft or their value.

Cross-examination continued: Witness had not previously heard of the objection raised by Mr. Godfrey to the mooring of other vessels to the Government hulk "Alpha." He thought the only way to avoid such a risk as this in future would be not to moor vessels in the regatta course. It was impossible to mark out another course. He should not describe the New Blessing as a "derelict"; he regarded her as a hulk. He thought that the "New Blessing" was driven out into mid-stream, and was afterwards dragged back towards the bank by her anchor.

Re-examined: His opinion was that if the "Caledonia" had been lying in the position from which she was temporarily moved the "New Blessing" would have collided with her during the flood.

Erick Walburn, sub-foreman of East London Harbour Works, and James Cohen Morrison, a berthing master at East London, also gave evidence.

Charles John Neill, master mariner, said he had been 14 years with the Clan Line, and nine years as a chief officer. He had been nine years at East London. He had been engaged in stevedoring. Witness bought the "Nini" in 1902 for £250 on behalf of the East London Fisheries. He afterwards sold the plant, and so on for £7,000. He took her value at that time to be £250. Witness saw the "Nini" last year, and estimated her value at £170. Witness agreed with the report prepared by Captain Munn and others upon inspection in June last of the position and moorings of the "Nini." Witness considered the "Nini's" moorings at the time of the flood to be good and sufficient. He gave evidence as to the dangers to which the "Caledonia" and "Nini" would have been exposed if they had remained in their first position. It was not unusual for vessels to be moored together on the Buffalo. Vessels, he believed, were more often moored stern up the Buffalo than bow up. The ship was almost invariably turned round before being berthed. Witness did a good deal of stevedoring at East London during the war. He mentioned three large vessels which had been moored together on the Buffalo during the war. On the Thames boats were moored in tiers of four and five.

Cross-examined: Witness was in London (England) when the freshet happened on the Buffalo. There was great pressure at the port about the time of the war. Putting a ship's stern up the river did not submerge her any more. He agreed that in case of a strong current ships were safer in separate berths.

Re-examined: Witness had never known a freshet at East London cause damage to shipping. The only thing that they feared on the Buffalo was the range.

Hopley, J., asked counsel if any evidence were to be given in regard to the flood in the Buffalo in 1874.

Mr. Schreiner said they had no witnesses who could speak to the events of 1874.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Surely there must be some old inhabitant at East London who would remember that flood?]

Mr. Schreiner: I should think there must be, my lord. It is a very healthy place. Our witnesses only go back 29 years.

[De Villiers, C.J.: There seems to be a tradition about 1874; but there is nobody who can tell the Court what happened.]

Mr. Schreiner: Mr. Fuller went there in 1875; but he could not remember that there had been any serious damage to shipping. The flood then did not go nearly so high as the flood last year. Besides, there was no shipping in the river at that time; the port was not made.

William Henry Seaward, marine surveyor, East London, gave similar evidence.

Harry Augustus Fuhr, assistant divisional engineer, employed by the Public Works Department, and stationed at King William's Town, spoke to the exceptional character of the freshet on October 11 last, as disclosed by observations at Buffalo Bridge, King William's Town. The flood was, he said, at least 2 ft. higher than the 1874 flood, when the river rose 24 ft.

Wm. Craig, Chief Engineer, Public Works Department, said that for purposes of bridge building on the Buffalo they had taken the 1872 flood as their record. They had no official record of the 1874 flood. The 1905 flood, however, created a new record—quite beyond 1874.

Cross-examined: The 1905 record was 5 ft. 6 in. higher than the 1872 record, while 1872 was 3 ft. below the 1874 record.

Wm. R. Crabtree, assistant engineer, Buffalo Harbour, proved a plan showing positions of shipping on the Buffalo when the freshet occurred.

De Villiers, C.J., drew attention to a remarkable feature of the rainfall returns of the East and West banks at the date of the flood, viz., that all the rain seemed to have been on one side of the river.

Mr. Schreiner said the readings certainly were remarkable. The gauges were about two miles apart.

De Villiers, C.J., observed that, in view of what had taken place the Harbour Board would no doubt have the returns from the upper parts furnished to them, so that they might have warning of any flood.

Norman Lee, employed at the Electric Power Station, East London, also spoke to the exceptional character of the flood.

Nathaniel W. P. McLeod, acting mate of the Harbour Board dredger Agnes; Patrick Moore, sailor, East London; James W. Glee, formerly of the hulk Cerastes; and Wm. Balsbeck, seaman, also gave evidence, mainly to vindicate the severity of the freshet and the fact that other ships, although well moored, got adrift.

Mr. Schreiner closed his case.

Certain correspondence having been put in,

Mr. Searle said that there was really no conflict of evidence on the principal facts of the case. It was really a question of law, and the action was founded on the negligence of the Harbour Board in dealing with the "Caledonia" and the "Nini" as they did. If the position taken up in the plea, that no one in the scope of the employment of the Harbour Board did deal with them was not substantiated, thus the onus was on the defendant. The "Nini" was dealt with without any request or consent, and the consent of the Caledonia people was not proved. The first defence was that the shifting was not done by the Harbour Board or its servants; the second defence, that, East London being a compulsory pilotage port, the Harbour Board was not liable under section 87 of Act 36 of 1896; and the third defence, that what was done was done in accordance with lawful regulations, and therefore the Harbour Board was not liable.

Now, under Act 36 of 1896 the control and management of the harbour was vested in the Harbour Board, and the Harbour Board had power to make regulations. The Harbour Master and Port Captain were under the control of the Harbour Board. By section 44, the master of a vessel shifting was liable to a penalty, except on emergency. Under the regulations no tug was allowed to shift without the permission of the Port Captain. No vessels could be made fast to buoys, wharves, or other vessels without the permission of the Port Captain.

No contributory negligence was pleaded. It was clear that Captain Munn did what he did as the representative of the Harbour Board, and that he had full power to act. The case of Gifford v. Commissioners of the Table Bay Docks (B 1874, 96 at p. 110), was very similar to this case in many points, e.g., res ipsa loquitur, and the scope and authority of the Port Captain.

[Hopley, J.: But this is not a case of res ipsa loquitur, which applies where no natural forces come in.]

[De Villiers, C.J.: The point you have to prove is negligence. It was a most unprecedented occurrence. If no such flood had within the memory of man occurred, was it negligence not to have taken steps to meet such a flood?]

Mr. Searle: The same thing occurred in 1874.

[Hopley, J.: But they did not know of any damage done then to shipping.]

[De Villiers, C.J.: What effect had the flood of 1874 on shipping? If none, why should defendants take steps against floods?]

Mr. Searle: I don't think there were any craft in the river in 1874. Where they knew a tremendous flood had come down before and where they kept in communication with King William's Town, that shows that they anticipated trouble.

Continuing, Mr. Searle said the Harbour Board had taken these vessels away, and they were therefore at their risk. He would not say that the Harbour Board were insurers, but they had to show an extra degree of care.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Does that not throw on them the onus of showing that they were not negligent? There can only be one kind of negligence, but the question of onus is very important.]

Mr. Searle: The Nini was specially moored, and reported on on June 21, 1905. It was the Nini's breaking adrift that did all the damage.

[Hopley, J.: It was the breast ropes that parted, and not any part of the deck or hull of the Nini.]

Mr. Searle: That was because she was not fastened up properly.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The letter of June 21, 1905, seems to contemplate that some part of the Nini would give way. Did any part of her give way?]

Mr. Searle: She broke adrift. It must have been something of the sort. They used old ropes for mooring the Nini, and, in the face of the report they got, it was a dangerous thing to tie up two hulks and a valuable tug in the river.

Proceeding, he said that the question of compulsory pilotage did not arise. The plaintiffs did not want any new berths—they had berths. The onus was cast on the defendants of disproving negligence. The circumstances of the prior special mooring of the vessels and their voluntary removal by the Harbour Board cast on the Harbour Board the onus of showing that there was no negligence. The vessels in their original position were quite safe. The position they were put in was unsafe. Three moored together was improper. They put a wire rope in place of two chains, and the wire rope was not equivalent to one anchor chain. When the breast ropes parted the Nini was on a very long cable. She would then sheer across and come back with violence. So she did, and bumped the Alpha three times, and did the damage. When the breast ropes broke, the longer cable gave her more room to range. There was gross negligence in depriving the Caledonia of her anchors. It would actually vitiate her insurance policy.

There was no necessity for putting craft where the Caledonia and Nini were placed. They might have been put alongside the wharves with a little more trouble. The Harbour Board was in the position of bailees of these vessels—he would not say of trespasser. The Nini paid £20 for a hulk licence.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The Harbour Board in this case took upon themselves the work of mooring, a work usually done by the crew of the boat moored.]

Mr. Searle: Under the regulations vessels that are moored pay on a certain scale. I am instructed that the Harbour Board points out a berth and the crew of the vessel does the mooring.

[De Villiers, C.J.: There was no one on board the Nini.]

Mr. Searle: No. The Harbour Board knew that and should have taken steps to protect them. There was only an old man on the Caledonia. Trouble was anticipated by three witnesses. The valuable Caledonia should never have been fastened up to these hulks, which were always regarded as dangerous. Even if the Caledonia was full of men and the Harbour Board shifted her for its own purposes, the Harbour Board had the duty of fixing the moorings. The Harbour Board had a special duty, which they did not discharge. Captain Munn and the Harbour Board knew there was not good holding ground in the river, and in 1874 there was a big flood; all these things threw a special duty on the Harbour Board. The same kind of principle applied as did to people who had a licence to do a certain thing and went beyond that licence. Counsel cited Bevan on Negligence, p. 142. The onus of proof was shifted by the conduct of the Harbour Board (Pollock on Torts, p. 380). The plaintiffs could not have objected to what the Harbour Board did; the Port Captain did not exceed his authority.

Mr. Schreiner said that the actions were brought, as the declarations set out, on the unlawful removal of the ships, and Mr. Searle had not said whether it was lawful or unlawful for the Harbour Board to shift the craft.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Then you can take it they admit the lawfulness, except as to the onus. They confine themselves to the point whether the mooring to the Alpha was negligent or not.]

Mr. Schreiner: We don't admit that the Port Captain was acting within the scope of his authority. The business of the Harbour Board is to carry on the business of the port. The clearing of the course for a regatta is not part of the operations of a Board. Probably they would act ultra vires if they gave their money to a regatta.

[Hopley, J.: What authority have you for saying that the Harbour Board can't shift ships to avoid accidents at regattas?]

Mr. Schreiner: The Harbour Board said they would not sanction the shifting of vessels for such purposes if owners objected.

Proceeding, he said that even supposing ships were shifted for the purposes of the work of the port, the Harbour Board would not be liable, and they were not liable in this case either. The only shifting contemplated by the Act was contained in section 38 of Act 36 of 1896: "If it appear to him (the Port Captain) necessary." "Necessary," either included for the purposes of a regatta or not; if not then there would be an unlawful shifting.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The question is, not whether the regatta was necessary, but, admitting the legality of the regattas, was the shifting then necessary?]

Mr. Schreiner: "Necessary" meant "necessary for the work of the port." The Court would never order a ship to shift for a regatta. The fact that the regatta was lawful did not make steps to facilitate it necessary.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Do you say it is unlawful for the Harbour Board to permit regattas?]

Mr. Schreiner: It is unlawful for them to do anything to promote a regatta.

[De Villiers, C.J.: From your plea, I don't gather your present point, that it was ultra vires of the Board to shift the ships for regatta purposes. This goes to the root of the whole matter, and should have been specifically pleaded.]

Mr. Schreiner: The declaration does not mention the regatta. The Court often takes legal points not raised on the pleadings. Dibbin v. Cape Divisional Council (14 S.C., 454).

[Hopley, J.: Have they any control over pleasure craft?]

Mr. Schreiner: Only so far as the Act and the regulations framed thereunder allow.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Is the Harbour only for business. Is it not for the convenience of the public, and is not a regatta a lawful amusement of the public. When once they give permission, does not the clearing of the course become necessary?]

Mr. Schreiner: The regatta does not need the permission of the Board; it is lawful without it. He quoted Shaw, Saville and Albion Company v. Timaru Harbour Board (15 A.C., 429), and went on. The Board can't be held liable for an Act which they are not given power by their Act to do.

Continuing, he said that regulation 9 was auxiliary to section 38. The Harbour Board could not under this section order the master of the Caledonia to shift her position for regatta purposes.

If the Board was right on this point then the case failed.

Supposing that the Port Captain was acting within the scope of his authority, the argument of the onus would fail. It would be an ordinary case of shifting, and the plaintiffs should have complied with their duty. Pilot Barrie acted as a volunteer servant of the owners of the ships. He thought he was acting as pilot under section 87 of the Act. When there was no one to moor, it was either the pilot's duty to make fast—and section 87 freed the Harbour Board from liability—or if it was not the pilot's work it was something else, and beyond the powers of the Harbour Board, and therefore the Harbour Board would not be liable.

Under section 16 of the Act, if the master had not sufficient hands the Port Captain could provide extra hands at the expense of the vessel. The Port Captain and the Harbour Board were not liable for negligence if they provided proper persons (Table Bay Harbour Board v. Bucknall Steamship Lines, 21 S.C.). In Gifford v. Commissioners of Table Bay Docks (B., 1874, p. 96) the slip was part of the Board's machinery, which the ship was going to use in the ordinary course of business. The judgment was based on bailment. If this shifting had taken place in the course of ordinary business shifting, then everything was done that ordinary care and prudence would dictate.

De Villiers, C.J., intimated that before Mr. Schreiner went on to the point of negligence, the Court would like to hear Mr. Searle on the legal point.

Mr. Searle said that point of ultra vires was not raised in the plea and was contrary to the Board's position in the correspondence. It would make the working of the port impossible if the Harbour Board could only move vessels for certain purposes. Then shippers would need to find out in every case why vessels were being shifted. They would be at the mercy of the Port Captain. The Harbour Board was given, by section 5, the control and management of the harbour. The Court would not restrain a Port Captain who had a general discretion, from moving a vessel because the owner thought it was for a reason ultra vires.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I am rather in your favour on that point, but where is the authority to the Board actually to shift the boats themselves?]

Mr. Searle: They are given general control in the Act. For the construction of Acts of this kind, he referred to Attorney-General v. Great Eastern Railway Company (42 L.T.N.S., 810, and 5 A.C., 478).

Mr. Schreiner (resuming) discussed the evidence at great length. He said one might say that none of this litigation would have been heard but for two things. (1) the idea that there was wrongful and unlawful conduct by the Board in the removal of the Nini; and (2) because the Nini's wire, which broke, was not used in attaching her to the rock anchor. The former idea had been abandoned. As to the wire, it was clear that it was such that Pilot Barrie would not use it for the re-mooring. It had also been condemned by Port Captain Munn. He submitted that under all the circumstances there was no proof such as must be produced of negligence by the Board or its officers.

In the course of argument Counsel referred to regulations 40, 50, 56, 71 and 72 of the East London Harbour Board.

Mr. Searle was not heard in reply.

De Villiers, C.J.: In this case the owners of the Caledonia and the owners of the Nini sue the Harbour Board of East London for damages for injury done to their respective vessels by reason of the negligence of the defendant Board's servants within the scope of their employment. The Caledonia was a tug, a comparatively new vessel owned by the Caledonia Company, and she had been brought from Port Elizabeth to East London because there was no work for her there, and it was considered safer and cheaper to have her in the Buffalo River rather than at Port Elizabeth. She was accordingly brought round, and the master mariner who brought her round (Captain Scholefield) has described how she was moored. Now, it is common cause that she was well moored at the place which was assigned to her by the defendant Board's officials. In regard to the Nini, which belonged to the Colonial Fisheries Company, she was at a spot somewhat lower down the river, but she also was properly moored, and to the satisfaction of the Harbour Board authorities. They had superintended the mooring, and they were quite satisfied that she was properly moored. She had, in addition to two anchors at her stern attached by a chain, a bow anchor, and she was attached by means of a wire rope, a portion of which has been produced in court. It has been suggested to the Court that that wire rope at all events was of no use to her, because that wire rope at present is in a very bad condition indeed. But that wire rope could not then have been in the condition that it is in now, bearing in mind that the rope has been submerged and exposed to weather and water for a considerable time afterwards, nearly ten months after the time this had happened. Certainly, she had attached to her bows the two anchors, one in the river, and one on shore. In addition to that, she was properly attached to two stern anchors, which would help to keep her in position, even in a strong current, and would have prevented very much ranging from the effect of the tide and from the effect of the freshet. From these safe positions, these two ships were removed by the defendant's servants, and attached to a hulk called the Alpha, which lay a little lower down the river, and somewhat nearer the shore, the Caledonia placed on one side and the Nini on the other. Both of them were fastened to the Alpha by means of breast ropes, and, in addition to that, they were tied at the stern to a buoy, which was attached to three anchors, and all three vessels were attached by means of a steel wire to this buoy. In order to bring the Nini into position, it was necessary to lengthen the chain by which she was attached to one bow anchor. She was loosened entirely from the shore anchor, which had up to that time assisted in keeping her in position, and as to the two stern anchors, they ceased to be of any use whatever to her. She was kept in position, as I have said, by the wire rope attached to the buoy. The Caledonia was attached in the same way by a wire rope to the buoy, and I think that the evidence shows that a 10-in. coir rope was fastened from her bows to the chain attached to the anchor of the Alpha, and that was the only manner in which she was kept attached to the Alpha. I am satisfied, from the evidence of Captain Martyr especially, that it was not a proper proceeding to remove the Caledonia without any anchor on board. There was no anchor on board; she was entirely free from her anchors, and Captain Martyr says it would be quite possible to have had an anchor placed on board her in such a position that in case of danger even the old man who was left in charge might have tipped it over, and so he might have kept the ship in hand in case she dragged. If that had been done, the probabilities are that she would not have undergone the fate of being dragged across the bar and lost entirely. In regard to the Nini, the chain attached to her bow anchor was very much lengthened, and I am satisfied the consequence was that there was a considerable amount of ranging which helped to create considerable friction, and that friction caused the breast ropes to break, and when once the breast ropes were broken the strain of the Nini bumping up against the Alpha was, in my opinion, so great as to be really the cause of a great part of the mischief, which subsequently followed. The only person who was a witness of everything that happened was Anderson, who happened to be on board the Alpha, and who gave his evidence in a very fair manner. He may on some points be mistaken. I think he is mistaken, for instance, on the question of whether the Nini and Caledonia were brought up on the same day. I think the Nini was brought on the day after the Caledonia, but I do not think there was any desire on the part of Anderson to give other than truthful evidence. He has no interest whatever in the case, and he seems to me to have been carefully watching things as the night wore on. After quoting at some length from Anderson's evidence, his lordship proceeded: Now, if this is a truthful statement of what happened, then I think there can be no doubt that there was negligence on the part of the person who tied these ships together, and, of course, every attempt has been made to throw doubt upon the evidence, to show that Anderson could not possibly have seen what he says he saw, but I am satisfied that he spoke truthfully, and wished to speak truthfully. It was a dark night, no doubt, but there were continual flashes of lightning, and he was awake all the night and watching how things went. If that evidence is believed, it goes far to establish negligence on the part of the defendants. But the evidence does not rest there, because it is clear from the statement of Pilot Barrie that he himself did not attach much weight to the security of the breast ropes. He considered that all that was necessary was to keep her steady, and that it was not necessary that these ropes should be very strong. He admits that they were old ropes that were used, and the same admission was made by Captain Munn, who added that they were not good ropes. It is not necessary to inquire where these ropes came from, whether from the Harbour Board or elsewhere. It was the duty of the Harbour Board's servants to see that the thing was done in a proper manner, and to use the proper appliances for it. The result of the breast ropes of the Nini giving way was, in my opinion, such as to cause the ultimate mischief. The bumping was so great as, in my opinion, to cause the wire ropes attached to the buoy to give way. It is said, if that were so, why were there not more marks upon the Alpha and upon the Nini to show that such bumping had taken place. No evidence was given as to whether it would be necessary that such marks should be upon the vessel. There may have been some amount of elasticity in these vessels which would enable them to bear a considerable amount of knocking about without signs of much external injury. At all events there has been no evidence given as to whether it would be necessary that such marks should appear on the ships after there was such severe bumping. But there was this ultimate result. When once the Nini had broken loose, and when once the attachment to the buoys was gone, with the swirl of the river and the heavy current, the rest followed, and seemed to me to follow as a matter of course. The Caledonia had no anchor on board. As soon as her fastenings were loosened she was at the mercy of the current, and she was carried away into the sea with the old man on board. It is important to observe that the mischief had begun before nine o'clock, and it was twelve o'clock when the flood was at its greatest. As to the expert evidence, there has been a good deal given on both sides. I confess I attach very great weight to the evidence of Captain Martyr, because he is not interested in the case at all, he is an experienced seaman, he has himself been a nautical assessor in shipping cases in England, he is one of the younger brethren of Trinity House, and he gave his evidence very fairly and very intelligently. Now, Captain Martyr considers there has been considerable negligence, and his remarks as to tying three vessels together seem to me to be very reasonable. He says that in the position of the vessels as shown on the model the Nini would be taking the weight of the other craft, because she was moored very forward. He also shows how the effect was that the first vessel would catch the debris coming down and pass it on to the second and the second would pass it on to the third, whereas had these vessels been moored apart the obstruction would have passed either on the one side or the other. Now, in face of that evidence, and in face of the facts proved in the case, the Court is asked to say that the same thing might have happened, if the ships had never been moved. The Court cannot enter into speculations as to what might have happened. All the Court knows is, that every precaution had been taken in the position in which the ships originally were to provide against mischief. As to the Nini, my belief is that the shore anchor, together with the other anchor, might have, and probably would have, assisted in keeping her in position, and that the dragging might not have taken place; but, in addition to that, I am of opinion also that the two stern anchors would have served to keep her in position, and would have prevented the dragging in her original moorings, and that she would have safely ridden the storm, and I hold that opinion still more particularly in regard to the Caledonia. It is suggested now that a vessel called the New Blessing might have drifted upon her. Of course, it is a possibility, and even may be a probability, but speculations of this kind cannot induce the Court, if the subsequent moorings were negligently laid, to hold that the disaster would have occurred at the original moorings. I have come to the conclusion, therefore, that the mooring of the two vessels alongside the Alpha was negligently done. It is said that it was only a temporary mooring, but if this be so there was ample time after the regatta and before the flood began to return the vessels to their original berths. Then I come to the other important question, raised by Mr. Schreiner, and that is, assuming that there was this negligence, is the defendant Board to be held liable? Counsel for the defendant has relied particularly upon the 38th section of Act 36 of 1896, which provides: "Each harbourmaster or port captain shall, between sunrise and sunset, board any vessel arriving in port as soon as practicable after her arrival, and if possible previously to her coming to anchor, in order that he may point out to the master of the vessel a proper berth; and in case he should be prevented from so boarding in consequence of the quarantine regulations he shall point out a proper berth for such vessel arriving under such circumstances, and may, if it shall to him appear necessary, order any vessel to shift or change her berth to any other berth to be pointed out." Now, by this section, the harbour master or the port captain is made the judge as to the necessity. He has the discretion alone to decide, but the contention is that it should only appear to him necessary in case it is required for the business of the port. Then, what is the business of the port? The business of the port is that the public shall have access to it. I don't think that the business of the port would mean the exclusion of rowing boats and pleasure boats; it is all part, to my mind, of the business of a port of that kind, and certainly it is admitted that a regatta would be a perfectly lawful use of the river, and I would go further and say it is a legitimate use of the river. If a regatta is occasionally held, and the harbour master comes to the conclusion that it is necessary for him to order any vessel to shift or change her berth, I am of opinion that the Harbour Master is entitled to give the order, and if there were a vessel anchored in the Bay, with her master and crew on board, I think the master would have to obey his orders, and they would not be entitled to inquire whether it were for a regatta or not. This, to my mind, seems to be recognised by the regulations of the Board itself (regulation No. 9 read). That is a rule that would apply where there are a master and crew on board. But what would happen if no master and crew are on board? The regulations contemplate such a case, contemplate that there may be a hulk, or a condemned vessel for which an annual licence is required. If there be no master and crew on board I presume either previous notice must be given to the owners of the ship to come and move it, or the harbour master may remove it. In the present case no such notice was given. Neither the owners of the Nini, nor of the Caledonia, were asked to come and move their vessels. The harbour master took it upon himself to remove them, and if in the course of such removal and remooing there is negligence, it seems to be that the work being done in the ordinary course of the employment or service of the Harbour Board, and that the Harbour Board should be held liable. I see nothing ultra vires in it. A case has been cited, that of Shaw, Savill, and Albion Co. v. Tamaru Harbour Board (15 Appeal Cases, 429), which in my opinion does not affect the present case. The other case which has been cited on behalf of defendants was that of the Rhosina (10 Probate Division, 24). It is an important circumstance that in the last case the Harbour Commissioners were held liable because the harbour master was held to be acting within the scope of his authority when he gave the directions to beach. He gave the directions to beach at a particular time, and the effect of that beaching was that the ship came down upon the anchor, and this was held to be negligence on the part of the harbour master and the Harbour Commissioners were held to be liable. But I do not think that this case gives any support to the conclusion of the defendants. I am quite satisfied that it was quite within the power and within the authority of the Harbour Master to act as he did, and to give instructions to the servants of the Board to do what was necessary for the removal of the plaintiff's vessels. Those servants, acting within the scope of authority, did the work. The damage was caused by the negligent manner in which the work was done. That work was superintended by Pilot Barrie, but not in his capacity as pilot and, therefore, the 38th section of the Act does not apply. The result is that the defendant Board must be held liable for the damage done to both these ships. As to the Nini, she was a very old hulk, and we have it she had some coal on board. The Court estimates her value to be about £150, and the value of the coal to be about £100, so that there will be judgment for the owners of the Nini for £250, with costs. With regard to the Caledonia, her cost price was £4,500, she had seen some wear and tear, and there does not seem to have been a very good market for tugs of that kind, and, under the circumstances, the Court is of opinion that she was worth about £3,000, so that there will be judgment for the owners of the Caledonia for £3,000, with costs.

Hopley, J.: I do not propose to give in detail my reasons for concurring in the judgment which has just been delivered. In the main I agree with the reasoning of His Lordship the Chief Justice as to the causes of the disaster to the two vessels in question and as to the finding that the servants of the defendants were negligent in the matter. I do not think that great blame should be attributed to them for such negligence, since the circumstances which took place were unexpected, and probably unexampled in human memory, and they had provided for an ordinary and normal state of things. Still I agree that to moor three vessels together in the manner in which these vessels were tied and moored in a river liable to be affected by abnormal occurrences, such as freshets and floods, was a negligent act liable to cause damage in the event of anything unexpected or abnormal occurring. With regard to what actually caused the mischief, I think that no one has given enough attention to the combined effect of the local and inland rainfall and the subsequent floods in the local creeks and from the headwaters and inland tributaries. The evidence shows that the rainfall was very heavy on the East Bank of the Buffalo at and near East London, that the first and second creeks were flooded and that they discharged an immense volume of water into the river. This water, no doubt, caused a considerable rise in the river at a comparatively early hour of the evening, and when the inland waters began to arrive the waters from the creeks meeting these at right angles would naturally set up powerful swirls and eddies, which it would be difficult for any craft moored within their circuit to resist. Especially I think the waters from the First Creek meeting those from the Second Creek and from inland would set up such a swirl just where the Alpha, the Caledonia and the Nini were tied together, and in my opinion the action of such an eddy is sufficient to account for the tearing away of the stern moorings of these three vessels from the anchors to which they were fastened. I do not think that these steel ropes were broken by the "Nini's" getting loose and bumping against the "Alpha," because I am of opinion that had that bumping been hard enough to have had such an effect it would have smashed the two hulks, or at all events would have left severe marks upon them. I have no doubt but that there was some bumping, but I think that it probably happened after the vessels were loosened from their stern moorings. I am aware that no one has relied upon the theory of this swirl, but it seems to me certain that there must have been such a result of two mighty forces of water acting at right angles to each other; and it also seems to me to account for all the phenomena of the night in question and for all that happened to the shipping in the river. But, if I am right, it does not seem to me to exonerate the defendants, but rather to add an additional reason for finding them negligent.

They should know their harbour and the probable effects of such floods upon the shipping; and, if at a time when rain was threatening and actually falling, they moored and left three vessels in such a position, they cannot be said to have done what was reasonably careful and diligent under the circumstances. On the application of Mr. Searle, the Court certified Mr. Womersley (representing the owners of the Caledonia) and Mr. Monk (representing the owners of the Nini) as necessary witnesses, and allowed expenses of preparation of model, used in the case.

She was too poor to take proceedings against the executor dative. The necessary affidavits were filed.

Leave was granted.

Ex parte OTTOSTROM.

Dr. Greer appeared for applicant, and Mr. Burton for respondent.

Dr. Greer said this was an application for leave to sue in forma pauperis. The rule nisi had not yet been applied for.

Mr. Burton said the opposition was based on the facts.

Dr. Greer said the petitioner was working on a lighter at Port Nolloth, when, owing to negligence, in not properly fastening it, portion of the derrick fell on him. He had been in hospital for three months, and in consequence of his injuries was unable to earn the wages he formerly did. He contended he had sustained damage to the extent of £1,000.

Mr. Burton read affidavits from the respondents, Stephan Bros., which stated that the applicant was in the employment of the Cape Copper Co. He had no right to be standing under the derrick, the accident was mainly due to his own negligence. The employees of the Cape Copper Company were lured by the respondents to do the work.

Dr. Greer said his client set forth certain facts which would be contested at the trial of the case.

Maasdorp, J., said he thought the affidavits made by respondent should be answered and the case made more clear.

The case was ordered to stand over.

In re THE B.S.A. ASPHALTE CO. (IN LIQUIDATION).

Mr. Molteno presented the second report of the official liquidators of the B.S.A. Asphalte and Manufacturing Co., Limited.

The report was ordered to lie open for inspection for a fortnight.

Ex parte MOHR.

Dr. Greer moved for an order authorising the payment of certain money. The petitioner's affidavit stated that his father had farmed a farm named Kleinbergvliet at Diep River until about 8 years ago, when realising that his continued ill-health, and also lack of money, were rendering it impossible for him to continue farming, he contemplated selling the farm, but after consulting some of his children, and on the undertaking of the petitioner gratuitously to maintain his parents until death, and to discharge the interest on the bonds affecting the farm, etc., and on the understanding that petitioner be permitted to work part of the farm for his own account, and be allowed, when so disposed, to purchase the farm, the intention to sell the farm was abandoned. Since then the petitioner had carried out his undertaking, and had enhanced the value of the farm, and had maintained his parents, who were invalids, at great expense. Believing that he would ultimately become the purchaser of the farm, petitioner from time to time made various improvements, and erected a cottage, which his brother had occupied for five years rent free. Petitioner's brothers also resided and worked for their own benefit on portions of the farm without paying any rent therefor, or discharging any of the rates. In December, 1880, the father of petitioner and his wife made a joint will, whereby the survivor was appointed heir to the joint estate, which was to be possessed during the lifetime of the survivor as his or her free personal property, and after the death of the survivor to devolve on the children. In a statement of assets and liabilities submitted to the Master after the death of the wife, the farm figured as the only asset, and was valued at £425. Petitioner knew of the will, but thought it gave the survivor (Claus Frederick Mohr) absolute ownership in the farm. Claus Frederick Mohr on several occasions requested petitioner to purchase and take transfer of the farm, and six weeks before Mohr's death petitioner purchased the farm for £1,800. Petitioner received transfer and paid £125 on account, and passed a bond in favour of Claus Frederick Mohr for the balance. In connection with this petitioner disbursed the sums of £36 for transfer duty, and £20 7s. for stamps. About 10 days after the transfer had been effected some of the children of Claus Frederick Mohr, having been advised that their father had no such power of alienation under the will, applied for an interdict against Claus Frederick Mohr and petitioner restraining the former from parting with the bond and restraining petitioner from transferring away, or in any way encumbering, the farm. Before the application could be heard Claus died. Eventually an interdict was granted restraining petitioner, pending an amicable settlement between the parties. After several attempts at an amicable arrangement, it was decided to submit the farm to public auction, when £4,500 was realised for it. Applicants in the case then wrote and asked petitioner to pay their taxed costs in connection with the interdict, and not desiring to incur further costs he paid their costs, £25 8s. 2d., and his own, £19 18s. 7d. Thereafter, in order that the estate might be transferred to the purchaser, petitioner transferred the farm back to the estate, and incurred an expenditure of £16 4s. 6d. in stamp. Petitioner had applied to the Treasury for a refund of the transfer duty paid by him in connection with the transfer from his father to him, and for exemption from the transfer duty in connection with the transfer back to the estate, to which they acceded. Petitioner concluded he was entitled to receive the other disbursements in connection with the transfer of the property out of the estate.

The affidavit of the respondents, Messrs. A. J. Chiappini and J. H. Brucker, executors testamentary in the estate, and who were represented by Mr. Burton, was to the effect that they admitted that the amounts claimed had been incurred, but were not satisfied that the estate was liable without the express sanction of the courts.

The application was granted, costs to come out of the estate.

Ex parte ESTATE WILDREDGE.

Mr. Sutton moved for a rule nisi under the Derelict Lands Act to be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

McKINNON V. McKINNON.

This was an application brought by Elizabeth Gordon McKinnon, of Woodstock, upon notice to her husband, John H. McKinnon, to show cause why he should not pay over to her £50 to enable her to prosecute proceedings for judicial separation, and also for alimony pendente lite.

The affidavits were of a conflicting character, and disclosed extremely strained relationships between husband and wife. The parties were married in Aberdeen, Scotland, and they had four children. Applicant said that she was suing for a judicial separation by reason of her husband's cruelty, personal violence, and gross insults, that he had turned her out of the house, and that she was without means. The husband admitted that there had been disagreements, but he denied the alleged violence or cruelty, and said that there was no reason why applicant, who left the house, should not return to her home and live happily with him (the respondent) and the children. He added that he was unable to provide funds for the applicant to proceed with her action. Applicant filed replying affidavits, denying respondent's allegations. It transpired that the wife was living with some friends next door to the husband and children.

Dr. Greer was for applicant; Mr. M. Bisset was for respondent.

Dr. Greer having been heard in argument on the facts,

Maasdorp, J.: The Court will not now decide upon their merits the questions in dispute between the parties, but I must say that the information given by the applicant in this case is of the very vaguest description. We have a general statement that he ill-treated and cruelly treated her, without giving any instances from which the Court can ascertain whether what she complains of were really acts of ill-treatment and cruelty. The information, therefore, as it stood, would have been sufficient for the Court to refuse now to give an order. But the application will be refused on another ground. It seems upon the statement of the applicant herself that respondent earns £14 a month, and that he has to support four children. I have come to the conclusion that he is not in a position, even though the Court might have held that she was entitled to some assistance, now to render such assistance. It is impossible for him to contribute to this litigation when he has got these four children to support. Under the circumstances, applicant having no means, and respondent not being in a position to assist her, she still, if she have a good cause of action, can proceed in another way, and the Court will grant her the necessary indulgence if she puts a better case before the Court. The Court might now have assisted her by allowing her to sue in forma pauperis if she had put the requisite information on affidavit. Application refused; no order as to costs.

Ex parte LIQUIDATORS, CLARKE AND CO., LTD.

Mr. Close again mentioned this matter, which was an application for leave to petitioners to enter into certain agreement with one Frederick James Rowland Horne, managing director of Rowland Horne and Co., Limited, whereby Mr. Horne had purchased certain claims by F. H. Clarke and Co., Limited, against Rowland Horne and Co., Ltd.

Maasdorp, J., said that all the parties seemed to be before the Court, and the compromise would be sanctioned. Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte SOUTH AFRICAN WIDOWS' FUND SOCIETY.

Mr. Moltano moved on the petition of certain elderly ladies, who are the surviving widows of the fund, for an order upon the Master to pay out to petitioners the assets in his hands belonging to the society. The fund dated back to the year 1831, and was formed with the sanction of Sir Lowry Cole, the Governor at that time.

The Master had prepared a lengthy report, from which it appeared that the capital of the fund had been reduced to £1,950. He agreed that the time had arrived when the society might be dissolved. There were only four widows surviving, the eldest being 87 years of age, and the youngest 77. The Master recommended the appointment of Mr. J. E. P. Close as liquidator of the society.

Rule nisi granted, calling upon all persons concerned to show cause on the 12th September why the application should not be granted, rule to be published once in the "Cape Times," "South African News," and "One Land."

Ex parte SILBERMAN.

Mr. Lewis moved for certain rule nisi authorising petitioner to sue her husband in forma pauperis by edictal citation for restitution of conjugal rights to be made absolute. It was stated that respondent had completely disappeared, and that substituted service of the rule had been made.

Rule absolute and leave to sue by edictal citation granted, the citation to be returnable on the 30th November, and to be published once in the "Government Gazette" and the "Cape Times." The case was referred to Mr. Lewis as counsel, and Mr. Buiski as attorney, of petitioner.

ESTATE BLACK V. DOORTJE.

Dr. Rainsford moved for the removal of trial to the ensuing Circuit Court at Prieska.

Trial removed accordingly.

Ex parte WATSON.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan moved for the appointment of commissioners to take the evidence of certain persons regarding certain transactions of Jacob Rittenberg and Peter Kaplan, trading as Rittenberg and Co., of whose insolvent estate petitioner is trustee.

Order granted, appointing the Resident Magistrate of East London, or, failing him, the Assistant Resident Magistrate, to take the evidence of witnesses in East London, and Mr. Advocate Giddy to take the evidence of witnesses in Cape Town.

Ex parte ESTATE MEINTJES.

Mr. McGregor moved for authority to dispose of certain property in the estate. The application raised a question of construction of a certain will.

Maasdorp, J., ordered the application to stand over, pending further information as to the age of the surviving spouse, whether there are further descendants, and as to the value of the property.

REYNOLDS V. ZILTSMAN AND CHURCH.

This was an application upon notice to respondents to show cause why they should not release certain two villas situate at the Grove, Claremont, from the operation of a second mortgage bond for £2,000.

The application was brought to enable applicant to pass transfer of Marie Villa to the purchaser, Mr. Buchanan. Church had bought the other property, Leslie Villa. The bond, it appeared, was raised in 1904 as a security to respondents upon becoming surety to the bank for certain overdraft of £700 against the applicant.

The applicant alleged that respondents refused to release the property from the bond, in defiance of a verbal agreement entered into between the parties. Respondents, however, denied that they were acting contrary to any agreement. Mr. Zietsman said that he had been quite willing to sign the release, so long as Mr. Church would. Mr. Church said that he had not been approached to sign.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones was for applicant; Mr. Roux was for the first respondent, and Mr. Pohl was for the second respondent.

Counsel for respondents intimated that they would be prepared to consent to the release of the property, provided that applicant paid the costs.

Mr. Jones then proceeded to argue the question of costs.

Maasdorp, J.: It seems in this case that upon the two respondents guaranteeing the payment of an overdraft in the bank due by the applicant, a bond was given upon the two properties mentioned in the application to secure the respondents in case they should be called upon to pay the overdraft. Well, under ordinary circumstances, they would be entitled to retain this bond until the overdraft is settled; until their indebtedness upon their guarantee is satisfied by the applicant. But it is stated by the applicant that there was a verbal agreement under which the respondents, under certain circumstances, set forth in the affidavits, would consent to the release of the bond. Now, the question is whether such a verbal agreement was entered into. On the one side there is the statement of the applicant that it was, and on the other the respondents say that they never entered into such an agreement at all. It would, therefore, be quite impossible upon these affidavits to decide the dispute between the parties. It now appears, however, that the respondents, as I take it, merely to accommodate applicant, are prepared to consent to the bonds being cancelled. It is not, therefore, necessary now to go further into that part of the case. The matter now resolves itself merely into a question of costs, and, under all the circumstances, I think that, if the respondents had not now been willing to give their consent, the applicant would necessarily have failed. The Court will make no order on the application, but the applicant will be ordered to pay costs. The application is refused, with costs.

HEPWORTHS, LTD. V. GRESHAM LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY, LTD.

Mr. McGregor appeared for applicants, and Mr. De Waal for the respondents.

Mr. De Waal said he intended applying for a postponement of the case to September 12. The papers in the case had only been handed to him at 10.30 this morning, and Mr. Searle had also been briefed in the case, but was unable to appear. The postponement could not effect the applicant.

Mr. McGregor explained Hepworths, Limited, had agreed to pay one Ohlsson the sum of £100 a month for ten months to satisfy a claim made on the lessor of the estate, and which consisted of £75 a month, the rent of the premises, and £25 a month which the lessor had to pay Hepworths. The respondents held a bond over the place. They had an action pending against the applicants. The difficulty that arose was that provisional sentence had been obtained for £22,000, and the rents had been declared executable. Hepworths had agreed to pay Ohlsson £100 a month on the first of each month, and if the amount was not paid there might be trouble.

The matter was ordered to stand over, the costs to be costs in the cause. The rents not to be paid over to the Sheriff in the meantime.

GELDERBLOM V. GELDERBLOM.

Mr. Van Zyl moved on behalf of applicant, Isaac Johannes Geldenblom, to have a certain award made a rule of Court.

The affidavit of the applicant stated that he and respondent subscribed to a deed of submission dated March 8, 1906, wherein they submitted to arbitration the division of three farms situate in the Riversdale district. They agreed, with regard to division of two of the farms, but with regard to the division of the third farm, Rietvlei, they could not agree, and called in the assistance of an umpire. The umpire made his award, which was erroneously dated March 4, 1906, instead of April 4, 1906, and applicant was desirous of having the award amended and made a rule of Court.

Mr. Upington, who opposed the application, read the affidavit of the respondent, Christian Johannes Geldenblom, who stated that he admitted all the facts contained in applicant's affidavit, with regard to the finding of the arbitrators and the calling in of the umpire, but alleged that the umpire made his award in his absence and the absence of his arbitrator, and that he did not divide the farm in a partial or fair manner. The decision of the umpire would necessitate the cutting up of the farm into four parts, which would ruin it.

The replying affidavit of the applicant stated he asked the respondent to accompany the umpire to the farm or to send his arbitrator, and he did not do either. He contended that the award was a fair one.

The affidavit of the umpire stated that on the day he was called in to deliberate between the parties he asked respondent to accompany him and show him the division lines, but he refused to go. He was accompanied by applicant and his arbitrator, and when he returned he stopped with respondent, who pointed out some lines of division. He drew up his award without being influenced by anybody, and while quite alone.

[Maasdorp, J.: Was the division to be an equal division?—Yes, taking everything into consideration.

Mr. Upington contended that in the applicant's replying affidavits there were many allegations which required to be answered.

[Maasdorp, J.: Then we had better settle that point at once.]

Mr. Upington: In the applicant's original affidavit he just makes the bald statement that the award has been made.

Maasdorp, J., said the matter would have to stand over, as the allegations now contained in the replying affidavit raised new ground.

The matter was ordered to stand over.

N'KOMO V. UTSHING.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones appeared for applicant.

Mr. Russell appeared for respondent and applied for a postponement.

Mr. Jones said he would agree if the respondent agreed not to sell the cattle in dispute until the case was heard.

Mr. Russell said he could not undertake to do that. He had communicated with his client and asked him if he would consent, but had not received a reply.

The matter was ordered to stand over until September 12, an order interdicting the respondent from disposing of the property in the meantime to issue.

WALKER V. SYFRET, GOD- { 1906.
LONDON AND LOW. { Aug. 31st.

Attorney and client—General agency work—Taxation of costs.

No provision is made by the Rules of Court for the taxation of costs between attorney and client. It is however, the practice for the taxing officer to tax such costs if requested to do so by the attorney, and should the attorney proceed to sue for his costs without having had his bill taxed, the Court can order this to be done, provided that the items in the bill relate either wholly or chiefly to litigious business and not to matters of general agency.

This was an application calling on the respondents to show cause why they should not have a certain bill of costs taxed.

The affidavit of John Francis Hartnady, of the firm of Messrs. Dold and Van Breda, attorneys, stated he had charge of the applicant's business with the firm. The respondents had been his attorneys, but in February, 1905, his business was transferred to Messrs. Dold and Van Breda, when all his papers were transferred. Certain bills of costs due to respondents were submitted to applicant, and one entitled "general business" he declined to pay until it had been taxed.

The answering affidavit of Mr. Goddinton, of the respondent firm, stated that they agreed to undertake the applicant's business on his paying £100 down and sending money when it was required. Although they transacted a considerable amount of business for him, he did not for some time after they began to practice for him lodge £100. They declined to act further for him in February, and later on the respondents received a letter from Messrs. Dold and Van Breda enclosing a letter from respondent accusing them of unprofessional conduct. They replied that he would either have to withdraw his statement or prove it in a court of law. The respondents contended that a bill for general business did not come within the jurisdiction of the Taxing Master.

Mr. Russell appeared for applicant and Mr. Upington for the respondents.

Mr. Upington, in argument, contended that the respondents had been very badly treated by the applicant, and consequently that he did not deserve any clemency. Under Rule 36 of Court, general business between an attorney and a client did not come under the Taxing Master, as it did not refer to litigation.

Mr. Russell contended that the bill of costs was liable to taxation. In Van Zyl, page 808, it was stated that costs between attorney and client were taxable on the same principle as those between party and party. This decision was adhered to by the Chief Justice in an unreported case. On page 816, Van Zyl qualified his statement by saying the taxing officer cannot tax a bill of costs for general professional services, or in respect of non-contentious matter only. Still, if the client desire it, and could show reasonable cause for it, there was nothing to prevent the Court specially referring such a bill to the taxing officer for taxation, even though it contains merely charges for general professional services or non-contentious matter.

[Maasdorp, J.: If an action is brought against you on the Bill, then the Court need not go through all the items, but can refer the Bill if it wishes to the taxing master, but when the matter is not before the Court, how can you compel taxation?]

Mr. Russell: They have demanded the money from us. I understand that the bill has been paid.

[Maasdorp, J.: Then why this motion?]

Mr. Russell: They had some money belonging to my client, and they stopped the amount of their bill out of it.

[Maasdorp, J.: Are there any items for litigation in the account?]

Mr. Russell: It looks like it, my lord. There is the preparation of an appeal case in England.

[Maasdorp, J.: But that does not come within the jurisdiction of this Court.]

Mr. Russell: There is an item for copying pleadings on August 4.

[Maasdorp, J.: I do not see that date in the copy before me.]

Mr. Russell contended that many of the items seemed as though they were connected with litigation.

[Maasdorp, J.: Some of them do.]

Mr. Upington: None of this is on affidavit. I object to the elaborate explanation of each item by my learned friend.

[Maasdorp, J., said he would like to have some information on the point that the respondent's had funds in their hands to pay themselves when they complained that they hitherto could not get funds.]

Mr. Upington submitted that the Bill was one for general professional services, and certainly the Taxing Master would experience considerable difficulty in allocating the different items to different suits.

Maasdorp, J., said it appeared that the respondents acted as attorneys for the applicant, and did the work of general agency for him. They made out three bills for work done by them for the applicant, two of these seemed to have reference to work done by them as attorneys in respect of matters of litigation. The third was the Bill before the Court, and on which the present application was made. The two bills that had reference to litigation were properly taxed by the taxing officer and duly paid. The present Bill the respondents regarded as having connection with matters of general agency, and not with matters of litigation before the Court, and they did not put it before the taxing master on the ground that the work was not done as attorneys in matters of litigation, and that under the Rules of Court the taxing officer would not consider it his duty to tax such a Bill. Now, the question was whether this was a Bill referring to matters of litigation or not. It was a very long Bill, and the great bulk of the items that he had looked at seemed to have no reference at all to matters of litigation, but referred to general work of agency done by the respondents for the applicant. Taking the Bill as a whole, it was not such a Bill as a Court would refer to the taxing officer. It was quite possible that there might be some little item here and there which the applicant might have good ground to object to as being introduced into such a Bill, and if the matter was properly brought before the Court, and such items questioned upon the respondent suing the applicant for his debt, these particular items might be considered proper items to put before the taxing officer, but it was impossible for the Court to pick them out, for they were of a very trivial character, and were few in number. The Rules of Court did not provide for the taxation of Bills as between attorney and client, but undoubtedly the Court had the power to refer such matters to the taxing officer, and, moreover, it had become the practice of the taxing master to tax them if they were put before him, as was often done, by attorneys at the request of their clients, but if the attorney refused to put them and proceeded in the Courts to recover the amount of his Bill, then the Court could order them to be taxed. The question before the Court was whether this Bill which contained a vast number of items of general agency should be sent to the taxing master. He held that that particular Bill did not fall within the authorities cited, and was not a Bill that the Court should refer to the taxing master. Therefore the application would be refused, with costs.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

FINLAYSON V. FINLAYSON. { 1906.
Sept. 3rd.

This was an action brought by Alexander Finlayson, of Oudtshoorn, against his wife, Catherine Finlayson, of Cape Town, for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce and custody of the child of the marriage. Respondent claimed in reconvention a judicial separation from the plaintiff on the ground of his alleged cruelty and intemperance, and custody of the child.

It transpired that there were proceedings between the parties some years ago, when the present respondent proposed to institute an action for judicial separation on the ground of her husband's cruelty. Since that time Mrs. Finlayson, who had supported herself by nursing, had had custody of the child.

Dr. Greer was for plaintiff; Mr. Upington was for defendant.

Formal proof of the marriage having been given,

Alexander Finlayson (the plaintiff) said that he was married in community of property at the Resident Magistrate's Office, Cape Town, on the 1st May, 1900. After marriage, they lived for some time at Wynberg. They continued to live happily together until her mother interfered. His wife left him in December, 1901. Witness was sick at that time. He requested his wife to come back to him. Her father sent her back to him the first time, but that was before December, 1901. After December, 1901, she never came back to him. Witness denied that he had been cruel to his wife. He denied that he was of intemperate habits. He was willing and able to provide his wife with a home if she would return to him. He was a lineaman in the Telegraph Department.

Cross-examined: Witness was formerly employed by the Tramway Co. as a motorman, and was dismissed from that appointment because he was drunk on duty. He admitted that the statement in his affidavit to the effect that he left the company's service of his own accord was untrue. He had got drunk at times. After McGuinness's wedding he had to be helped into a tram, because he was drunk. He denied that on that occasion he assaulted his wife when he got home. He remembered a moonlight walk that they had round the Kloof. They called at the Round House, where witness had a drink. He denied that he assaulted his wife on that occasion, or that he assaulted one Woodthorpe. He remembered that one Sullivan tackled him and put him to the ground. On the night of the 11th December, 1901, his wife went out to see her parents. He admitted that he barred the house. He refused to open the door when his wife came at six and nine o'clock that evening.

Mrs. Finlayson alleged that her husband used constantly to be intoxicated, and frequently ill-treated her. She did not consider that he was a fit person to leave a young child with.

Cross-examined by Dr. Greer: She refused to go back to him now. She had not been influenced by any other person in this matter.

By the Court: Plaintiff had assaulted her mother, and had been charged for this at the Wynberg Police Court.

Cross-examination continued: She believed that plaintiff had given up drink recently.

James Stephen, sergeant in the City Police, stated that on Friday morning last plaintiff was brought to Wale-street Police Station charged with drunkenness on railway premises. His bail was estreated.

Edward Sullivan, tramway conductor, said that about 1901 witness and the parties to the suit went around the Kloof. On this occasion plaintiff struck his wife, and tried to throw her over an embankment.

Buchanan, J.: The plaintiff was in the habit of giving way to intoxication, and on one occasion, when his wife visited her parents, he locked her out. This was the alleged desertion. She was prepared to go back to him, but he was intoxicated, and then she went back to her parents and refused to return. It had been proved that the husband did strike his wife, and she said that he also kicked her. Husband and wife took each other for better or worse, and in this case, happily, there was no evidence of unfaithfulness on either side. But the husband had bad and vicious habits that might lead to great unhappiness unless overcome. The desertion of the wife had not been established, and therefore judgment could not be given for the plaintiff. As to the wife's plea for a separation, her case almost entirely rested on the intemperance. His lordship held that nothing whatever justified a man in raising his hand or foot against a woman. But for the fact that the plaintiff arrived in Cape Town drunk so recently as Friday last, there would have been little ground to justify a judicial separation. But he was still intemperate in his habits, and there would be an order for judicial separation, in the hope that the plaintiff would still reform and exercise more self-control, and there would then perhaps be some hope of the parties coming together again. The plaintiff's petition would be dismissed. The wife would succeed on her claim in reconvention, and she would have the custody of the child; plaintiff to have reasonable access to it, and pay £1 10s. per month to its support, until the child was 16 years of age. The plaintiff would pay the costs.

GENERAL MOTION.

In re ERLANK.

In this case petitioner asked for leave to sue his wife by edictal citation for his interest under an ante-nuptial contract, and to attach her interest in a certain flock of sheep to found jurisdiction.

Mr. Douglas Buchanan was for applicant.

Rule nisi granted, personal service to be effected, rule returnable on October 18.

REX V. JEBINS. { 1906.

Magistrate — Irregularity — Stock theft.

De Villiers, C.J.: In this case the accused was tried before the Assistant Resident Magistrate of Fraserburg, sitting at Williston, for theft of stock, under Act 35 of 1893. He pleaded not guilty, but was found guilty, and sentenced to be imprisoned for three months, with hard labour, and to receive ten lashes. Against this judgment and sentence the accused appealed, and it appeared on the appeal that the accused had gone to a kraal, where seven sheep had arrived, and one of the sheep being caught, accused went up, and said, "That is the sheep I have to get," and thereupon that sheep was handed over to him. It seems that the day before this took place, he had been sent by his aunt to a neighbouring farm to buy a sheep for her. The farmer said she could have a sheep, and he would send some sheep into town on the following day, when she could send for the sheep. The following morning the aunt sent the boy to go and fetch the sheep in the kraal, because she had seen the sheep coming in. It was this message from the aunt which induced the accused to ask for the sheep. It appears there was some mistake. A man called De Klerk, who was the head constable of the place had also bought a sheep, and this sheep which had been caught was not intended for the aunt, but for the chief constable. The chief constable says on oath he saw this boy carrying the sheep. He asked the boy, "Whose sheep are you carrying?" and he said, "That is my sheep," meaning, of course, the sheep which the boy believed was his aunt's. It afterwards appeared that this sheep had been caught and removed to the aunt's house, and he sent a constable for the accused. A constable went there, and found that the sheep had been killed. He told the boy then to take the sheep to the Magistrate's office; there it was taken possession of apparently by De Klerk, and he then seems to have instituted these proceedings against the boy. Upon that the boy was found guilty. When the case came before the Court of Appeal, it was directed that there should be further evidence taken so as to ascertain whether there was not a mistake. The boy was not examined on oath at all; he did not tender his evidence; it seems that his aunt heard of the case the first time after the trial. He carried the carcass to the Magistrate's office, and there and then he was put into the dock. The poor boy was taken aback, and did not know what to say. The Court has exercised the power which in this case turned out to be a very beneficial power, of authorising further evidence to be taken. The Magistrate, after taking further evidence, reports: (1) At the hearing of this case before me on the 25th July last, the accused was found guilty, and sentenced, notice of appeal being lodged the same day. (2) In accordance with the judgment of the Chief Justice, delivered on 6th inst., further evidence for the prosecution, as well as for the defence, was taken by me on 24th idem. Had that evidence been given at the trial, it would have entirely satisfied me as to the innocence of the accused, and my finding would undoubtedly have been one of "Not guilty." (3) I sincerely regret that further inquiries were not instituted before the case was tried. At the trial I endeavoured to elicit as many facts as possible during the examination of the witnesses, and if the accused had but made a statement in his own defence, I should have been bound to adjourn the case, in order to afford him an opportunity of producing confirmatory evidence. But he declined to make any statement—his explanation now is that he did not know how to make a statement, and having no knowledge of his antecedents, I came to the conclusion that he did not wish to commit himself. (4) Head Constable De Klerk, who was in charge of the case, stated, in the course of his further evidence (p. 10), that before the trial he brought certain information to my notice. I think he is under a misapprehension, for although he consulted me as to what crime (if any) could be charged, I have no recollection of his mentioning any point in the case. As police officer, the investigation of the case was entirely in his hands, but his evidence (pp. 9 and 10) shows that, although in possession of the information referred to, he did not investigate the same, as he thought it would not materially affect the case. In the light of the facts disclosed by the evidence of William Higge, Lydia Klaagen, and the accused, it is apparent, if such investigation had been made, the whole matter would have been cleared up. I think that the Magistrate, under the circumstances, might at the trial have made some further inquiries, because it was so palpable that this boy did the whole thing openly, and that he could not have been guilty of theft. But this chief constable was not only acting in his public capacity, but also in his private capacity, because he said that he thought the sheep was intended for him, and when the boy brought back the sheep he thought the sheep was his own. I wish to refer to some of the evidence given by the chief constable. It is somewhat curious. He says: "It is not usual to meet charges such as the present one with summonses. Arrests are made with or without warrant. Upon the accused being charged at the office with the crime of the theft of stock, I treated him as being under arrest. I hold that my action is consistent with section 28 of Act 35 of 1893." Now, that section says: "If there be reasonable ground for believing that any person is or has been in unlawful possession of any stock or produce, it shall be competent for any justice of the peace, Field-cornet, landholder, or police constable to apprehend or cause to be apprehended such person without warrant, and convey him, or cause him to be conveyed, in custody before any Resident Magistrate having jurisdiction, and, if it be found that he is or has been in possession of any such stock or produce, and is not able to give a satisfactory account of such possession to such magistrate, he shall be deemed to be guilty of the crime of theft of stock or produce, and shall thereupon be dealt with as if he had originally been charged with such crime." In this case there certainly is no reasonable ground for believing that this boy was not entitled to possession of this stock. The practice of arresting without warrant has really become far too prevalent in this colony. In ordinary cases of crime being committed, the Ordinance 40 of 1828 (section 23) does not give those large powers which are generally supposed to belong to constable and police officers: "The Sheriff and his deputies, Superintendent of Police and his deputy, and field-cornets and all constables, police officers, or other officers of the law proper to the execution of criminal warrants, have the power of arresting in cases of crimes or breaches of the peace committed in their presence, or of the commission of which they have credible information from others, and after taking the offender, such Sheriff or other officer shall immediately carry the offender before the nearest magistrate, to be dealt with according to law." Then the 12th section of Ordinance 73 extends the power somewhat: " . . . police officers . . . shall be hereby authorised and required to arrest every person who shall commit any crime or breach of the peace in their presence; as also every person whom they shall have reasonable grounds to suspect of having committed any murder, culpable homicide . . . or theft of any cattle, sheep, or goat; or any other crime of equal degree of guilt with the crimes aforesaid; as also every person whom they shall see engaged in committing any affray, or whom they shall find attempting to commit a crime, or clearly manifesting an intention so to do." Now this case does not, in my opinion, fall within any of those classes. There was no reason whatever to suspect this boy of theft. He had come there openly on behalf of his aunt to ask for the sheep, and when he was found skinning the sheep at his aunt's, some explanation ought to have been asked for by the constable of the aunt of the boy. There is no explanation asked; this boy is shoved into the dock, evidence for the prosecution is given against him, there is no opportunity for him to defend himself, and but for the interference of the Supreme Court appeal, the boy might have had his ten lashes and imprisonment for three months. The appeal must be allowed, and the conviction and sentence quashed.

Ex parte UNION-CASTLE (1906.
STEAMSHIP CO. (Sept. 5th.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved, as a matter of urgency, for the attachment of certain barques lying at East London, pending an action to be brought by petitioners, the Union-Castle Steamship Co., Ltd. Petitioners stated that on August 18 last the R.M.S. Briton arrived at East London from Port Elizabeth, having on board the captain and crew of the Norwegian barque Cingalese, who were taken off the said barque at their special request, and after considerable danger and risk, owing to the heavy weather prevailing, as they said she was in a sinking condition, and that, in their opinion, she would not remain afloat for an hour longer. Captain W. H. Harris, the company's marine superintendent at East London, decided to make an attempt to save the barque, and the company's steam tug Stork was sent out to look for the barque, and she brought the Cingalese into port next morning. The Cingalese was owned by the Cingalese Company of Ziansand, Norway, and was carrying a cargo of mangrove bark from Mozambique to Hamburg when she was abandoned by her captain and crew. Petitioners had submitted to the owners a claim for £2,000 for salvage, but as the amount had not been paid, and no undertaking or guarantee had been given for its payment, petitioners were desirous of taking proceedings for its recovery. Petitioners added that the cargo was deteriorating, owing to salt water getting in.

Order granted giving leave to petitioners to attach the ship and cargo ad fundandam jurisdictionem, and to sue by edict as prayed, citation, interdict, and necessary notices to be served personally on owners of ship and cargo, citation returnable on November 14, and the Deputy Sheriff of East London to have authority to deal with cargo in such manner as may be necessary for its preservation, costs to be costs in the cause.

WOLFAARD V. NEL. { 1906.
 { Sept. 5th.

Mr. Van Zyl moved as a matter of urgency for an interdict restraining the transfer of a certain farm, pending an action.

The petitioner, Johannes Cornelius Wolfaard, is a farmer, and owns a farm called Rondekop, being a portion of the divided quitrent farm Floriskraal, in the Laingsburg division. Applicant's petition set forth that previous to October, 1894, the farm Floriskraal was held in equal undivided shares by three brothers—Johannes Paulus Nel, Jan Abraham Nel, and Petrus Jacobus Nel—who in 1894 mutually agreed upon a partition of the farm, at the same time defining the water rights to which each of them should be entitled. In this agreement it was provided that the farm Rondekop, which was allotted to Jan

Abraham Nel, should have the sole and exclusive use of all the water rising in the Buffel River (flowing through the farm), on the portion allotted to Johannes Paulus Nel. The petitioner purchased Rondekop from Jan Abraham Nel receiving transfer on April 10, 1897, and had ever since had the sole and exclusive use of the water allotted to that property. Johannes Paulus Nel who by the partition became the owner of the remaining extent of Floriskraal, had recently sold a small portion thereof, including the section of the Buffel River, in which rises the water allotted to Rondekop, now owned by the petitioner, and was about to give transfer thereof to the purchasers—Solomon Lewin and Jacob Adamstein. The latter had informed the petitioner of their intention to divert and make use of the water to which he was entitled, and the petitioner therefore desired to secure his right to the water by registration on the transfer deeds of the development, and of Johannes Paulus Nel and Petrus Jacobus Nel, before transfer was passed by Johannes Paulus Nel. Petitioner's property, Rondekop, was entirely dependent on the water allotted to it under the agreement, and he would suffer serious and irreparable loss if he were deprived of that water. The petitioner asked for an interdict restraining Johannes Paulus Nel from transferring the portion of the farm Floriskraal, pending an action to be brought against him to have the petitioner's right to the use of the water declared, or such further and other relief as to the Court might seem fit.

A rule nisi was granted, returnable on October 15, in terms of the petition, applicant to commence his action forthwith, both Nels to be joined as defendants.

NOLTE BROTHERS V. KRAMER.

Despatch of urgent order—Time of essence of contract.

Defendant on Oct. 26th instructed plaintiffs as a very urgent order to forward a quantity of chaff forthwith. The chaff was not despatched till Nov. 2nd, and did not arrive till Nov. 7th.

Held, that plaintiffs having failed to perform their contract, defendant was justified in refusing to take delivery.

This was an action for goods sold and delivered.

The plaintiffs are produce dealers, of Somerset West, and defendant is a produce broker, of Cape Town.

Plaintiffs, in their declaration, stated that defendant was indebted to them in the sum of £23 10s. 1d., for goods sold and delivered, of which details were annexed. Defendant refused to pay the said sum, and defendants claimed for the amount with interest a tempore morae and costs.

The defendant, in his plea, stated that on October 26, 1905, he instructed plaintiffs to forward immediately, as a very urgent order, certain chaff, as per item of the account to Messrs. Hirschovitz and Co., at Pretoria, in the Transvaal Colony. It was of the essence of the contract that the chaff should be forwarded forthwith, and plaintiffs so accepted the order. The chaff was not despatched from Rust Siding until November 2, 1905, and did not arrive at Pretoria till November 7, 1905. Hirschovitz and Co. thereupon refused to accept delivery of the chaff, by reason of the delay in despatching, and as a result, defendant likewise refused to accept delivery, and forthwith notified the same to plaintiffs. Defendant said he was justified in so refusing by reason of plaintiffs' breach of contract in not immediately forwarding the said chaff, and by their delay in despatching the same, which delay defendant said was unreasonable, in face of the instructions given by the defendant. Defendant has not since, nor had anyone on his behalf, accepted delivery of the chaff. As to the other item, of £3 13s. 3d. sterling, being the balance of an account, defendant said that he had always been, and still was, ready and willing to pay the same, that he tendered payment of this sum to plaintiffs before issue of summons, and hereby again tendered payment. Wherefore, defendant prayed that, subject to the above tender, plaintiffs' claim be dismissed with costs.

The plaintiffs' replication was as follows: The plaintiffs admit that on the 26th October, 1905, the defendant instructed them to forward the chaff in question to the persons mentioned in paragraph 2 of the plea, and that he informed them that the said order was urgent. The plaintiffs say that they executed the order with all reasonable despatch, the chaff having been consigned by rail to the said Hirschovitz and Co. on the 31st October, 1905, such consignment and delivery of the said chaff being accepted by the defendant, who was aware of the same. They admit that thereafter, on or about the 8th November, 1905, after the said chaff had reached Pretoria, to which place, upon the defendant's instructions, it had been despatched, he notified them that he declined to accept responsibility therefor; but they say that the defendant was not entitled to decline such responsibility in the premises. The plaintiffs admit the tender referred to in paragraph 6 of the plea, but say that the same is wholly inadequate. Save as above set forth, and save as to admissions contained in the plea, the plaintiffs join issue with the defendant thereon.

Mr. Burton was for plaintiffs, and Dr. Greer for defendant.

Evidence having been called, and Mr. Burton having been heard in argument, Buchanan, J.: This action is brought to recover the sum of £24 16s. 10d. for a load of chaff sold by plaintiffs to defendant. The contract between the parties is proved by documentary evidence, and from the correspondence the Court has mainly to draw its conclusions. On October 26 defendant telegraphed to plaintiffs asking them if they could forward a truck load of chaff immediately. On same day plaintiffs replied that they could, and requested an order "to-day," and defendant replied: "Forward bogey of chaff to Hirschovitz and Co., Johannesburg. Very urgent." That was the contract entered into between the parties, and from these telegrams it might be inferred that the chaff was intended to be sent off on that very day. We find, however, that the plaintiff, who received the telegram, wrote to his brother on October 26 to tell him to get the chaff. At the time the contract was entered into the plaintiffs had not the chaff, nor had they a truck ready in which to send it. On October 27 they wrote to defendant: "Your order will be attended to at once." On receipt of this letter defendant wrote back trusting that the order had been despatched. Now, nothing was clearer than this, that it was thought by defendant that the chaff could have been despatched on that day. Plaintiffs, however, made no reply to this letter, so that by their conduct they justified the assumption by the defendant that his order had been complied with. On October 30 defendant had again to write to plaintiffs, and he said, "I hope you have forwarded the chaff, as I have no further information from you in regard to its despatch." He again assumes that they had sent it off, but a clerk of the plaintiffs, in forwarding letter to plaintiffs' store, puts a pencil note to the letter: "If you cannot do chaff, please write at once." There was no answer either to this letter, and the defendant writes asking that the advice notes should be sent to him not later than Monday, the 30th October. It was only on this Monday that one of the plaintiffs actually started to purchase the chaff which defendant had the right to assume had been forwarded some days previously. The first intimation defendant got that the order had not been carried out was in a letter dated October 31, written from Somerset West, in which plaintiffs said, "We have just received telegraphic advice that the chaff is being loaded." Defendant wrote back saying that he was very sorry to hear of the delay, as it was now several days since he had given the order, and he was afraid that the delay would cause some unpleasantness between him and Messrs. Hirschowitz. This letter was relied on by plaintiffs as acceptance of the chaff, notwithstanding the breach of contract, and they say that if the defendant had then countermanded the order they might have been able to stop the load of chaff while en route to the Transvaal. If the defendant had added to his letter "I hold you responsible," there would have been an end of the case. It was only on the 1st November that the defendant received an intimation that the chaff had not been sent off, whereupon defendant says to plaintiffs, "You know the conditions, and this is not immediate despatch." Naturally there was unpleasantness with the consignee and the plaintiffs as well as defendant were fully acquainted with the course of business and must have understood that the risk caused by the delay would attach to them. Of course if the consignee accepted delivery, as they all hoped he might, there would be an end of the risk, but if he did not the plaintiffs must be held answerable. They now come into court to enforce a contract which they themselves broke. Under the circumstances the Court cannot give them judgment. Judgment will, however, be given them for £3 13s. 3d., being the small amount owing by defendant on balance of previous transactions, and plaintiffs must pay the costs of this action.

Articled clerk—Breach of continuous service—Matriculation.

The Court granted applicant three months' leave of absence to prepare for the matriculation examination, but directed that after passing the said examination he should serve two years continuously.

Mr. Watermeyer moved on behalf of Raymond Rogers for leave of absence from his articles of clerkship for three months to enable him to take his matriculation examination.

Buchanan, J., in granting the application, remarked that the indulgence of the Court was being presumed upon, and he certainly thought the Law Society should have made an appearance in this case. Practically this was an application to allow the petitioner to go back to school. He (his lordship) would certainly set his face against breaking into the short period of three years for which students were articulated. However, as leave had been granted in other cases, he would grant leave in the present application, though he did so with much reluctance. The petitioner would have to serve two years without any break after he had gone through his matriculation.

BRINK V. CLANWILLIAM DIVISIONAL COUNCIL.

This was an appeal by J. A. Brink, of Clanwilliam, against the decision of the R.M. of Clanwilliam dismissing an action brought by appellant against the Divisional Council of Clanwilliam for £5 damages sustained through the breaking of the wheel of a wagon through the bad repair of the section of the main road between Clanwilliam and Van Rhyn's Dorp.

From the record it appeared that appellant's son was a transport rider between Eendekuil and Clanwilliam. In December last he left Eendekuil with a load of transport, which weighed about 6,400 lb. Near Clanwilliam boundary the wagon got stuck in a hole in the main road, and although the front wheels passed through all right, the back wheel collapsed in the hole. The hole was over 18 inches in depth, and was in the main spoor. The wheel was a new wheel. It cost £3 to replace the wheel and £3 to hire another wagon.

For the defence in the lower court the secretary of the Divisional Council stated that from 18th December no complaints were received by him with regard to the state of this road. The road was generally repaired by a road repairing party. It was done between the 14th September and the 25th October and commenced again on the 27th December at Clanwilliam. Limestone had been used in repairing this road. In February he again visited the place, and found no dangerous place there. The post-cart owner, in an affidavit, stated he knew the road well, and did not think any part of it dangerous.

The Magistrate, in his reasons for dismissing the case, stated, firstly, that he considered all the requirements of the Act had been complied with by the Councils; secondly, that the holes in the road were not caused by neglect, but that the transport wagon had caused the hole in the road, and the existence of the hole was unknown to the Divisional Council; and, thirdly, that no other wagons met with an accident in passing through the road. Plaintiff's wagon was driven by his son, and it was admitted that when he saw the hole he might have taken the precautions of building up the hole with bushes and sand. He (the Magistrate) considered that the Council had maintained the road in such a manner as to make it safe to travel over, and he held that the accident might have been prevented by the plaintiff's son taking ordinary precautions.

Mr. Burton appeared for appellant, and Mr. Van Zyl for respondent.

Mr. Burton contended that the road was a main road, and the obligation to maintain it in a proper state of repair was an absolute one (section 141 of Act 40 of 1889). If the accident occurred it was idle for the Council to say they had done their best.

Mr. Van Zyl quoted Jordans v. Cape Divisional Council (11 J., 158), and said it was sufficient for the Council to show that they had done all that could reasonably have been expected. There were inspectors who examined the roads every two months. The driver could have prevented the accident if he had exercised due care and diligence. The local conditions should also be taken into consideration.

Buchanan, J.: The appellant had a transport wagon, which was being driven along the Clanwilliam road by his son, a youth of 18 years. While on the Eendekuil road the wagon passed through a hole in the road, and the hind-wheel, when it got into the hole in the road, broke, whereupon the appellant sued the Divisional Council for the damages sustained in consequence. The Magistrate, after going through the evidence, arrived at the conclusion that there was no default on the part of the local Divisional Council, and also that the accident might have been prevented by due precaution being taken by the son who was driving the wagon. I think it is clear that the Divisional Councils Act, section 141, imposes a duty on all Divisional Councils, requiring them to keep in repair and preserve all main roads within their division. This was one of the main roads, and the question is whether or not the Divisional Council has been negligent in the discharge of the duty imposed upon it by the statute. From the evidence it would be seen that the driver passed along this road 16 days before, and there was no hole there, but on the return journey he found one. The only witness called to prove the existence of the hole before the day of the accident was one Van Horst, who stated he found the hole there eight days prior to the accident, but that he drove through it without suffering injury. He said the hole was not then so deep or large as it was subsequently, and that he had a light wagon. The Divisional Council had a road inspector, who, if I read the evidence correctly, inspects the whole of the roads in the division once every two months, and he had inspected this road early in December, and the road was then in good order. There is no contradiction of his evidence, in fact it is supported by the evidence of the plaintiff's son. The accident took place on the 28th December. The hole was on the boundary of the district, and the Magistrate arrived at the conclusion that considering all the circumstances there was no negligence on the part of the Divisional Council. This is a conclusion which he deduced from the circumstances. It has been contended, and I think fairly, that this Court is in a position to draw its own conclusions from the evidence which has been recorded. I agree with the Magistrate that one must take into consideration the circumstances of the district as to the nature of the repairs which are reasonably required to be made to main roads. In one division main roads may be kept in a very much better state of repair than is required upon roads in another division, and local circumstances may be such that it would be impossible to keep these latter roads in an equally good condition as other roads are kept in. Still the Act requires the Divisional Council to keep the roads in such reasonably good repair as to allow traffic to pass over them in safety. The question is whether there has been negligence on the part of the Council or not. The customary inspection and repairs had been executed without any report having been received of the accident. The inspector was, in fact, so convinced that the road was in good order that he said the accident must have occurred elsewhere. The Court requires a stronger case than that made by the appellant before it can say that the Magistrate was wrong in his finding. It was purely a finding on facts. If it had been shown that there was a knowledge of the existence of this hole, there might be better evidence of negligence on the part of the Council, though the absence of such knowledge does not necessarily exonerate the Council altogether. Although it is with some hesitation I can only say that upon the reading of the record I am not in a position to upset the finding of the Magistrate. It may be that another Magistrate might not have come to the same conclusion, but at any rate it could not be urged that this Magistrate was influenced by local considerations. He was brought from another district to hear the case, and was a Magistrate of considerable experience. There is one point which I have not referred to, which is, that the Magistrate calls attention to the admitted fact that notwithstanding that the son discovered the existence of the hole he determined to drive through it. He knew this when the front wheel of his wagon had gone through it and he determined to go on. He did not draw up the wagon as he might have done, but he went on and the wheel broke. Under these circumstances I do not think I ought to interfere with the judgment of the Magistrate; and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

BURGER AND OTHERS V. BURGFR.
Magistrate—Jurisdiction—Counterclaim.

Appellants had sued plaintiff in a Magistrate's Court for £20 as and for rent. In reconvention respondent had claimed £63. The Magistrate took evidence as to the bona fides of the counterclaim, and, being satisfied therewith, dismissed the case.

Held, that the Magistrate should have tried the plaintiff's claim and dismissed the counterclaim.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Resident Magistrate at Montagu deciding that a certain case in which the appellants were plaintiffs and respondent was defendant, was outside the jurisdiction of the Court.

In this appeal the plaintiffs, Messrs. Gert Christian Burger, Allwyn Petrus Burger and Schalk Gehardus Burger, sued the defendant, Johannes Hendrik Burger, for the amount of one year's rent at £25 per annum for portion of certain farm Concordia, in the Montagu division—the claim being reduced to £20 to bring it within the jurisdiction of the Court, and interest thereon from May, 1904, with costs of suit. An exception was raised by the defendant in the Court below that the summons was vague, embarrassing and insufficient in law, inasmuch as it did not explain or give particulars of the lease in respect of which the amount sued for was claimed. The exception was overruled. The defendant then pleaded—admitting the allegations, but stated that the lease was entered into for three years—of which period he had only one year's beneficial occupation, the plaintiffs having at the expiration of that year forcibly and without the consent and against the will of defendant resumed possession of the property—and thereby broke and cancelled the lease in respect of which the defendant claimed in reconvention the sum of £50, the value of eighteen muids of potatoes, destroyed by plaintiffs' cattle on or about March, 1904; and further, the sum of £4—the value of certain oat crop standing on the land on the date on which the plaintiffs resumed possession. The defendant excepted to the jurisdiction of the Court below in so far as the counterclaim exceeded the jurisdiction of the Court. To establish the bona fides of the claim in reconvention, which amounted to £63, the defendant was called in the Court below, after hearing whom, the Court was satisfied with the bona fides of the claim, and dismissed the case with costs, holding that it was ousted of its jurisdiction.

Mr. Murray Bisset appeared for appellants and Mr. McGregor for respondent.

Mr. Bisset said the Magistrate was clearly wrong. He ought to have tried the claim and the counterclaim for £13 and dismissed the counterclaim of £50; or he ought to have tried the claim and dismissed the whole counterclaim.

Mr. McGregor said that he would not argue that the magistrate was right in his reasons for holding that he had no jurisdiction, but he would take the point that the defence raised, that was that the lease was one for three years, was a bona fide one which would have the effect of extinguishing the whole of the plaintiff's claim. If so, the Magistrate would have had to try the validity of the lease, and that was beyond his jurisdiction. Counsel quoted the cases of Bertram v. Wood (10 J., 177), Wienand v. Goldschmidt (5 E.D.C., 267), Basaramadoo v. Morris (6 J., 28), Grotius (3-19-12), and Voet (19-2-17, 19-2-22, 19-2-27).

[Buchanan, J.: In Goldschmidt's case the question whether the rent was due depended on the existence of the lease, but here it is admitted that the rent is due.]

Mr. McGregor: Here the breach of contract is such that the respondent can cancel the whole contract. The contract-breaker cannot come into Court to enforce a contract which he himself has broken. He proceeded to quote Grotius (3-15-3).

Mr. Bisset, in reply, said that the argument that the contract was indivisible, was wrong in law. The rent was payable yearly and each year's rent could be sued for. He quoted Grotius (3-19-11) and Dale v. Winship (9 J., 509).

Buchanan, J.: The plaintiff's sued in the Magistrate's Court for a year's rent of a farm let to the defendant at the rate of £25 per annum. The claim was reduced to £20 per annum to bring the matter within the jurisdiction of the Magistrate. The defendant admitted the allegation of the summons, but set up a claim in reconvention for damages which was outside the jurisdiction of the Magistrate. The Magistrate inquired into the question whether the claim in reconvention was bona fide, and considering it was, dismissed the whole case. In doing so, the Magistrate has departed from frequent decisions of this Court which decide that where there is a liquid claim—not necessarily a claim on a liquid document—such a claim may be a liquidated claim, but a claim for unliquidated damages cannot be set off against any liquidated claim. Several cases have been referred to which are to the effect that where a Magistrate's jurisdiction is ousted by a counterclaim being set up beyond the Magistrate's jurisdiction such counterclaim must have the effect of entirely extinguishing the plaintiff's claim. In the case of Micuwenhuyse a claim on an alleged lease the defence set up was that no such lease was in existence. The Court held that if the defence was good, as the validity of the lease involved an amount beyond the Magistrate's jurisdiction, the Magistrate was right in dismissing the case, because the defendant would entirely extinguish the plaintiff's claim. So also in the case of Bertram v. Wood (10 Juta, 177), the defence set up, if bona fide, would have extinguished the claim made by the plaintiff. There the claim in reconvention was beyond the Magistrate's jurisdiction, and the Court held that the Magistrate was right in refusing to hear the case.

In the case before us the Magistrate referred to the case of De Jager v. De Jager (3 Juta, 69), in which the Court laid down that the mere allegation of a counterclaim was insufficient but that the Magistrate should be satisfied, before dismissing the case that the claim of the defendant was a bona fide claim and beyond his jurisdiction. But in this case the Magistrate has overlooked the fact that in De Jager v. De Jager the claim set up in reconvention was a liquid claim and not a claim merely for damages. As it was such a liquid claim it was competent to be set off against the plaintiff's claim and thus extinguish it.

No claim for unliquidated damages no matter how large it may be, can oust the Magistrate's jurisdiction where the claim made by the plaintiff is a liquid claim. That is the general principle which runs through all these cases and, I think that, it quite covers the present case.

The Magistrate therefore ought to have heard the plaintiff's claim, though it was competent for the defendant to set up any claim in reconvention within the Magistrate's jurisdiction.

The appeal must therefore be allowed with costs and the case will be remitted to the Magistrate for hearing on the merits. Leave will be given to the respondent to make any counterclaim which he may be advised to make within the jurisdiction of the Magistrate.

Costs must certainly be allowed, because it was the agent for the defendant who specially raised the point which is now decided against him.

CARROL V. VAN ZYL

Lessor and lessee—Sub-tenant—Novation.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the R.M. of Worcester, in an action brought against the appellant by the respondent to recover £20, for rent due on premises situate in Britstown, and known as Van Zyl's Chambers.

Mr. Upington appeared for appellant, and Mr. Benjamin for respondent.

From the evidence given in the Court below, it appeared that Van Zyl leased to Carrol, who at the time was residing in Britstown, certain premises known as Van Zyl's Chambers at £80 a year, and the defendant owed him £20, a quarter's rent from December 1, 1905, to March 1, 1906.

The defendant, in his evidence, stated that up to May, 1905, he owned the Britstown Hotel. When he was running that hotel, he hired Van Zyl's Chambers to be used as an adjunct to the hotel. When he left Britstown in 1903 he let the hotel to Marcuse and Wernberg. They also took over Van Zyl's Chambers from plaintiff. After witness left Britstown, they paid the plaintiff the rent for the chambers. Cohen and Fortes paid the rent from March to December, 1905, to Van Zyl. Cohen and Fortes surrendered their estate at the beginning of this year.

Van Zyl, in his evidence, said he only looked upon Marcuse and Wernberg as managers of the hotel, and he had never released Carrol from his liability under the lease.

Counsel having been heard in argument,

Buchanan, J.: In this case the plaintiff leased to the defendant certain premises known as Van Zyl's Chambers. They were used as bedrooms and as an annexe to an hotel which belonged to the defendant. In 1903 the defendant handed over his interest in the hotel to certain purchasers. He entered into an agreement with these purchasers under which he allowed them the benefits of the lease of the plaintiff's premises. This agreement was for five years, renewable for another five years. Whilst this agreement was running the lease between the plaintiff and the defendant expired. The tenants of the defendant then wished to hire these Van Zyl's Chambers from Van Zyl, who asked £100 per annum rent. This amount the tenants of the hotel refused to give. Subsequently defendant hired in his own name these chambers for £80 per annum from the plaintiff. This new lease gave defendant express permission to sublet the premises, and, shortly afterwards, upon Marcuse and Weinberg giving up the hotel, defendant entered into an agreement with the new tenants, Cohen and Forbes, by which he gave them the benefits of his rights in Van Zyl's Chambers. In other words he sublet to them these premises. The plaintiff was not consulted, nor was he asked to accept the new tenants.

There is, in my opinion, a total absence of a novation in this case. Mr. Upington has gone thoroughly into the evidence, but he has failed to convince the Court that these sub-tenants were accepted by the plaintiff in lieu of the defendant. If a person takes a lease of a property and sublets it, unless the lessor released the person who leases from him such original lessee still remains liable. Mr. Upington says that the evidence is overwhelming. I agree with that, only I think that it is overwhelmingly in favour of Van Zyl. I think the Magistrate was amply justified in his decision. There is no ground, either legal or equitable, upon which his judgment can be impugned. No such thing as a novation has been proved and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte TRUSTEE OF THE { 1906.
MARSH MEMORIAL HOMES. { Sept. 6th.

Mr. Bisset, as a matter of urgency, moved for the appointment of J. H. N. Roos as provisional trustee in the insolvent estate of Samuel Jacobs, and also in the insolvent estate of Barney Jacobs, to carry on the administration of the estates, pending the election of trustees.

Applications granted, and Mr. Roos appointed.

In re PONTER.

Mr. Benjamin appeared in this matter, on behalf of one Friedman to move to set aside a rule nisi, granted on September 5, interdicting the sale of certain property belonging to the estate Ponter pending further order of Court.

The applicant intervened, on the ground that he had bought certain property from the estate prior to the rule nisi being granted. His property had been sold by one of the co-executors, without the knowledge of the other executor.

Mr. G. W. Steytler (the intervener) took up the position that he had bought bona fide and for valuable consideration and from a co-executor who had been entrusted by his fellow executors with the administration of the property.

Mr. P. S. Jones, who appeared to oppose the discharge of the rule, on behalf of Mr. G. W. Steytler, was not called on to reply.

Buchanan J., said that the late F. Ponter had appointed Ponter and G. W. Steytler as executors testamentary of her estate. Mr. Steytler had allowed his co-executor to collect the rents and look after the bonds in the property. Ponter had advertised certain of the property for sale without consulting his co-executor, who first learned of the fact from the advertisements in the newspapers. Thereupon Mr. Steytler came to the Court and obtained a rule nisi, interdicting the sale from proceeding. Friedman had intervened, and alleged that he had bought some of the property before the rule was granted. The terms of the sale, as set out in the affidavit, did not incline the Court to assist him. It was said that the furniture was bought for a sum of £120, and that he had also hired the house, Margarete Villa, Annandale-street, for a period of six months, and paid in advance. The petitioner had not at present made out his case. It might be that he could afterwards show that Ponter was authorised to deal with the estate. If so, he would get his property. But at present the application must be refused, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN and the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

SAACKS V. THOMAS. { 1906.
{ Sept. 7th.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of the Cape in an action brought by appellant against respondent to recover damages in the sum of £14 1s. 2d. for alleged misrepresentation.

The respondent, it appeared, was the voluntary liquidator in the estate of Fisher, Hamilton and Co., and the appellant bought at public auction on the Grand Parade for £3 3s. a certain list of outstanding debts. Since the purchase he had found that a number of the debts in the list had already been paid, and that the alleged debtors held receipts. The total amount of disputed debts was £14 1s. 2d. The respondent set up the defence that the debts were sold subject to the conditions of sale, which were read before the contract of sale, and that there had been no misrepresentation.

The Magistrate granted absolution from the instance, with costs.

Dr. Greer was for appellant; Mr. M. Bisset was for respondent.

Dr. Greer submitted that on the Magistrate's finding he ought to have drawn a different conclusion. It was found that after these debts were sold there were certain persons on the list whose debts were erroneously included by the defendant's clerk. These debts had either been settled by compromise or some other way, and through want of supervision on the defendant's part they had not been deleted from the list. The Magistrate held that the defendant was covered by the conditions of sale. The plaintiff certainly could not set up the case that he was not acquainted with the conditions of sale, but he (counsel) submitted that the conditions of sale were never intended to cover a case of this kind, where the Magistrate had found that there was negligence or what amounted to negligence on the part of the defendant. The defendant said he did not know that the firms in question were on the list, but his clerk knew, and, from the point of view of the law, the defendant must be presumed to have knowledge. Mr. Thomas must be taken to have acted recklessly in this matter.

Without hearing Mr. Bisset.

Buchanan, J.: The defendant, one Thomas was liquidator in the estate of Fisher, Hamilton and Co., and as such liquidator he endeavoured to collect outstanding debts. His clerk was employed for this purpose, and his clerk got in certain of the amounts due, and in others he entered into a compromise. Thomas advertised a sale of the outstanding debts by auction, and a list was produced at the sale. On this list were some 30 odd debts of a total amount of £96, and in the margin some are marked disputed, some persons insolvent, and some are given as doubtful, and consequently, to protect himself, Thomas sold them under these conditions, that the claims were sold as free from responsibility or recurrence on the trustee, either on account of incorrectness, payment, partial payment, counter-claim, and so forth.

He protected himself as far as it was possible for words to protect him for any responsibility in regard to these debts. They are debts in liquidation. The purchaser must have known that they probably would not be sold if they could easily be got in by the liquidator. The purchaser attends the auction and buys this list of debts, amounting to £96. for £3 3s. He knows there is great risk, and he takes this risk. It now appears that before the sale the clerk had received one or two small amounts on account of this list of debts, and an action is now brought on what is alleged to be constructive fraud, founded on the constructive fraud of the clerk upon payment of some of these debts. It is clear, from some of the authorities cited by Mr. Greer, that a contract which is tainted with fraud cannot be insisted upon, that fraud would vitiate the contract entirely. If this had been a suit for restitutio in integrum, and such fraud or reckless mis-statement had been made, which amounted to constructive fraud, the Court might have considered the case. But there is no such action brought before the Court. The Magistrate has found, and I think properly found, that there is a total absence of anything like fraud on the part of the liquidator. There may have been some inadvertence in not checking the clerk's return, or verifying the list with the books, but there is no fraud of any kind. There are absolutely no grounds for upsetting the Magistrate's decision, except perhaps, if there had been a cross appeal, the judgment might have been changed to judgment for the defendant, instead of absolution from the instance. Appeal dismissed, with costs.

Hopley, J.: I concur. I do not wish to condone the carelessness of liquidators, but for an action like this to succeed, you must prove not only inadvertence, a mistake on the part of the principal or his clerk, but you must prove actual fraud.

ROODT V. LAKE AND OTHERS. { 1906.
Sept. 7th.

Transkei—Magistrate's jurisdiction—Courts of appeal—Acts 21 of 1876, 38 of 1877, Sec. 2, 43 of 1885.

The civil jurisdiction of Resident Magistrates in the Transkei as to amount and in respect of claims founded on liquid documents was regulated by Act 21 of 1876; and Act 43 of 1885 does not apply. By Act 38 of 1877, Sec. 2 (see also Act 29 of 1897, Sec. 1), the Governor is empowered to legislate for the Transkei by proclamation, and by such proclamation he subsequently conferred upon the Resident Magistrates of that Territory unlimited jurisdiction as to amount in illiquid civil cases, and the Magistrate has no power to remove such cases.

But non constat that the effect of this proclamation was to extend the jurisdiction under Sec. 3 of Act 21 of 1876.

Semble, the only Superior Court having appellate jurisdiction in native cases in the Transkei is that of the Chief Magistrate: but in cases in which a European is concerned an appeal lies either to the Supreme Court, the Eastern Districts Court, or a Circuit Court within the District.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Acting Resident Magistrate of Maclear, in an action brought by appellant against respondent to recover £271, value of certain cattle alleged to have been wrongfully taken from plaintiff, and £2,026 damages.

When the case came on for hearing in the Court below, application was made for the removal of trial to the Circuit Court at Umtata. The Court ordered further proceedings to be stayed, and the case removed to a superior Court, question of which Court to remain in abeyance.

The ground of appeal was that plaintiff was entitled to have the case tried in the Magistrate's Court, Maclear being situated within the Native Territories, and the Magistrate's jurisdiction being unlimited.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers was for appellant; Mr. McGregor was for respondent.

In the course of counsel's argument, attention was called to the extreme difficulty in tracing the Acts of Parliament bearing on the Territories.

[Buchanan, J.: These Acts are in a most jumbled condition.]

[Hopley, J.: Yes, an absolutely chaotic condition.]

Counsel on both sides having been heard,

Buchanan, J.: An action was brought in the Magistrate's Court of Maclear, in the district of Griqualand East, to recover 22 head of cattle, or their value (£271), and damages to the amount of £2,026 6s. When the case was heard, the defendant objected to the jurisdiction of the Magistrate, and wished the case referred to a superior court. Under the Griqualand East Annexation Act the law then in force in the Cape Colony was extended to the territory annexed subject to such modifications as the Governor might introduce by Proclamation. At the time of the annexation in 1879, the Act 21 of 1876 was in force in the Cape Colony, as well as the Magistrate's Court Act, No. 20, 1856. By the older Act the Magistrate had jurisdiction to the extent of £20 only in cases of damages, but by Act 21, 1876, this jurisdiction was extended in cases of liquid documents to an amount of £100, and section 3 of the Act of 1876 enacted that such cases, viz.: cases upon liquid documents when the claim was over £40 may, on objection taken by defendant and on security being given, be removed to a superior Court. The section as it reads must be confined, and is intended to be confined only to cases brought on liquid documents, and it gave to the defendants only in such cases power to object and request cases to be removed to a superior Court. Part of the Act 21 of 1876, as far as the Colony is concerned, has been repealed, and amended by the subsequent Act 43 of 1885, which extends the Magistrate's jurisdiction in other cases in addition to cases on liquid documents, and gives the defendant in those other cases the same right to object where more than £40 is claimed, as he had to object in the case of liquid documents, under the Act of 1876. Unfortunately, the Act of 1885 has not been extended to the Transkei, and, as the Act of 1885 has been passed since the annexation, it is not part of the law of the Transkei, because Parliament has indicated that no subsequent Acts of Parliament shall be in force in the Native Territories unless they have been expressly extended to those territories. There has been no extension of the Act of 1885. Consequently, the only Act in force in the Transkei is No. 21 of 1876. The conflict of laws thus created leads to a great deal of difficulty in dealing with questions arising in the Transkei, and it is really time that this chaotic state of affairs should be removed. When the Transkei was annexed, as has been stated, power was given to the Governor to legislate in that territory by proclamation. The Governor has by proclamation modified the Colonial law in so far as it affects the jurisdiction of Magistrates. Previous cases decided in this Court show that the Governor's proclamation must be read as giving Magistrates in the Transkei in civil suits unlimited jurisdiction. Even if we hold that the Act 21 of 1876 is part of the law which was transferred to the Transkei, the 3rd section of that Act does not apply to this action, it is limited to actions on liquid documents. This is not such an action, and, consequently, so far as this particular case was concerned it is immaterial whether that law is in force in the Transkei or not, and, as matters stand now, the Magistrates in the Transkei have unlimited jurisdiction to try actions for damages, and there is no law in force in the Transkei which gives the right to the defendant to object to the Magistrate trying such cases. In this case the defendant did object, the Magistrate upheld the objection, and ordered the case to be removed to a superior Court. There is no law in the Transkei which enables a Magistrate in an action for damages to order the case to be removed from his Court, which has jurisdiction to a superior Court. The question might arise as to which is a superior Court in actions in a Transkeian Court. Where the action is between natives, it is quite possible that in such a case the only superior Court to which such an action could be removed would be the Court of the Chief Magistrate of the Transkei. But where Europeans are interested, the superior Courts to the Magistrates' Courts in the Transkei, would be the Supreme Court, or the Eastern Districts Court, or a Circuit Court held in the district. If the action had been upon a liquid document I think it is quite possible that the Magistrate might have ordered the case to be tried in one of these superior Courts. In an action for damages there is no statutory provision to enable him to order it to go to a superior Court. This Court has not the power to say what the law ought to be. We cannot legislate: we must take the law as we find it, and, as we find the law, we hold that the Magistrate has no authority to remove this case out of his own Court. The appeal must therefore, be allowed, with costs, and the case remitted to the Magistrate for trial.

Hopley, J.: I concur. The Magistrate decided that the defendant could object, and he so decided simply on the ground that there was this section 3 of Act 21, 1876. It seems to me that the Magistrate is wrong for the reasons stated by my brother Buchanan, and I also think that in all probability the Magistrate might not have gone wrong if he had had the original Act before him which, it seems to me, it is almost impossible now to get anywhere in the country unless one happens to have some old volume of the Acts of Parliament, the almost mischievous compilation of the statutes very frequently reducing such matters as this to obscurity where there ought to be no doubt at all.

MORRISON V. KOLOBENI.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Acting Resident Magistrate of Matatiele in an action brought by appellant against respondent for the return and delivery of certain six bags of tobacco, which respondent was alleged to have wrongfully and unlawfully and without appellant's knowledge and consent removed, or caused to be removed, from his possession, and thereby to have committed an act of spoliation.

In the Court below exception was taken to the summons on the ground that it was vague and embarrassing, and for other reasons. The Magistrate upheld the exceptions.

Mr. Benjamin was for appellant (David Charles Morrison, of Umtata); Mr. P. S. T. Jones was for respondent (Kolobeni, of Khuapa's Location).

Counsel having been heard in argument.

Buchanan, J.: The plaintiff sued in the Magistrate's Court at Matatiele for the return of certain six bags of tobacco which he alleged the defendant "wrongfully, unlawfully, and without the knowledge and consent, removed or caused to be removed from his plaintiff's possession, and thereby committing an act of spoliation." Several exceptions were taken to this summons as being bad. The principal exception now relied upon was that the summons is vague and embarrassing. In the Magistrate's Court Act, schedule C, there is a plaint which has been followed in the summons in this case, the only variation being that the value of the article is not stated in the summons, but no exception is taken on that ground. There was also an exception taken on the ground that the date of the alleged spoliation was not mentioned in the summons, but that was cured by the plaintiff at once giving the date and asking to amend the summons accordingly. The form of plaint the schedule to the Act does not seem to require that the date should be given. Another exception was that there is nothing to show that the Court had jurisdiction. "as action may have been committed where no such relief as spoliation exists." I hardly know what the excipient means by this. I suppose he means that the taking of the goods might have been done at a place where spoliation gives rise to no cause of action. The only locality where one can imagine that this state of affairs exists would be where the "good old plan" prevails, that where, according to the old lines:

"He may take who has the power,
And he shall keep who can."

That is not the law of this colony, at any rate. The exceptions are unfounded, and the appeal will be allowed, with costs.

SMUTS V. RONDGANGER.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Assistant Resident Magistrate of Buchanan, J., said that under the circumstances the trial would be removed to the ensuing Circuit Court to be held at Worcester. Trials, as a rule, should be dealt with in the district where the alleged offence arose, and the officials ought to be very loth to remove the case out of the jurisdiction; still, when they had representations made to them that there was likely to be a miscarriage of justice if the trial took place in that district, the Court must place some reliance on the representations of the high officials of the Colony.

BARTMAN V. BARTMAN.

Mr. Payne moved for the removal of trial to the ensuing Circuit Court at Umiondale.

The case was removed accordingly, costs to be costs in the cause.

KUSSEL V. KUSSEL.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved for removal of trial to the ensuing Circuit Court to be held at Oudtshoorn. It was stated that plaintiff was suing her husband for judicial separation, and that the defendant had not pleaded to the declaration.

Case removed accordingly, costs to be costs in the cause, notice of date of trial to be given to defendant.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN
and the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

KEYSER V. ALSTADT. { 1906.
Sept. 10th.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Umiondale in an action brought by appellant against respondent for damages for alleged trespass and interference with water rights.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers was for appellant; Mr. Burton was for respondent.

Mr. De Villiers having been heard in argument,

Buchanan, J.: Plaintiff and defendant are in joint occupation of the farm Grootfontein, in the division of Umiondale. The plaintiff brought an action in the Magistrate's Court against defendant for damages. The summons, which stood for a declaration, set forth that, according to the title deeds under which the parties held, there were certain servitudes, one of rights of roads and footpaths, and the other the right to water, and the first complaint is that the defendant trespassed and did not keep to the footpaths; and the other is that he interfered with the rights of water. The parties live on the same erf. It appears that only a brick wall divides the dwelling-houses of the two parties, that the defendant keeps a shop on the farm, that the defendant's shop had once been broken into, and it is alleged that he accused the plaintiff's children of having broken into it, which plaintiff denies. There is evidently a great deal of ill-will on the farm, because the plaintiff has forbidden his family and tenants from dealing at defendant's shop, and defendant says that he and the plaintiff are bad friends, and the fact is that he is afraid of the plaintiff, and "plaintiff and I do not love each other, and the plaintiff persecutes me." With this state of feeling existing on the farm, it would not be difficult to raise a dispute between the parties. This action was brought purely for damages, because the Magistrate has no jurisdiction where there is any title or a question of a fee or duty or office or servitude in question, or where his decision would bind future rights. The action must be regarded as one for damages actually suffered, and not one for any declaration of rights or which would affect the future use of the water. The summons complains that the defendant did not keep to the footpath, but that he went off the footpath, and in so doing injured the orchard of the plaintiffs. It appears that some young peach trees were growing near the footpath; and the defendant, it was alleged, trod upon one, and broke another of these trees. The defendant denied the alleged trespass, and the Magistrate, after hearing the evidence, was not satisfied that the defendant committed the damage alleged. He dismissed this part of the claim, and the learned counsel does not now on appeal attempt to carry the matter further. There only remains the question of water. The first complaint as to interference with water by the defendant seems to be divisible under two heads. The first is that the plaintiff complained that the defendant, by keeping ostriches in a camp, through which camp the furrow which brings the drink water to the houses runs, had polluted the furrow, and so injured the plaintiff in his use of the drink water. It appears that the defendant's ostriches do get to the furrow, but it is further shown that the plaintiff's ducks and fowls and sheep and oxen also get to the furrow, and that if there is any pollution it is as much due to the plaintiff's own stock as the defendant's ostriches. The Magistrate held that the pollution did not arise solely through the defendant's acts, and, although he says that two blacks do not make a white, both parties carried on their operations in such a way that there was no material damage suffered by the plaintiff. The second head is that the defendant's servant on a certain occasion washed some tobacco in the common watercourse. It is a matter of dispute whether the tobacco was washed at the dam or on the defendant's own ground. Here the Magistrate has again found on the evidence against the plaintiff. It was a question of fact, and there is evidence to support the Magistrate in his finding that the washing of the tobacco was not done in such a way as to injure the plaintiff. Then there is a further allegation that the defendant turned off or caused to be turned off all the water coming down, so as not to allow any to run for domestic purposes. Here, according to the evidence, the Magistrate has found that during the summer months the flow of water is so weak that both plaintiff and defendant suffer from the want of drink water reaching their place owing to the extra evaporation and the defective condition of the furrow. It appears that the amount of drink water sent down is such as can escape through an inch hole in a stone; and if the furrow is at all defective, it is easy to imagine the failure of the water to reach the homesteads. Then there is another charge that the defendant abstracted the water on a certain occasion. The evidence seems to point to an occasion in January last when plaintiff had allowed one Klue three hours' water for threshing purposes, which water Klue was to return. Klue returned this water, commencing at 6 o'clock. The question arose as to when the supply ceased. The defendant produced a watch at the time to show that it was really 9 o'clock. The Magistrate, considering that it was only a trivial dispute, found that the plaintiff had not proved any damage on that head. There was another question as to where the water was taken by the parties at the commencement and termination of their respective turns. Well, the servitude on the farm does not fix any particular spot at which the water is to be taken. I have gone through the list from beginning to end, and I think it is impossible for this Court now to interfere with the finding of the Magistrate on this question of fact. No specific damages have been found. All counsel can now argue is that nominal damages should have been given. The Magistrate finds no damages have been proved, and he gives judgment of absolution from the instance. I think we cannot interfere with the Magistrate's judgment, and the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

BERGMAN BROS. V. MARY.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Herbert in an interpleader action brought at the instance of the respondent against appellants, to determine the ownership of a certain bull.

From the record, it appeared that Mary was a native, living in a location; one of her sons was called Scholtz. Appellants, who were tradesmen, had had transactions with Scholtz, and had obtained judgment against him, and, among other things, had attached a certain bull of cream colour, described in the record as a "cream bull." Mary brought an interpleader claim to have the bull declared her property, and the Magistrate found in favour of the claim, with costs, and ordered the bull to be returned to the claimant.

From the evidence, it appeared that the bull had been registered with the Inspector of Locations in the name of Scholtz. Mary was a widow, and it was stated to be the custom among natives for the eldest son to take charge of the stock on the death of the father.

Mr. Burton was for appellants; Mr. Benjamin was for respondent.

Mr. Burton said that this was an appeal on a question of fact, and he recognised that his position was a difficult one, but he submitted that the circumstances were certainly of a most suspicious character. It was clear from the evidence of Mr. Orpen, Inspector of Locations, that he took very great pains indeed to see that the registration of stock by natives in locations, as provided by the Act 37 of 1884, was carried out carefully, and that he had a foreman there who was acquainted with the regulations as to the registration of stock, and he told the Court that the people were well acquainted with these regulations.

Buchanan, J., said that the registration seemed to have been very lax. The ticket on which the stock and owner were described was an old servants' registry ticket, and the printed particulars had not been struck out.

Mr. Burton said that the copy of the ticket given in his brief was quite neat. Proceeding, he said the point was clear that this cream bull had been registered as Scholtz's brother's from the very beginning. He submitted that the matter was of such a suspicious character that judgment should have been given for appellants.

Buchanan, J.: Messrs. Bergman Bros. obtained judgment against one Scholtz, a native, residing in No. 5 Location, district of Herbert. In execution of this judgment, a writ was entrusted to the messenger, who attached a wagon and 12 oxen. This wagon and two of the oxen belonged to Scholtz, and were sold in execution. Of the other cattle, seven were claimed by different people, and were returned to them, but one, a bull, was claimed by Scholtz's mother, Mary. Acting upon instructions from the attorney for Bergman, the messenger refused to give up this property. Mary filed an affidavit and claimed it, and there was an interpleader suit. Unfortunately, through an irregularity in the messenger not having applied for the summons, the first interpleader suit was dismissed on an exception taken by the defendants, Bergman Bros., and Mary had to pay the costs. The second interpleader suit was brought by her in proper form through the messenger, and the evidence heard in that interpleader suit established beyond all doubt the fact that this bull belonged to Mary. The Magistrate has found upon the evidence of a great number of witnesses, who traced the bull from its birth, that it was the property of Mary. Scholtz, at the death of his father, as elder son in the family, registered the property belonging to the family with the inspector of native locations under Act 37 of 1884. He registered all the property in his own name, though the property belonged part of it to his brother, part to his mother, and part to other members of the family. It is now contended, and was contended before the Magistrate, that this registration was conclusive proof of the ownership of Scholtz in the bull. The Magistrate says that he took that fact as a presumption to be met. I think the Magistrate's reasons in this case state very clearly the facts of the case, and he goes on: "I held that the presumption raised by the registration in Scholtz's name was not sufficiently strong to disprove the ownership of Mary." The Magistrate's judgment seems to be quite correct, and is amply supported by the evidence led in this case. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed with costs. Hopley, J., concurred.

WILSON V. LEWIS.

{ 1906.
{ Sept. 10th.

Insolvency—Petitioning creditor
—Trustee—Costs.

The plaintiff in the Court below was the petitioning creditor for the compulsory sequestration of a certain estate. He had incurred certain taxed costs in connection with his petition. The bill of costs had been presented to defendant before his election as sole trustee of the estate. Plaintiff had filed a claim on the estate, but had not therein included the bill of costs and never had demanded payment from the trustee (defendant) after his election. Plaintiff had sued defendant for these costs, and the Magistrate dismissed the summons.

Held on appeal, that while it might have been competent for the respondent, as trustee, to have paid these costs on demand, and that while appellant might have proved for them on the insolvent estate, the respondent trustee could not be held personally liable for the same.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of the Cape in an action brought by appellant against respondent to recover a sum of £14 18s. 5d., costs of certain proceedings in an insolvency wherein appellant was petitioner and respondent was the trustee.

The summons called upon defendant, Henry Lewis, accountant and auditor, Cape Town, to defend an action, in which plaintiff (Andrew F. Wilson) claimed £14 18s. 5d., being the amount of certain taxed bill of costs incurred by plaintiff in presenting a petition to the Supreme Court for the final adjudication of certain estate, which said petition was duly granted. Plaintiff said that the bill was handed by the plaintiff's attorney to the defendant prior to the second meeting of creditors held on the 29th September, 1905, and at which the defendant was elected sole trustee, and it was the duty of the defendant, when framing the liquidation and distribution account, to include the said bill of costs. Plaintiff claimed £14 18s. 5d. damages by reason of the defendant's omission and negligence in not so including the bill of costs. Defendant took exception to the summons on the ground that it disclosed no cause of action. He said that the liquidation and distribution account had been duly confirmed by the Supreme Court. Plaintiff filed his claim in the estate, but did not include therein the bill of costs now sued for. Defendant had filed a plan of distribution, and the same was allowed, and distribution had been made accordingly. Defendant further excepted that the sentence of the Supreme Court was a final judgment and a bar to further proceedings.

The Magistrate dismissed the summons, holding that it did not disclose a cause of action.

Mr. McGregor was for appellant; Mr. Burton was for respondent.

Mr. McGregor submitted that it was the duty of the trustee to reimburse the plaintiff for costs to which he had been put in petitioning the Supreme Court for sequestration of the insolvent's estate. From the terms of the Ordinance, the trustee had notice that there were these claims in the case of a petitioning creditor where there was a compulsory sequestration, and he must provide for them. The Ordinance specially mentioned the case of a man who petitioned and protected him for his costs in bringing about the sequestration. Counsel quoted Du Prez v. Botha's Trustees (2 Juta).

Buchanan, J.: I take it that under the Act all creditors are called upon by the Master and afterwards by the trustee to file and prove their claims. Still, after the decision in the case of Du Preez v. Botha's Trustees, I think it would have been competent for the trustee, on demand being made upon him, to have paid the costs incurred in securing the sequestration, as administrative costs of the estate. But, before any lack of duty on the part of the trustee in not paying these costs can be alleged, they must either have been demanded from him or have been proved on the estate. For, although they might have been paid by him on demand, there was nothing to prevent the creditor from proving on the estate for these costs. As a fact the creditor did prove on the estate for the amount which he alleged to be due to him, but omitted to include this taxed bill of costs in his claim. We also find that, after the defendant was elected trustee, no demand or intimation was given to him as to this taxed bill of costs. Under these circumstances, the Magistrate held that the defendant, on the summons, was certainly not liable to the plaintiff, and it seems to me indisputable that the Magistrate was right in this case. The only possible ground of action that the plaintiff has against the defendant seems to be founded on the fact that while he was a private individual, when he had nothing whatever to do with the estate, the plaintiff gave him this bill of costs. But it does not appear what he gave it to him for. It could not then have been as a demand upon the estate, because he was not then the trustee. If it were given to him as plaintiff's agent for the purpose of making a demand upon the estate for this taxed bill of costs, the answer is that that is not the action brought before the Court, and, as Mr. McGregor candidly acknowledges, the mere delivery of a bill of costs to a person who is not a trustee would create no liability on his part, unless it were covered with a mandate or some other instructions to act on the bill of costs so delivered. If the bill of costs had been given to him in his private capacity, with instructions to take certain action thereon, he might possibly be liable for failure to take that action, but as far as the breach of duty on his part as trustee is concerned—and that is the ground upon which this action is brought—the plaintiff has failed on the summons to show that such a breach of duty exists at all. Under these circumstances, I think the Magistrate was perfectly right in dismissing this case. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Hopley, J., concurred.

Ex parte PATERSON.

Mr. Russell moved, as a matter of urgency, for a temporary interdict restraining one James G. Hamilton from removing certain goods from premises in Plein-street Cape Town, pending an action for rent. Petitioner, who was acting through his agents, E. R. Syfret and Co., stated that respondent was sub-lessee of a portion of premises, 51, Plein-street, and owed petitioner a sum of £46 10s. for rent. Respondent was leaving this (Monday) evening for Mossel Bay, and was about to remove his samples and stock.

Rule nisi granted, to operate as a temporary interdict, preserving the landlord's lien for rent over the property in the premises, pending an action to be instituted forthwith, with leave reserved to respondent if so advised, to move to set aside the rule.

REX V. HAVENGA. } 1906.

Liquor—Act 28 of 1883, Sec. 2.

Three coloured men purchased from appellant some 12 gallons of wine, which they did not consume on the premises. The Magistrate treated this sale as three separate sales and convicted appellant under Act 28 of 1883, Sec. 2.

Held on review, that there had only been one sale and conviction quashed.

Hopley, J.: A case has come before me on review from the R.M.'s Court at Brodasdorp against Jan Havenga of contravening section 75 of the Liquor Licensing Act (No. 28, 1883), in that he had sold liquor when he was not authorised to do so. The evidence shows that there came to his farm, he being a farmer who distils spirits and makes wine, a cart with three coloured men upon it, and these men bought from him there on the farm at one time wine in three lots—one in an anker, one in half an anker measured into various vessels, and another four bottles of wine poured into four bottles. In all 12 gallons or more wine was sold at the time. None of it was consumed at the place, and it was all delivered at one time, put into the cart, and taken away. The Magistrate convicted Havenga, looking upon it as three transactions, and not one simply, and, therefore, as not being covered by the protection afforded by the third subsection of section 2 of the Act, which is as follows: "Nothing in this Act shall apply to any person engaged in agriculture who may sell, upon the property occupied by him, intoxicating liquors in quantities of not less than seven gallons at one time, such liquors being the produce of grapes or other fruits respectively of his own growth, or purchased or procured by him: Provided that such liquors shall be distilled or made upon such property, and shall not be drunk or consumed on his premises." Now, it is common cause that this liquor had been made upon this farm, it was not drunk upon the farm, and the only question that remains is whether it was one transaction or three. I submitted the matter of this query to the Chief Justice and the other Judges and we sent it to the Attorney-General to see whether he could support the conviction and the Attorney General has now sent back an intimation that he cannot support the conviction, and the feeling of the Judges is that the sale must be looked upon as one transaction, a sale of more than seven gallons of wine not consumed on the premises and the produce of the grapes of the farm, and therefore protected by the third subsection of section 2 of the Act. The conviction must, therefore, be quashed.

Sept. 11th.

This was an action brought by Conrad Cohen, of Woodstock, against Morris Feltman, of Cape Town, for an account. Plaintiff appeared in person; Mr. Gutsche was for defendant.

Plaintiff applied for a postponement until next term. He said he had been under the impression that the case would not be taken until next term. It had appeared in the list for the 2nd October. He desired to engage counsel.

[Hopley, J.: It is such a stupid little case that I don't know whether it is worth while putting it off. Of course, it may not be stupid to you, though it strikes me in that light.]

Mr. Gutsche (in answer to the Court) said that he should not object to a postponement provided plaintiff paid costs of the day.

[Hopley, J. (to plaintiff): You will have to pay wasted costs if the case is postponed.]

Plaintiff assented.

[Hopley, J.: The matter will be put off until next term, but you must pay any costs that are wasted by your not being ready to-day.]

BANK OF AFRICA V. HOULDER BROS. AND CO., LTD.

Promissory note—Agent—Liability of principal—Power of attorney.

Mr. Searle, K.C., moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £2,550, signed on behalf of Messrs. Houlder Bros. and Co., by J. M. Keene, and dated 29th June, 1906.

Mr. Upington read an affidavit by W. Westray Bell, manager in South Africa of the African Shipping and Agency Co., who said that Keene had no authority from Houlder Bros. and Co. to enter into any transaction of this kind. Furthermore, the matter did not appear in the books of Houlder Bros. and Co.

Mr. Searle read a replying affidavit by P. C. Blair, manager of the St. George's-street branch of the Bank of Africa, who said that the promissory note was given in part renewal of a bill previously discounted in the ordinary and usual way.

Mr. Upington said that the defence was two-fold. In the first place, there was no authority in the power of attorney held by Keene to make or sign a promissory note. He submitted that in a matter of this kind the power of attorney should be strictly construed. Keene had authority to negotiate or endorse promissory notes, but no express power was given to him to make or sign promissory notes on behalf of the Houlders' business. In the second place, upon the affidavits the transaction in respect of which the signature was attached to this promissory note was not a transaction on behalf of the business. Counsel quoted from Story on Agency (section 68), and cited Hambro and Son v. Burnand and Others (1903, 2, K.B.D. 399). The latter case was, he said, tried in the Commercial Court before Mr. Justice Bigham, and Mr. Justice Bigham's judgment was reversed on appeal, on the ground that he had not given due weight to the American authorities. Surely, in a matter of English commercial law, it was not necessary to consider the American authorities. The very fact that the phrase "make and sign promissory notes" did not appear in this power of attorney was conclusive evidence that it was never intended to give Keene power to do that. Keene, by making this note, could not bind Houlder Bros., and the principal was not liable under all the circumstances.

Without calling upon Mr. Searle,

Buchanan, J.: This is an application for provisional sentence on a promissory note signed p.p. Houlder Bros. and Co., Limited, J. M. Keene, in favour of Messrs. Black and Co., and by Black and Co., endorsed over and discounted, with the plaintiffs, the Bank of Africa, Limited. The defence set up is that Keene had no authority to sign this note on behalf of Houlder Bros. and Co., and that Keene used this note for his own purposes, and not for the business of Houlder Bros. and Co. It appears from the affidavits that Keene had been in the habit of negotiating numbers of promissory notes signed in this way with customers of both the plaintiff bank and the National Bank of South Africa. The plaintiff bank, when a note signed by Keene in this way for Houlder Bros. was first presented to them for discount required the production of his authority so to sign, and he exhibited his power of attorney, given by Messrs. Houlder Bros., which gave almost unlimited powers to Keene to act for Houlder Bros. in the conduct of commercial transactions. In this power they expressly authorise him "to draw, accept, endorse and negotiate any bills of exchange, promissory notes, bills of lading," or other documents. The first objection taken by Mr. Upington is one founded on the meaning to be attached to the word "draw." He would admit that if this promissory note had been endorsed by Keene, it would have come under the power of attorney, but the word "draw" he says refers only to bills of exchange, and not promissory notes, and the word "draw" does not justify the agent in signing a promissory note in favour of a third party. I think, looking at the words used and the powers given and intended to be given by this power of attorney, the agent had full power to "make" a promissory note as well as to "draw" a bill of exchange on behalf of his principals, Messrs. Houlder Bros. and Co. I admit at once that if it were known to the bank that Keene had been making these promissory notes for his own purposes, and not for the purposes of the business, they could not rely upon this power of attorney, as charging the principals in this case. But the affidavits state that Keene has been giving these notes to customers of the bank, and they had no knowledge of any irregularity. Mr. Upington has relied upon a judgment of Mr. Justice Bigham, a Judge whose reputation in commercial cases stands very high, in which he had decided against a transaction in which an agent, acting under a power of attorney, had bound his principals' credit for his own transactions. But, when we come to enquire further into this judgment it is found that it was overruled on appeal; it went before a full Court of Appeal, and was overruled, and one of the Judges of Appeal distinctly pointed out that if persons authorised by documents of this nature, acted under these documents, and incurred a liability to an innocent third person, it was not incumbent upon that third person to see that the proceeds received were applied to the business of the principals. This promissory note was discounted with the bank in the ordinary course of business, and the bank was justified in taking the note without going into the details of the transaction. In this case it is clear that they did not know that it was for the agent's own benefit. In the ordinary course of business, and in this case provisional sentence cannot be refused. It is, of course, competent for the defendants, if they chose, to go into the principal action. On the documents as they stand, the Court must give provisional sentence as prayed, with costs.

SCHWANER V. HOLMES.

Mr. Burton moved for provisional sentence on certain two promissory notes for £1,000 and £838. On the latter note a balance of £127 6s. 9d. was sued for.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones (for defendant) read an affidavit by his client, who stated that the notes were given in connection with the purchase of plaintiff's share in certain partnership business in the district of Prieska. Deponent entered at some length into his relations with the plaintiff, and claimed that he was entitled to payment from the plaintiff of £947 10s. 3d. and £127 6s. 9d., being due respectively upon a rectification of the books of the business, and the plaintiff's share of a loss upon certain Government contracts for supplies to the Cape Mounted Police. He said that he had paid the difference between the amount of £1,131 19s. 3d., due to him from the plaintiff, and £1,838, the amount of the promissory notes. Defendant added that, as a matter of fact, a sum of £2 0s. 6d. was now owing to him by plaintiff. He had specially stipulated that the £1,000 note should not be negotiable.

Mr. Burton read a replying affidavit by plaintiff, who said that the defendant was truly indebted to him in the sums that he claimed. The partnership business was taken over by defendant, including all outstanding, and he must bear any losses on that account. Deponent admitted that he was liable for any losses on the C.M.P. contract over and above £500, and said that he had credited the defendant with the sum of £184 9s., claimed by defendant to be due to him in that connection.

Mr. Jones submitted that, in view of the agreement and the account, provisional sentence should be refused, with costs. If the plaintiff wished to persist in his claim, then he should be ordered to go into the principal case.

Mr. Burton said that the agreement of dissolution provided for errors and omissions in the books to be adjusted within a certain date, but the defendant was going quite beyond the deed of dissolution, and claiming to be entitled to set off against his liability under the promissory notes large sums of money, which he said represented bad debts that he had since found to be irrecoverable. Defendant had taken over the bad debts for what they were worth. Prima facie, on the deed of dissolution and the promissory notes, the defendant, counsel submitted, was liable.

Buchanan, J.: Provisional sentence is prayed on two promissory notes made by the defendant in favour of the plaintiff. The one is for £838 and the other for £1,000, and both were given on the 15th January, and were payable on the 30th June this year. In the note for £1,000 is embodied this condition: "This promissory note is not negotiable without my consent in writing first had and obtained." The plaintiff annexes to the notes the agreement out of which they originated, from which document it appears that the parties had been in partnership, and that the defendant agreed to take over the business and buy out the plaintiff. The amount for which the business was taken over was something over £5,000, of which sum £3,500 was paid by the defendant in cash, and for the balance the two promissory notes in suit were given. The agreement contains two conditions. One is that as there was a running contract between the Government officials and the firm for the supply of goods to a police station, until that contract expired it could not be ascertained whether it would result in a profit or loss. Evidently, the parties thought it would be run at a loss, because the plaintiff agreed to pay so much of the loss as might amount to over £500. The contract expired at the end of June, and it was then found that the loss was something over £680, which left a balance of £184 9s. due from the plaintiff to the defendant. At the due date of the first promissory note of £838 odd, the defendant paid the sum of £743. He said that, setting off the share of loss on the police contract, which was to be paid by plaintiff, and setting off certain errors which were in the books, this amount of £743 was the total amount which was due from him to the plaintiff in respect of both bills. The plaintiff now admits that £184 9s. is due from him in respect of his share of the loss on the police contract, and he is willing to set that off. The second condition in the contract is, that the defendant was to have six months in which to examine the books, and that any errors and omissions, if they exceeded the sum of £100, were to be afterwards adjusted. The defendant says that was why the £1,000 note was not to be negotiated. The defendant has made a list of amounts which he says require adjustment, but these the plaintiff disputes. It is clear something will have to come off that note—what amount is not quite clear. Whether these errors and omissions are wholly or partly chargeable against the plaintiff is a matter which cannot be determined on motion. The note was given subject to subsequent adjustment, and seeing that such an adjustment has not been made, I do not think this is a matter for provisional sentence. The parties must either go into the principal case, or I would suggest that they should appoint somebody to go into the accounts between them and adjust the same. At present provisional sentence must be refused, and the parties will be ordered to go into the principal case, costs to abide the result.
